Pleasing and suggestive character-sketches, written from the humanitarian point of view with much appreciation and reverent feeling.—Independent.

The New Bible and its New Uses. By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER. 286 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction: The New Bible; I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible claims for itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix, Contradictions in the Gospels.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troublous, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. “The Star! The Star!”

“Afterglow,” like Gannett's “Wrestling and Blessing,” is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged.”—Christian Register.

Belief in God. By M. J. SAVAGE.

An Examination of some Fundamental Theistic Problems, to which is added an Address on the “Intellectual Basis of Faith,” by Rev. W. H. SAVAGE. 176 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Origin and Development of the Idea of God; Does God Exist? Can we know God? Is God Conscious, Personal, and Good? Why Does not God Reveal Himself? Shall we Worship God? Shall we Pray to God? The Glory and the Shame of Atheism.

Seeing and Being, and Other Sermons. By JOHN W. CHADWICK. 234 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Great Hopes for Great Souls; “A Mere Man”; The Constructive Achievements of the Higher Criticism; Tempted of God; The Price of Moral Freedom; Orthodoxy, what is it? Morality and Religion; The Conversion of Energy; Two Meanings of Religion; The Undiscovered Country; Samuel Longfellow; The Old, Old Story; The Fulness of Time; The Unbridled Tongue; Immortality; Seeing and Being.

Discourses. By EDWARD H. HALL, Pastor of the First Parish, Cambridge. 244 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

The whole volume is marked by that high style of thought and feeling which has always characterized the best spiritual products of New England, and which has done so much to keep religion from stagnation and to hold public and private conduct amenable to the highest standards.—The Nation.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Christian Registers

WANTED.

Copies of The Christian Register for Feb. 15 and March 29, 1894, are wanted to complete files. Any one having copies of the paper for above dates which they do not care to preserve will confer a favor by sending them to the office of the Christian Register, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Mozoomdar's

BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment, Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.

No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.

No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.

No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.

141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Pleasantries.

A goat, sent by rail from Chicago to Boston, was tagged by the owner, "Please pass the butter."—Sacred Heart Review.

"Why don't you ever write any poetry, Scribe?" asked the friend. "I did write a poem once,—an 'Ode to Oblivion.'" "Indeed! What became of it?" "It reached its destination."—Charity Guardian.

Alicia, aged five, to entertain one of her mother's friends, fetched a photograph of the sliced-off Psyche, which she presented with the remark, "Vis is a very beautiful fing—but I don't fink so."—The Transcript.

She: "It must have been an awful storm to blow away the light-house." Cholly: "Terrible, my dear! But it could only have been through carelessness that there was a light-house in such an exposed place."—London Tid-Bits.

Ernest was four years old when he saw his first monkey, which was on the street with a "hand-organ man." He rushed into the house, saying: "Mamma, mamma! Him looks like a man, but him am a kitty!"—Youth's Companion.

The following was received from an applicant for the post of organist by a church committee: "Gentlemen, I noticed your advertisement for organist and music teacher, either white or colored. Having been both for several years, I wish to offer my services."—American.

Oxen or elephants as means of rapid transit would not seem more remarkable to the strictly modern child than the antiquated horse. Such a child was one day looking at an old print. She exclaimed: "Oh! How funny! Here's a horse-car! or maybe," looking more closely at the rather long ears, "maybe it's a reindeer car."—Exchange.

Had it in his head.—"Now, Willie," said his teacher, as school opened, "you may recite your geography lesson. Where is Afghanistan?" Willie hesitated a moment. "Don't you know?" asked the teacher. "Yes! I've got it in my head somewhere, but I can't lay my brain on it just this minute," Willie replied.—Harper's Young People.

A woman at the World's Fair, who had charge of an exhibit in the Machinery Building, in a section given over to iron monsters which whirled, revolved, hammered, and shrieked on all sides, says that one day a visitor stood near her, gazing about in a bewildered way for a time. Then she approached, and inquired, "Is this the Fisheries Building?"—Atlantic Monthly.

"Do you want a boy?" he asked of the magnate of the office, standing before him, cap in hand. "Nobody wants a boy," replied the magnate. "Do you need a boy?" asked the applicant, nowise abashed. "Nobody needs a boy." The boy would not give up. "Well, say, mister," he inquired, "do you have to have a boy?" The magnate collapsed. "I'm sorry to say we do," he said; "and I guess you're about what we want."—Northern Budget.

In a volume of "Transactions" recently printed by the Grolier Club there are some amusing stories told by Mr. Frederick Keppel, and among them this of Matthew Arnold: "After his return to London from his first lecturing tour in this country he visited Mrs. Procter, then eighty years old. In giving Mr. Arnold a motherly cup of tea, she asked him, 'And what did they say about you in America?' 'Well,' said the literary autocrat, 'they said I was conceited, and they said my clothes didn't fit me.' 'Well, now,' said the old lady, 'I think they were mistaken as to the clothes.'"

DEFINITIONS.

There are often hidden meanings in the humorous answers given by school-boys in the examination-room. From a collection of such answers in the University Correspondent we cull a few authenticated specimens. "Parallel straight lines," said one boy, "are those which meet at the far end of infinity." And another sagely remarked that "things which are impossible are equal to one another." The boy who wrote, "A point is that which will not appear any bigger, even if you get a magnifying-glass," would have no difficulty in understanding that a star, being but a lucid point, cannot be magnified. Every examiner is familiar with the non-committal answers frequently received, and with which may be classified the cautious statement that "two straight lines cannot enclose a space, unless they are crooked." But even these words of wisdom are eclipsed by the definitions of kinetic and of potential energy once received. "Kinetic energy," ran the definitions, "is the power of doing work. Potential energy is the power of doing without work." This truth, which has a monetary application, is well worth adding to our contemporary's collection.—Nature.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement.

Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON.

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

The merits of the Palmer Woven Patent Hammocks have never been equalled. Their superiority of material, construction, and design has made them the Standard since first introduced. While there is a continual effort by imitators and infringers to produce something similar, it has all been without success, and the "Palmer Patent Hammocks" still stand pre-eminently superior to any of the imitations. They are produced in larger quantities and infinitely more varieties than the combined production of all others.

Before purchasing, insist upon seeing the "Palmer Patent Hammocks." Remember, the name "Palmer" is a synonym for all that is best in Hammocks. If your dealer does not have them in stock, he can get them for you, but be sure that he does. I. E. Palmer, Middletown, Conn.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin.

BLAKE BELL CO., Boston, Mass.

In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sell

CHURCH CARPETS

at manufacturers' prices.

John H. Pray, Sons & Co.,
Wholesale and Retail CARPETS and UPHOLSTERY,
658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston.
Correspondence Solicited.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods; large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. E. W., Christian Register.

DURKEE'S SPICES

THE WELL KNOWN "GAUNTLET BRAND"

EXCEL IN PURITY, STRENGTH & FLAVOR.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every Library and Reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,

50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL, Framingham, Mass.

Entrance examinations WEDNESDAY, Sept. 11, 1895. For circulars address ELLEN HYDE, Principal.

MISS KIMBALL'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, Worcester, Mass.

Thorough preparation for College. Intermediate, Academic, and Special Courses. Send for Illustrated Circular.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL, Bridgewater, Mass.

Regular, special, and post-graduate courses for men and women. Excellent advantages. Examination for admission SEPT. 3 and 4. For circulars address ALBERT G. BOYDEN, Principal.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

In the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

Mr. Knapp's Home School for Boys, PLYMOUTH, MASS.

Powder Point School (DUXBURY, MASS.) These schools have always had the same interests, and will now be united at Duxbury, the Plymouth school closing with the present term.

Rev. and Mrs. John A. Bellows'

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS will begin its seventh year Sept. 18, 1895. Number of boarding pupils limited to eight. Address 91 DANFORTH STREET, PORTLAND, ME.

West Newton English and Classical School. ALLEN BROTHERS.

Family School. Both Sexes. Unsectarian. Prepares for College, Scientific Schools, Business, and for a useful life. Forty-third year begins Wednesday, September 18. Catalogue of ALLEN BROTHERS, WEST NEWTON, MASS.

THE MORGAN SCHOOL, PORTSMOUTH, N.H.

This Home and Day School for Girls will reopen September 25 for its second year under the new management. College, Preparatory, and Finishing Courses. Address for circular Miss GEORGINA S. WOODBURY, Principal.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS. Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

THE HIGHLAND MILITARY ACADEMY, WORCESTER, MASS. begins 40th year September 11. Classical, Scientific, Business, Preparatory Departments. Gymnasium. Athletics encouraged. Careful training. Home influences. JOSEPH ALDEN SHAW, A.M., Head Master.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE Springfield, Mass.

Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN McDUFFIE, Ph.D. NEWTON CENTRE, MASS. SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY Law School.

Fall term opens Wednesday, October 2. For circulars address EDMUND H. BENNETT, Dean.

Mr. HALE'S SCHOOL 86 BEACON ST., BOSTON.

The 13th year will begin September 25. Preparation for Harvard College and the Institute of Technology. Full Classical and Scientific Courses. Primary department for young boys nine or ten years of age. Fine situation, directly opposite the Public Garden. Large, sunny, high-studded rooms, open fireplaces, gymnasium, extensive laboratories, covered fire-escape, lunch-room. Teachers: ALBERT HALE (Harv.), E. D. MARSH (Harv.), E. K. STEVENS (Harv.), C. S. STREET, Amherst. Address ALBERT HALE.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, AUGUST 15, 1895.

NUMBER 33.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; Religious Outlook in America.	513
Senator Hoar's Reply,	514
MUSINGS,	514
BREVITIES,	515
PRO AND CON.
The Japan Mission; The Floating Hospital,	515
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Backsliding in Switzerland; Senshin Gakuin Commencement, by Clay MacCauley,	516
Report of the Work of the A. U. A. on the Pacific Coast, by Rev. Charles W. Wendte, Superintendent,	517
The Wells Grove Meeting; New York Letter; The Power of Faith,	518
American Unitarian Association,	519
Napoleon's Abdication,	521
Dr. Holmes's Profession,	522
Rev. John Langdon Dudley,	526
Little Mexican Children; Importance of Birds,	527
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	519
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	519
THE PULPIT.
True Religion, by Charles A. Allen,	520
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	521
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	521
LITERATURE.
"Chapters from Unwritten Memoirs"; Other Book Notices,	522
Miscellaneous; Literary Notes; Books Received,	523
THE HOME.
At the Menagerie; How Bob won the Prize,	524
What happened to Dinah; The Brave Little Tree; Runaway Rusty; Kindness of Ants; A Pretty Story,	525
POETRY.
Sonnet, by Rev. Henry G. Spaulding,	516
A Vesper Prayer,	520
Long Beach, by Anna Olcott Commelin,	524
A Little Girl's Idea of Duty,	525
Star Teachers,	526
PERSONALS,	526
TEMPERANCE,	526
EDUCATION,	526
SCIENCE,	527
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	527
HERE AND THERE,	527
PLEASANTRIES,	528

Editorial.

MR. GLADSTONE'S great speech at Chester has increased the interest in Armenia's affairs, and will add new strength to the demand for a real reform. The only protest which has reached us of the "grand old man's" address is that from Khalef Khalid, who asks him why he hates and denounces the Turk. This has drawn out a letter, in which he says: "I entirely disclaim the hatred and hostility to the Turks, or any race of men, which you ascribe to me. I do not doubt that you write in entire good faith, but your statements of facts are unauthenticated. I proceed only upon authenticated statements. I make no charge against the Turks at large, but against a Turkish government. I make the charges which they have been proved guilty of by public authority. In my opinion, I have been a far better friend to the Ottoman Empire than have the sultan and his advisers. I have always recommended the granting of reasonable powers of local self-government, which would have saved Turkey from terrible losses. This good advice has been spurned; and, in consequence, Turkey has lost 18,000,000 of people, and may lose more. Pray weigh these words." In this connection we would note that, at a luncheon with Rev. Dr. Lorimer, Mr. Gladstone said: "I am desirous to have America specially interested in the work of Armenian reform. Whenever England has had dealings with the sultan, the Ottoman government thinks it is actuated by some ulterior motive. But America occupies so independent a position, and is so far removed from the seat of European politics that its public opinion will have great influence in the East."

AS WE get the facts in relation to the Indian massacre, it is a repetition of the old story of provocation and injustice. The Indians were arrested for violating the game laws, the maximum penalty of which is a fine of ten dollars and three months' imprisonment. The warrant in this case, we are told, was issued in blank. Therefore, the constable and his posse who arrested the Indians committed an assault on them. The New York Evening Post says that the Pressing regards the killing as murder. Without going into the details of this story, it is evident that the Indian who was killed was treated as if he had no rights which a white man is bound to respect. How long will this gross injustice to the Indian and the Negro be continued? Our treatment of them is both a shame and a disgrace. As a relief to the sad story of Indian wrongs, we welcome the signs of progress as a result of the better influences which have been at work for the civilization of the Indian. Statistics received at the Indian Bureau show that 30,000 Indians are now engaged in farming, stock-raising, and other civilized pursuits. During the year they raised over 1,373,000 bushels of corn, and other grain and vegetables in proportion. They own 206,000 head of cattle and 1,284,000 sheep. About 22,000 Indians voted at the last election. It is estimated that 30,000 out of the total Indian population of 247,000 are church members. Out of the 247,000, 189,000 are self-supporting, and 35,000 pay taxes.

THE closing scenes of the gathering at the Alliance Camp at Old Orchard were marked by the same sensational features as those of former years. According to custom, the last meeting was devoted to a missionary collection, and all the methods known and believed in by the dwellers at the Alliance Camp were employed. It is estimated that fifteen thousand people were present during the day, one-third being at the special missionary meeting. The sermon on this occasion was the missionary work which the Alliance is engaged in throughout the world; and then direct appeals were made for contributions, and over $60,000 was pledged. As these people do not belong to the wealthy class, what is the secret of their success? The leaders who make the appeal in the first place really believe in the work, and give themselves to it with singleness of purpose. Their enthusiasm reaches the height of fanaticism. Their language is, "We come, dear brothers and sisters, to the missionary offering which we believe God will bless." "I cannot," says Dr. Simpson, "claim a foot of land on earth except a grave. My only property is the publishing of religious works, which have not paid expenses. All I can claim my own is the love of Christ. But I want to give something to-day for this missionary cause; and I am going to promise a certain sum, and trust God will give me strength and opportunity to fulfil that pledge before another summer." Starting with the pledges to raise $10,500, the Alliance leader began his appeal, after a silent prayer. Others followed. One man said: "I have prospered in my business, and I have resolved to lay several pieces of property at the feet of my Master. This property is really worth $10,000, but by a forced sale it will only realize $7,500." Then, with singing, prayer, and exhortation, the work went on, with small and large sums promised, until at the close $60,000 was pledged. Now, criticize as we may this outburst of enthusiasm, the motive which guided these disciples was unselfish. The gift was an offering on the altar of Christ.

THE massacre of the missionaries in China is a very engrossing topic in the East. At Shanghai there has been an indignation meeting to protest against the feeble action of the British government. But the trouble is that there is no real Chinese power with which to deal. The officials may promise; but, as affairs are largely in the control of the mob, even when promises are made by the Pekin government, there is no certainty that they will be carried out. Society in a large part of China is in a demoralized condition, and the anti-foreign feeling has reached a stage in many districts which it is difficult to control. It is thought that the best course is a joint action between Great Britain and this country. But, to prevent the repetition of these massacres, it seems that the only effectual remedy will be found in a joint protectorate. Such is the sensitiveness on the part of other powers that this is not easy to do. One thing is clear,—that China has become the "sick man"; and, if the present condition of affairs is allowed to go on, it must end in a breaking up of the nation. Russia is watching with an open eye; and her present friendly dealings with China has for its object the annexation of Chinese territory and the heading off of Japan in her ambitious aspirations. So complicated are the questions at issue that both the governments of Great Britain and the United States have to move with deliberation, and the friends of the outraged missionaries must take into account the difficulties which surround the whole affair.

THE race war has taken on a new phase in Illinois. In this case it is intensified by the addition of the labor question. The mine-owners, finding the colored laborers more quiet and reliable than the Italians, have employed them in considerable numbers. This has enraged the Italians, who are comparatively new-comers, ignorant, and without an acquaintance with our ways and institutions. Moreover, they were full of fight, and only waiting for an excuse to pounce on the colored laborers. A plausible opportunity soon presented itself. An Italian was waylaid by four Negroes and badly injured. This so excited the Italians that a mob of three hundred made a fierce assault on the homes of the Negroes, dragged the men out, and made them targets for rifles and small arms. "The women," we are told, "were insulted, and, while begging for mercy, were shot down and fatally injured." This case has serious aspects. The rioters, in their attempt to drive out the colored laborers, struck at one of the fundamental rights of the American citizen; and the outrages are all the more inexcusable because those who committed them were recent comers. The authorities of Illinois should bring the offenders to justice, so that they may be taught that this is a country where the laws must be obeyed, and, if they are violated, the penalties are sure and complete. Unless this mob spirit is crushed out, we shall drift into anarchy.

THE Convention of the Catholic Union last week in New York City proved, as we predicted in our last issue, to be one of the most memorable temperance gatherings which have ever taken place in this country. It made known that the religious force of this powerful Christian body is openly and aggressively arraigned against the liquor saloon and liquor-selling on Sunday. Some of the meetings had a very marked dramatic interest, especially that one in which a Tammany State Senator and Commissioner Roosevelt were speakers. Senator O'Sullivan hoped to carry his audience with him as he advocated the non-observance of the excise law. But his attempt was a signal failure. The opposition shown to his sentiments was so strong that the presiding officer was obliged to interfere to keep the peace. But, when Mr. Roosevelt came forward, the audience received him with enthusiasm; and during his speech his pointed and pungent words were received with uproarious applause. Then, again, when some of the priests, with the fire and fervor of the old Hebrew prophets, denounced the saloon and liquor-selling, and with fervid eloquence portrayed the suffering and woe caused by drunkenness, the feelings of the audience were aroused to the highest pitch of intensity. The convention toward its close passed a series of resolutions which pledged the Church to greater fidelity, and outlined many methods by which temperance may be carried forward. These resolutions mean far more than those of a like character passed by Protestants, because they have back of them the power of the Church and a purpose which rests on the sanction and inspiration of religious authority. But, great as will be the abiding influence of this "Silver Jubilee," its immediate political importance, especially on the coming contest in New York to repeal the excise laws, will be very great. It was evident that in this meeting Tammany could not count on any help, but rather determined and aggressive opposition. The eyes of many politicians were opened to see the power and meaning of this uprising in the Roman Catholic Church.

RELIGIOUS OUTLOOK IN AMERICA.

IT is often a good thing to see ourselves as others see us, for in this way we get glimpses of truth which we alone are not able to discover. We have a case in point in the address of Dr. Bradford in Birmingham, and reported in the Christian World, which contains the impressions of a candid and able observer. While in this country, he was very careful to study our religious outlook. The first thing that impressed him was the difference in the position of the Episcopal Church in the two countries. In England the Establishment overshadows all other religious communions, while in the United States the Episcopalian is one of the smaller religious bodies. Moreover, the religious problems in the States is very different from those in England, because of the heterogeneous quality of the population, where cities are made up of people from every European nation as well as from Asia, Africa, and the islands of the sea. Mission work "is complicated by this composite population; and often the missionary must speak several languages, or there must be several distinct workers. All varieties of the Christian Church and many forms of pagan religion are to be found in many American towns." There are three great movements "in the religious world which are of international importance and interest. In theology there is at present what, to many, seems almost a crisis. The critical wave has reached America, and is severely straining those churches which have the stronger forms of polity. The Baptist and Congregational are suffering little, the Episcopalian very much, and the Presbyterian most of all. Just now the contention is concerning the 'Higher Criticism.' Already Prof. C. A. Briggs of Union Seminary in New York and Prof. Smith of Lane Seminary in Ohio, two of the noblest and ablest men in the Presbyterian fellowship, are under suspension. This movement will soon, in all probability, reach the Methodist Church, although as yet it is comparatively undisturbed. But it must not be supposed that this agitation indicates any real drifting. On the other hand, the American churches were never more loyal to the central doctrines of the Christian revelation than they are now; and the consecration of all the people, especially the progressive party, to mission and social reform, is conspicuous and inspiring.

"Concerning the reunion of Christendom Dr. Bradford said that not much was being done, although most of the churches have committees on the subject. But the committees do little except report progress. At one time there was proposed a congress of the denominations, but nothing came of it. Now the most prominent movement is the 'New League of Catholic Unity,' in which many eminent ministers and laymen of various denominations unite in advising the consideration of the 'Chicago-Lambeth Articles' as a possible basis of unity. The non-Episcopalian members of that league do not, as a whole, agree in adopting the historic Episcopate; but, recognizing the 'Lambeth Articles' as something positive and constructive, they advise their study as a starting-point for a fuller consideration of the subject. Meanwhile there is silently but steadily growing a spirit of unity and brotherhood unknown in the past; and that seems probable as a matter of growth which would be impossible as a mechanical contrivance.

"The most remarkable religious movement in the United States since the freeing of the slaves Dr. Bradford believed to be the revival of municipal righteousness, which has had as its great prophet Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst of New York, and almost equally prominent Dr. Newman Smyth of New Haven. This is a wonderful spiritual uprising; and under its influence the better classes of people have been taught that they are numerous enough to rule, that they can rule, and now they are in the positions of power all over the land. No man of modern times has been more heroic and prophetic, more constant and courageous, than Dr. Parkhurst, and to him more than to any other is due honor for the achievement of the mighty social and political revolution, which is without a parallel in American history. It must always be remembered that this has been a religious revival, that it has been led by ministers, and that its home has been the Christian Church.

"The outlook is full of encouragement, although in the growth of the commercial spirit, in the secularization of almost all life, in tendencies toward materialism, which are numerous and strong, there are many forces which are unfavorable. On the whole, those who believe in righteousness and the kingdom of God have great reason to rejoice." The speaker closed with an earnest plea for unity and harmony between English and American Christians, because to them more than to all others are committed the honor and responsibility of leading in the great work of the world's redemption. "At last, when the battle is fought and the victory won, these two great nations should be able to clasp hands as Wellington and Blucher did after Waterloo, and together rejoice in the triumph achieved; while, with all the hosts of the redeemed, they cast their crowns at His feet in whose name they have prayed and fought, sacrificed and died."

SENATOR HOAR'S REPLY.

The recent reply of Senator Hoar to two letters of criticism sent him by Mr. T. C. Evans is a valuable contribution to the discussion relating to the Roman Catholics and our common schools. He, in the first place, denies having said, as has been charged against him, that he was in favor of the confessional, or that he wanted to see something in our Protestant churches like the confessor in the Catholic. He brands the whole thing as "a miserable lie,—an invention made out of whole cloth." Those who know the senior senator of Massachusetts need not be told that he is a believer in the principles of the New England Puritans, and that no man in Massachusetts has more at heart the welfare and perpetuity of our system of free common schools than he. The point of disagreement between him and his opponents is that of method. He thinks Mr. Evans's method, by massing together the Catholic voters, would overthrow the common-school system. He would be just and conciliatory to the Roman Catholics:—

When O'Neil, the young Catholic soldier of Worcester, lay dying, he said: "Write to my dear mother, and tell her I die for my country. I wish I had two lives to give. Let the Union flag be wrapped about me, and a fold of it laid under my head." I feel proud that God gave me such a man to be my countryman and townsman. I have very little respect for the Americanism that is not moved and stirred by such a story. If O'Neil had left a daughter who had her father's spirit, I would be willing to trust my child or grandchild to her instruction in secular education in the public school, even if the father had kissed with his last breath the cross on which the Saviour died, or even if the parting soul had received comfort from the lips of Thomas Conaty or John Power or John Ireland or Archbishop Williams.

He also says he likes John Boyle O'Reilly, the Catholic poet, when he sang the praises of the Pilgrims at Plymouth in that noblest of odes: "If I understand your former letter, you don't want a man who differs from you saying or thinking such things. I want the whole 700,000 Catholics of Massachusetts to believe what John Boyle O'Reilly believed, and to love and reverence the Puritan founders of Massachusetts as he did; and I think my way is the way to make them do it. You do not, if I understand you. You think the way to make good citizens and good men of them and to attach them to Protestantism is to exclude them, their sons and daughters, from all public employment, and to go yourself into a dark cellar and curse at them through the gratings of the windows."

Passing to a statement of his religious faith, Mr. Hoar refers to his address at the Unitarian National Conference. Though it failed to do justice to his own heart,—and he is aware of its own imperfections,—yet he adds: "I may be permitted to say that, within a few weeks after it was delivered, an eminent Catholic clergyman sent me a message, expressing his delight in it. The most famous Episcopal bishop in the country said to a friend of mine that he had read it with great pleasure, and that it sounded to him like the old times. A Baptist minister, bearing one of the most distinguished names in the country, wrote me a letter in which he said, as he read it, 'At every sentence I said to myself, "Amen, Amen."'" An eminent orthodox minister, doctor of divinity, read it aloud to his parish in full, instead of his Sunday's sermon. And a very excellent and able Methodist minister wrote to me, and said, 'If that is Unitarianism, I am afraid I am a Unitarian.' I think the time has come to throw down the walls between Christians, and not to build new ones. I think the time has come to inculcate harmony and good-will between all American citizens, especially between all citizens of the old commonwealth of Massachusetts."

The letter thus sums up the matter:—

I have no pride of opinion. I shall be very glad to revise any opinion of mine; and, as you state it, I shall be very glad to "know better in the future," if you will kindly enlighten me.

You and I, as I have said, have the same object at heart. We desire, above all things, the maintenance of the principles of civil and religious liberty, and, above all other instrumentalities to that end, the maintenance of our common-school system, at the public charge, open to all the children, and free from partisan or sectarian control. If you and I differ, it is only as to what is the best means of accomplishing these ends. If you think that they are best accomplished by secret societies, by hiding from the face of day, by men who will not acknowledge what they are doing, and by refusing public employment to men and women who think on these subjects exactly as we do, but whose religious faith differs from ours, then I do not agree with you. I think your method will result in driving and compacting together, in solid mass, persons who will soon number nearly or quite fifty per cent. of the voting population of Massachusetts. Nothing strengthens men, nothing makes them so hard to hear reason, nothing so drives them to extremity in opinion or in action as persecution or proscription.

On the other hand, my method is the method of absolute freedom and of pure reason. The Catholic boy, who has grown up in our common schools, who has formed his youthful friendships with his Protestant classmates, whose daughter or sister, as he grows older, is employed as a teacher, will very soon be as attached to our common-school system as we are ourselves. He will be required, as he gets property, to pay his share for its support. He cannot ask to be exempt from a tax to which all Protestants cheerfully submit, whether their own children be in the schools or not; and he will not easily be made to give his consent to paying twice. The American spirit, the spirit of the age, the spirit of liberty, the spirit of equality, especially what Roger Williams called "soul liberty," is able to maintain herself in a fair field and in a free contest against all comers. Do not compel her to fight in a cellar. Do not compel her to breathe the damp malarial atmosphere of dark places. Especially let no member of the Republican party, the last child of freedom, lend his aid to such an effort. The atmosphere of the republic is the air of the mountain top and the sunlight of the open field. Her emblem is the eagle, and not the bat.

Musings.

I HAVE mused sometimes on what might have been the royal splendor of France in its imperial days. Going to Versailles, one may see in its grand palace and sumptuous halls, hung with battle pictures, a survival of that magnificence and luxury which gave royalty an external glory. One can imagine what might have been the feelings of Franklin in leaving the severe frugality of his republican and Quaker associations to come to this splendid court, and we know how well he maintained himself and his cause. If it was interesting to visit this historic place, as I did a few days ago, to see the grandeur which still survives and imagine that which has passed away, to watch the wonderful fountains playing to admiring crowds, and walk through the famous galleries, I have found it still more interesting to see something of the life, hospitality, and elegance of the French republic as it is to-day. It has been my interesting privilege, as an official delegate from the United States to the International Prison Congress, to be a guest of the French government. That privilege has been something more than a nominal and perfunctory one. The French government, in acting as host, did nothing by halves: it almost overwhelmed us by the dignity and brilliancy which it infused into the lavish hospitality of its welcome. Its official receptions, dinners, and entertainments, which have given great éclat to the Congress, have been marked by an elegance and generous expenditure which recalled the days of imperial grandeur. One feels that, if the republic does not wear the old clothes of imperialism, it has a raiment which is as brilliant, if not quite as gaudy, as that which it has discarded. In talking with the president of the Bar Association of Paris, by whose side it was my privilege to sit at an elaborate dinner, he said to me that republicanism was certainly well established in France, but that they were still a little too fond of imitating the pomp and grandeur of monarchical days. But it was certainly very interesting and delightful to be included in a hospitality which was as genuine as it was generous.

THE round of civic and national hospitality was begun by a reception to the delegates given by the President of the republic, Monsieur Félix Faure, at his official residence, the Palace in the Champs des Elysées. This soirée formed a brilliant introduction to those that followed. The ushers and officials in uniform and, most of all, the long line of dragoons, with their horse-hair plumes, "standing attention" and forming a martial balustrade on each side of the staircase, were a reminder that France still fosters the military spirit and preserves some of the gorgeous dye of the old imperialism. There were a few military guests; but the delegates, numbering, including the French members, several hundred, made the prevailing aspect of the gathering wholly civic. Black dress coats and white cravats were sometimes varied a little by the decorations worn by some of the foreign delegates. Apparently, the wholly indispensable element of uniform was the white cravat. A delegate who happened to come from a city where black cravats are now used in evening dress was stopped by an usher, and kindly informed that white ties were essential; and, undoubtedly, he would have felt a little awkward to have found himself the only man distinguished by a black tie in a gathering of several hundred. As he had come unprepared for this emergency, the usher kindly offered to procure him one. On the other hand, an Episcopal clergyman, wearing his professional uniform, and two or three Catholic priests in their robes, passed in unchallenged. At another reception during the week, given by one of the Ministers of State, a Quaker delegate found his black tie and simple black suit no barrier to admission. There was no speech-making at this opening soirée. That was reserved for the formal opening of the Congress the next day, in which the President of the republic made a suitable and impressive address. At the reception the only formality was the presentation of each delegate to the President and his wife. Monsieur Faure, a man dignified and imposing in appearance and character, bears easily and gracefully the honors of his office. This palace is not as old as the one destroyed at Versailles; but in the ancient tapestry and the elegant decorations there is a suggestion of the earlier days of royalty from which France has now, let us hope, forever emerged.

THE next afternoon (Sunday) occurred the formal opening of the Congress in the great amphitheatre of the Sorbonne, and in the evening a dinner offered by the Committee of Organization to the foreign delegates at the Hotel Continental, which was followed by a reception to the French members at ten o'clock. At this dinner all departments of the French government were represented by distinguished officials. Monsieur Georges Leygues, minister of the interior, presided; and at his right sat Mr. Eustace, the ambassador of the United States, who is now chief of the diplomatic corps, and whose constant pride is that he may attend all public gatherings without wearing a decoration. Then there was Mr. Galkine-Wraskoy, the general administrator of prisons in Russia, and on the left the Italian minister, Berenger, distinguished in French law; and opposite sat the minister of justice and Jules Simon, M. Chaumetemps, minister of the colonies, and through the great hall were many other men of distinguished position. On this occasion, as indeed on most others, the speeches were short and few, and were confined to a welcome extended by the minister of the interior and a response by M. Galkine-Wraskoy, the head of the Russian delegation. Then on the following Wednesday there were excursions to Melun, a dinner at Fontainebleau, a visit to the different monuments in Paris, and excursion to Sèvres and St. Cloud. On the evening of the 4th of July a banquet was given in the Eiffel Tower by the Société Générale des Prisons of Paris, which I had the honor of attending. Then there was a visit to Nanterre and Montesson, with a breakfast at St. Germain, which I was obliged to forego, and another excursion on Sunday, which included some prison-visiting. On Sunday evening M. Leygues, the minister of the interior, gave a reception to all the members of the Congress at his official residence, which is likewise palatial in character, where the large body of delegates could stroll through the gardens, listen to the delightful music of the Garde Républicain, to some comic renderings by Coquelin and others from the Comédie Française, and to some fine singing. The largest and most brilliant gathering was perhaps the dinner offered to the delegates by the city of Paris, given at the Hôtel de Ville, one of the grandest banqueting halls on the Continent. Here I had the privilege of sitting next to the vice-president of the Senate, and of exchanging views upon the characteristic features of French and American republicanism. The dinner was followed by a reception, with comedy and singing and instrumental music. I will not say how many times through the week I heard the "Marseillaise" played when the President of the French republic was toasted, and how stirring was this grandest of national airs when rendered by the finest of French bands. An eminent musical friend of mine has said that no great national air has ever been written without a bit of minor in it. Certainly, the minor in the "Marseillaise" is one of the most effective and beautiful strains, recalling, as it does, the tragedies of blood and pain through which France has passed. I have by no means catalogued all the entertainments and invitations which were crowded upon the delegates, including garden parties, receptions, and other courtesies. It would require a strong constitution to stand them all. There was a suspicion that the French government might be planning to kill us with kindness. But these occasions furnished the delegates with greater opportunities of mingling together and exchanging views and obtaining information. Of the general work of the conference I must speak elsewhere and at another time; but I know that the American delegates will join me in returning thanks for the official and personal hospitality which was extended to them and their associates from all parts of the globe.

Brevities.

Rev. Samuel J. Barrows arrived at Quebec on Sunday, and is now in camp at Georgeville. He will reach Boston about the 20th, and is refreshed by his European trip.

Our readers will rejoice to learn that Rev. Charles G. Ames had a pleasant voyage, and was able to be at every meal. On his arrival he was much better than when he started.

The latest telegram says that the sultan of Turkey is firmly resolved not to admit the principle of foreign control in Armenian reforms. If this be true, and he still persists in not moving, the powers will have to give him a dose of coercion.

We trust that all of our readers will give special attention to the comprehensive statement of Unitarianism to be found in this issue, which was made in consequences of charges against the Japan mission. In addition, they should not pass by Mr. MacCauley's report of the Senshin Commencement.

Bishop Potter has enjoyed very much his month in the New York City slums. "The experience," he says, "has been fruitful of new and varied impressions of life. It has opened to me a vista of wonderful possibilities in the cause of the gospel. I must say that it is with a sense of regret that I relinquish the trust imposed on me in this attractive field of labor."

Rev. Mr. Conway has made a report to the Anti-lynching Committee. He says the visit of Miss Ida Wells to England and the formation of the Anti-lynching Committee have had a good effect in America. At first only a few newspapers at the North took any notice of these cruelties. He commends the Boston Transcript and a few others in the Northern cities for their interest, and says the services of the Christian Register have been beyond all praise. In some parts of the South the crime has disappeared. There is a good deal of feeling in the section averse to the atrocities, much of it being latent. "It is not improbable," he adds, "that some great protest will presently arise in that region, where the millions of respectable people are disgraced by the few thousands of ruffians who hunt and murder Negroes, and who are countenanced by a few political demagogues in the mob-ridden localities."

Dr. Martineau's American friends will be interested to learn that there is a "process" copy of a drawing by Mr. Theodore Blake Wigman. The London Inquirer says the portrait, in spite of the extreme difficulties in the way of a completely satisfactory likeness, possesses a very high degree of merit. "The figure, which is clothed in a dressing-gown closely buttoned, is three-quarter length. The face is slightly turned to the right. The upper part of the face is excellent, though in our copy we miss the luminousness of the eyes, which probably belongs to the original drawing, and is certainly a feature of the illustrious subject. The mouth and chin, though more successfully rendered than in several sketches we have seen, form the least satisfactory part of the portrait. Taken as a whole, however, the artist's work will be accepted gratefully by the many admirers of Dr. Martineau." For the benefit of our readers who may desire a copy we would add that it can be had in cabinet size and on large boards at Essex Hall, London.

Pro and Con.

THE JAPAN MISSION.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The Universalist of August 3 contains a letter from Rev. Edgar Leavitt concerning the work of the Universalist mission in Japan. One paragraph concerning the Unitarian mission in Japan is so evidently the result of a misunderstanding that I wish, before it could be possible for Mr. MacCauley to defend himself, to say that to his friends in America it is incredible that he should have used the language attributed to him. There has come to hand through the Japan Mail a translation of the letter by Mr. MacCauley, which is probably the article referred to by Mr. Leavitt. Mr. Leavitt's language is:—

Our Unitarian brethren have declared their position as simply promoting free thought on religious subjects. One need not be a Christian in order to be a Unitarian. One may be a Christian, or he may be a Buddhist, or he may be neither, only provided he is a free thinker. Some of the teachings of Jesus, of Buddha, of Confucius, are wrong and harmful to the moral and spiritual development of the Japanese people; and we will do all we can to drive them from the land (so says a late issue of Shukyo, the Unitarian magazine). In the same article it is declared that they oppose no one's opinions nor pronounce them wrong nor heathenish nor heretical, but would freely learn from all, and that they themselves profess no fixed principles.

If you have space to print Mr. Leavitt's charge, together with Mr. MacCauley's letter, which, if not the original upon which the charge is based, is certainly an authoritative statement of Mr. MacCauley's position, you will much oblige the friends and supporters of our mission to Japan.

GEORGE BATCHELOR,
Sec'y A. U. A.

UNITARIANISM DEFINED.

My dear Mr. Nakanishi,—I have not had time since the receipt of your letter of the 2d inst. to give it the attention it deserves. But to-day I shall try to answer at least its main question. This question has been answered by me many times during the past five years, and always essentially in the same manner. For some reason, however, I do not seem to have made my meaning perfectly clear. Whether the fault is in me or is in the minds of the persons I have addressed, I do not know. But it is evident that what I have intended should be understood is not yet understood either by yourself or by many who show a good deal of interest in the Unitarian movement in Japan. I shall therefore try once more to make my meaning plain.

First, Unitarianism is a religious movement whose history shows it conclusively to be directed by three principles:—

1. Free thought in the investigation of religious problems.
2. The supremacy of the human reason in deciding truth or error in religious doctrine.
3. Moral character and work as testing the worth of men, and as being the ultimate basis of church or associated religious fellowship.

Now, my dear Mr. Nakanishi, if you and your friends would accept this statement, and then never forget it in your inquiries about Unitarianism, your present misunderstanding could not occur. The three principles above stated are supreme. They govern everything else that may have place under the name "Unitarian." Their logical conclusions also are always accepted by Unitarians as soon as such conclusions are made known.

Next, then, never putting out of mind these three fundamental principles, which may be called the "Unitarian standard," we should remember that under this standard the Unitarian churches, or Church, has naturally occupied many positions, and made many changes; and we should know that these variations are to be substantially repeated in the future. As long as men think, and think freely, their minds will change and grow with human knowledge and progress. The Roman Catholic Church boasts that it never changes. Why? Because it claims for itself that it is a perfect divine institution established in this world by God himself. The orthodox Protestant Church subjects all its development to what it claims is a perfect divine revelation,—the Bible. But the Unitarians have always refused to submit their minds to either the Church of Rome or to the Bible of Protestantism as such. Their authority has been, and is to be, the enlightened reason.

At this point we are brought to consider Unitarianism as having part in Christian history. It is a fact that Unitarianism had its origin within Christianity. It is also a fact that most Unitarians at the present day are Christians,—in this sense, that they accept the religion which Jesus Christ taught, believed, and practised as the highest form of religion by which they can direct their own lives. But it is further a fact that Unitarianism has never had a fixed Christian theology. It has again and again been modified by deeper and larger conceptions of Christianity. The early Unitarians were as different in their notions about Christianity from the Unitarians of the present time as present Unitarians are different from orthodox Christians. From generation to generation Unitarians have changed in their conceptions of Christianity until now their National Conference in America, by a unanimous vote given last year, stands upon this platform:—

"The Unitarian churches accept the religion of Jesus, holding, in accordance with his teaching, that practical religion is summed up in love to God and to man."

But notice, also, that this Christian position is the result of the steady growth of Unitarianism in Christian countries, and as a part of Christianity. Unitarianism is not necessarily confined to Christianity, nor do Unitarian Christians shut up their religious fellowship to those only who are professed Christians. Unitarianism does not belong exclusively to any one form of religion, be it Christianity, Buddhism, Mohammedanism, or any other historical faith. The American Unitarian Christians last year, at the same time they adopted the conception of Christianity above given, adopted also unanimously the following declaration:—

"This Conference recognizes the fact that its constituency is Congregational in tradition and polity. Therefore, it declares that nothing in this constitution is to be construed as an authoritative test; and we cordially invite to our working fellowship any who, while differing from us in belief, are in general sympathy with our spirit and our practical aims."

"Unitarianism," as the word is understood in religion, has therefore become a world-wide movement, even although its birth and growth have taken place in Christendom and as part of Christianity.

Now, you can see that, when Unitarianism is carried outside of what is called Christendom, or Europe and America, and is brought into a non-Christian country like Japan, its relations to the religious and to the general life of such a country, are above everything else, those which arise from its fundamental principles and methods,—that is, from its threefold standard spoken of at the beginning of my letter. The personal faith or definite creed of any Unitarian representative or teacher is therefore a secondary matter, and is not to be considered authoritative in the counsel or aid he may give to those who may wish to associate themselves together for Unitarian faith and work.

So, then, Unitarianism in being brought to Japan must not be thought of as hostile to any form of religion in Japan, as such. If, for example, a Buddhist is a free and impartial investigator of religious problems, if he is sincerely willing to submit his faith to the authority of philosophy and science, and if he puts character or moral excellence before everything else as the test of manhood, then he and any true Unitarian can be intellectual friends, even though they differ very widely in other special conclusions. And, if any Buddhist is sincerely desiring to help to make men better and happier by bringing them under the law of justice and love, then such Buddhist can work hand in hand as a religious brother with any true Unitarian. Of course, a bigoted Buddhist and a free Unitarian can no more study together and work together than can a bigoted Christian and a free Unitarian. But free Buddhists and free Unitarians can and ought to be brothers in principle and in work, even though the Unitarians may find in Jesus Christ their own teacher and guide. No true Unitarian would find fault with a Buddhist for his love of Sakya-Muni as teacher of holy thought and living; and, likewise, no true Buddhist should find fault with a Unitarian who may also be a follower of Jesus Christ. The Unitarian principle requires a genuine catholicity of religious sympathy and the largest toleration in matters of intellectual speculation. The Unitarian is, in fact, opposed only to intellectual slavery, bigotry, falsehood, and vice.

I hope that I have now answered your question. If you understand my answer as I mean it to be understood, you will see that there is no obstacle set up by Unitarianism itself to your co-operation with me or with any other representative of Unitarianism who is true to his principles. I understand that a writer in Bukkyo has lately found fault with Unitarianism because there are Unitarian workers in Japan whose beliefs differ from one another. I suppose that this writer considers that, when men differ in belief, they should separate and form their own parties. Japan is a country of parties, I know. It seems to be difficult for your countrymen "to agree to disagree." But the Unitarian aim is to recognize as far as possible the right of every man to his own opinions in matters of speculation, and to try to find a bond of sympathy and co-operation in universally acknowledged truth and goodness. Unitarianism is therefore not the agent of a tyrannical partisanship in small things: it is the guide of those who ignore petty partisanship for the sake of a free, all-inclusive service to the largest welfare of mankind. Unitarianism has often been reproached as being "mere morality." Unitarians hold this reproach to be the highest kind of praise. They do not neglect the search for truth, of course; but they hold that truth has its highest value in making mankind better, nobler, purer, happier.

In a word, then, I am bold enough to claim that, among the religious movements in the world, the freest, most progressive, most tolerant, most inclusive of all, is Unitarianism. It is marked by method rather than dogma. It is as varied as nature or the human mind is varied. It is as united as the hunger for truth or the need of moral excellence can unite men. Every Unitarian has his own faith, and this faith is usually very strong and clear. I have my own definite creed on all the problems of theology and ethics. All Unitarians are pretty well agreed in their disbelief in so-called Roman Catholic and orthodox Protestant creeds concerning the trinity, the Deity of Christ, the Bible, salvation, and human destiny, even though they differ in the emphasis they put on their denials of various parts of these creeds. All Unitarians believe in a universal spiritual endeavor on the part of mankind, in the worth of religion under all its forms in all nations, in a growing manifestation of the faith which underlies all historical expressions of faith, in the duty and the privilege of the disciples of all forms of religion to rise to a common level on which by enlightened reason they may find at last an intellectual as well as moral basis of harmony and co-operation. I hold that this sublime conviction was justified by Christ himself. You may hold that it was justified by the Buddha himself. Each of us can cherish his conviction without any break in sympathy. It involves no antagonism. Jesus and Sakya, I believe, would have found no reason for separation from each other. They would have gone hand in hand to feed the hungry, to comfort the sorrowing, and to fill mankind with love and peace. It is foolishness, it is even a crime against the human soul, for the followers of Jesus and Sakya to separate from each other as enemies, or even as strangers.

Unitarianism has not come to Japan to destroy, but to fulfil. I am not here to reproduce in Japan the Unitarian Church of America, except in its spirit. Unitarianism is here to set men free, or rather to help the free minds of Japan to set all minds free in spirit, and to hasten the coming in the world, as far as may be, of the sublime empire of love and righteousness which will at last make of humanity a true brotherhood under the care of the infinite and eternal God, our Father.

I am, with sincere respect, yours always,
CLAY MACCAULEY.

THE FLOATING HOSPITAL.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Among the many noble charities of Boston there is probably none that makes a stronger appeal to people of all ages and stations in life than this, which provides free rides in the harbor for sick babies. Those of us who have watched the color coming back into an infant's pale face as the result of such a trip must feel that by such a charity many burdens are lightened, many anxious hearts comforted, and, in all probability, many a child's life saved. It is with the purpose of calling attention to this work, and especially of pointing out how even a small gift may be of use, that I wish you would print the following letters. Such a charity as this ought to have a special interest for children in our prosperous families.

A FRIEND OF THE FLOATING HOSPITAL.

My dear Mr. Tobey,—I was one of the many children that went to the lovely play of "Cinderella" given for the benefit of the Floating Hospital; and, while there, I bought one of the programmes. A short time ago, while I was ill, I earned 15 cents by making two yards of lace and darning a pair of stockings. I was going to buy a pair of side-combs, when I happened to read the account of the trips in Boston Harbor for the poor sick babies. So I send my 15 cents in stamps, hoping that it may make some poor child happy. My father used to be a minister of Boston before he came to Meadville, so that I am interested in the poor children of Boston. I am sorry to send so small an amount. But it is the dimes and nickels that make the dollars. I am eleven years old.

Yours truly,
RUTH I. LAWRENCE.

Meadville, Pa., May 15.

MISS RUTH I. LAWRENCE:

My dear little Friend,—I hope I shall receive this summer a great many letters from friends of the Floating Hospital, and many large contributions. I should like you to feel sure that none of them will mean more to me than your gift, for none of them will tell me of so much as yours. I have a little girl of my own, scarcely able to talk as yet; but I am sure that I shall want her to be just such a girl as you must be,—a good daughter, with a tender, loving heart for those who suffer.

There are lots of things that dimes and nickels make besides dollars. Yours have made a man who is very, very busy happy; and they will help to make some poor little sick baby well, and its mother happy, too. May God bless you; and, should you come to Boston again, I shall certainly want to see you.

Sincerely,

RUFUS B. TOBEY.
Berkeley Temple, Boston, May 22.

For the Christian Register.

SONNET

TO MISS ELIZABETH P. CHANNING.

BY REV. HENRY G. SPAULDING.

"And I could wish my days to be bound each
To each by natural piety." Sang thus Great Wordsworth, voicing in his noble speech
The aim that makes our life victorious.
But you have lived the poem; for your days
Have flowed together like some tuneful song,
One sweet, melodious hymn of faith and praise
And deeds of love to win the world from wrong.
This one thing have you done and yet rejoice
To do. For this let love and friendship weave
Their choicest garlands now, pleased that the voice
First heard at morn is still obeyed at eve.
My joy it is that I your life have seen,
Have known how fair it is, how fair has been.

BACKSLIDING IN SWITZERLAND.

[EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.]

"The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways"; and so I have been literally backsliding down the side of a Swiss mountain, and that mountain a slope of the Matterhorn. I have always thought that the time to coast or to have a toboggan-slide would be in the middle of July. Then the sun is warm: there is no danger of freezing your nose or your toes, and the only difficulty is in having the snow present in sufficient quantities. To-day my dream has been fulfilled. There was plenty of snow and plenty of hot weather. The toboggan was simply a Swiss alpenstock; and, if the reader had looked at the right time, he would have found the writer lying flat on his back on the mountain side, with the alpenstock plunged into the snow above his head. It was a situation of suspense for the writer and the guide beneath who was watching the descent. There was no trouble about getting down to the rocks below: the only trouble was in the landing in the proper shape.

I had been dissipating in Paris, yielding to the lavish civic, official, and personal hospitality extended to the members of the International Prison Congress. After such a round of dissipation an expiatory pilgrimage to the Swiss mountains seemed to be a personal necessity. The goddess to whose shrine the pilgrimage was made was Athene Hygea. So I found myself in the Valley of Zermatt one Sunday morning in the middle of July, with staff in hand, a pack on my back, and a modern suit of knickers on my legs. It was a glorious day, gloriously bright and gloriously hot. Not a Sunday has passed since landing in Europe that I have not attended church once, twice, or three times during the day. I had prepared myself for this pilgrimage by attending the song service in the English church Saturday night. But English churches on the Continent are not open very early Sunday morning. I did not wish to be arrested for burglary by forcing an entrance; and so I became Catholic, and stood for a minute in front of the Catholic church with my hat off, for at this early hour the church was too full to accommodate worshippers who were crowded into the little street. We must at least give credit to Catholicism for rising a little earlier than Protestantism on Sunday mornings.

My pilgrimage was undertaken alone. Neither Coriander nor Mizippi was yet ready for it; and Mavila had fled to Scotland. So I started on my solitary and yet not lonely way toward the Schwarzersee. The road winds up from the Zermatt Valley, crosses the Zmutbach by a little bridge, and then passes up through a pine grove from which one has a pleasing view of the Zmutt Valley. A little shed here tempts to refreshments; and the young Swiss who was waiting for customers joined me in a glass of lemonade, and was a little amused that I called my tramp a Pilgerfahrt. Ascending through this wood of pines and larches, you emerged into an open space, giving a fine view of the Gorner glacier. You hear below the ceaseless roar of the waters of the gorge, which rush with tremendous energy through the great rocks which hold them in their courses. Then the Breithorn looms roably into view. A road to the left leads to the Théodule Pass, but the path I am to follow leads to the right. It is a well-marked, winding bridle-path. One after another the mountains open to view, and prominent among them are Lyksam and Monte Rosa. After a steady three hours' climb the Schwarzersee Hotel is reached. Just below it, to the left as we approach, is the Furgg glacier, looking very dirty, as though it needed a good washing; but there are torrents of water rushing from below it, and streams from the Gorner glacier and the Findeln, uniting to form the Visp, which rolls through the Zermatt Valley to swell the waters of the Rhone. The majority of pilgrims are content to stop at this hotel, but it is no sufficient or worthy shrine for the ambitious mountain worshipper. Away up above, with no bridle-path or foot-way, is the tempting height of the Hörnli,—a spur of the Matterhorn, which rises magnificently above it in all its threatening grandeur. It was my good fortune here to fall in with a young Swiss from Zermatt, who is engaged in the delightful occupation of bottling lemonade during the week, and who had chosen this Sunday for an outing. Born among these hills and mountains, he had climbed this height not for the francs which tempt the professional guide, but for the joy of climbing them. We soon formed a compact to climb the Hörnli together. We passed the Schwarzersee and the little lake with the same name, and then over broken stones through a rugged, pathless way.

We spent an hour in stiff climbing, till at last we were nine thousand three hundred and forty feet above the sea, and the glory of the Lord was unveiled before us. What a magnificent and indescribable temple! How dwarfed and insignificant the little temples made by hand compared with the wonderful architecture of this array of peaks, naves, and transepts! One might say, as the voice came to Moses, "Take the shoes from off thy feet, for the place in which thou standest is holy ground." It is a wonderful panorama which you may get here by simply using your heel for a pivot. There is the Mischabelhörner to the north-east; further to the right the Nadelhorn and the Dome, rising nearly 14,000 feet high. There are the Strahlhorn and the Stockhorn, and further to the right the beautiful Breithorn, whose outlines are softened into delightful curves by the clear white snow that covers them. Just below it lies the Gorner glacier, which winds down like a graceful river, its banks definitely marked by long black lines. Above it and to the left of the Breithorn are the twin mountains (Zwillinge), also called Castor and Pollux. As we face to the south, there is the grandest of all the mountains which tower above the Zermatt,—the mighty, threatening, but not unconquerable Matterhorn. We are just below it. We are standing on one of its feet, or, rather, on one of the shoulders that stretch to the north. How defiantly it seems to rise in the clear sky! A long list of tragedies are the results of the continued ambition to put that mountain under one's feet. As I came up, I passed the little graveyard in the village. There are stones marking the graves of Hadow, Hudson, Lord Francis Douglas, and Croz,—one of their guides,—who, with Mr. Whymper and another guide, made the first ascent of the Matterhorn, but were lost in descending by a fall of four thousand feet toward the Matterhorn glacier. My guide can count up some eighteen to twenty who have been killed or injured in scaling the mountain side. But it is no longer the difficult task it once was. Ropes have been attached to the most inaccessible places, and the ascent is frequently made during the summer by good climbers, among them a fair proportion of women; and one of those who successfully reached the top was a blind girl. "What went she up for to see?" If Farrington would lend me two hundred francs, I might be tempted to make the ascent myself. "They are threatening now," says my friend, "to run an electric road to the top of the Matterhorn." Certainly there are plenty of streams and mountain torrents to furnish the power; but, when they are harnessed up, I am not sure that I should care to go. The Rigi has lost much of its poetry by the prosaic way of reaching the summit. Nevertheless, there are thousands who get the superb view of the whole conclave of peaks who could not get it if they were left to their own feet.

Then, as we turn to the south-west, we see the Dent Blanche and the jagged Rothhorn. It is only a year ago that a guide lost his life in ascending this mountain. Still further to the right is the Gabelhorn, very steep and rugged, and then the majestic Weisshorn, with great masses of snow, and last in the range the Trifhorn. Peacefully lying below is the Zermatt Valley. Here one is in a sanctuary. It is one of Nature's Sabbaths: there is no wind, violent or boisterous, but cool breezes fan the cheek. The roar of many waters comes up from the silent glaciers. These dumb, white rivers make no music: they lie cold and impassive, but beneath them the waters break into boisterous laughter. There are no birds here and no timber; but a little butterfly is flitting about me, and reminding me of the Schmetterling I left in Paris. Like Peter, James, and John, one might fain wish to build a tabernacle on this height. It is wunderlich, says my friend. We take our frugal lunch, write a German verse to the butterfly, and an apostrophe to the same papillon in French, and then prepare for our descent. The guide makes the welcome proposition that, instead of coming back as we had come up, we go down the other side of the Hörnli, and, making our way to the Stapfel Alp below, return to Zermatt that way. We start down over the rocks until we come to fields of snow which lie like white sheets on the mountain side. My guide proposes a Rutschpartei. He takes his alpenstock on the left side, holding it down with the left hand below and the right hand above. Then, sitting down on his "hunkeys," and using the alpenstock as a brake, he swiftly glides down the smooth white snow-field. It looks so easy and so delightful that I attempted to follow in the same way. The motion was extremely exhilarating; but suddenly I found my feet sliding out from under me, and that I was going at a tremendous speed on my back down the mountain. I plunged the alpenstock into the snow at my side, and found myself lying as described at full length on my back, holding to the alpenstock above my head firmly imbedded in the snow. At the foot of the snow-bed the rocks were sharp and threatening: it was only the sturdy alpenstock that saved me from landing in a heap upon them. With a more cautious use of the stick, I succeeded in getting down in safety. Another field was tried with better success, and still another, until finally the guide and myself locked arms, and went down a snow-field together in good shape. Crossing glaciers, unless they are badly crevassed, is tame work compared with the exhilaration of coasting down a steep snow-field with your alpenstock as a toboggan.

Getting below the snow-line, we crossed beautiful fields of mossy green, bedecked with flowers, and, after a rest at the Stapfel Alp, made our way back to Zermatt through delightful groves radiant with rhododendrons and shaded with larch and pine. Though I have visited many cathedrals in Europe, I have had no more worshipful Sunday than this one spent on the side of the Matterhorn, with the glory of the Lord revealed in the munificence of his creation.

It would take many days to exhaust the opportunities of Zermatt for the climber and the seer. Two other trips are pleasantly remembered. One is a visit to the Gorner Gorge, in which Coriander mounted a mule for the first time in her life, and saw some of the mountain peaks between his ears. The throat of the gorge is very narrow in some places. The roar of the water is like a small Niagara reverberating through the rocks. To me it is very interesting to turn from the stiff, frozen glacier to the torrent full of abounding life and motion. Yet there is a motion to the glacier. It is hard to realize that this great river of snow and ice is inch by inch making its way down the valley.

Another delightful trip was to the Gorner Grat, in which Mizippi mounted a little white pony to make her assault on the mountain. The landlady at the hotel was a little surprised when I ordered a horse with a gentleman's saddle, and quite curious when she saw Mizippi's divided skirts. But anybody who has seen women riding male bicycles in Paris ought not to be surprised at a woman riding horseback in bicycle fashion. Nobody has yet invented a side-saddle for a bicycle; and perhaps the modern wheel, if it does not supersede horsemanship altogether, will bring back again the proper fashion of riding for women which prevailed before the foolish side-saddle was introduced in the reign of Queen Anne. The trip to the Gorner Grat is easily made in three stages,—one to the Rife Alp Hotel, through a pleasant, shady way; the second stage to the Rife Berg, where a second hotel furnishes opportunities of rest; while a third stage brings the traveller to the Gorner Grat itself. Here there is a superb view of the mountains, presenting the same panorama, but at a different angle from that seen from the Hörnli. Unfortunately, another hotel building has been placed on the Gorner Grat, so that the view is somewhat cut off; and the observer is compelled to walk around this desecration to see the mountains. The road offers no difficulties to the climber. The main objection I have to it is that it has become the fashionable "thing to do," and that scores of people on horses and mules, and some ignominiously carried up in chairs, make a continuous procession from the valley to the top. A more secluded and delightful path was found in returning by the way of Findeln, giving us a view of that glacier, of the little village bearing the same name, of the gorge into which the glacier melts, and, grandest of all, of the stupendous Matterhorn. On one of its sides a white cloud, like a gull's wing, hung all the afternoon, soft and motionless. The deep shadows against the other mountains, the depth of the gorge, and the sunlight illumining the cloud and the crest of the mountain are pictures which one cannot buy, and which do not fade away like some of the photographs of the stores. S. J. B.

SENSHIN GAKUIN COMMENCEMENT.

BY CLAY MACCAULEY.

The friends of the Japan mission will be pleased to hear that the second commencement exercises of the School for Advanced Learning (Senshin Gakuin), supported by the mission, were a marked success, and did much to show the people of this country the high standard which has been set for the institution. The day was clear and cool (June 19). The beautiful Assembly Hall and anteroom of Yuiitukwan, our headquarters building, were crowded with visitors, many of whom were men of position and name. The essay and oration of the two graduates were really creditable discussions of their themes, "Individualism" and "Japanese Ancestor Worship"; and the commencement address of Mr. Kato, a member of the House of Peers and president of the Imperial University, on "Occidental and Oriental Ethics," was heard with unbroken attention, and has had a good deal of serious notice in the magazines and journals of the country. I have received a letter from the editor of a leading review in Tokyo, which, in translation, is worth repeating here. He writes: "This year, the 28th of Meiji, is the year in which our empire has shown its real power to the world,—in its victory over China, in the joyous welcome given to its returning triumphant troops. During this memorable time Senshin Gakuin has held its second commencement exercises. I was honored with the privilege of being present at these exercises. I cannot refrain from offering to you my congratulations.

"Senshin Gakuin, as I see it, is the most hopeful school in our country, as a leader of religious and scientific thought. While all the country was under great excitement, its professors and students stood firmly and steadily by their work, devoting themselves to the study of profound religious and scientific truth. And now the school has brought forth its second class of graduates. The events of society are the effect of new thought. Also new thought is the effect of social events. The happenings of the past year have affected our people profoundly. Your young men who are now leaving Senshin Gakuin, instructed as they have been in its lecture-rooms, ought to be leaders in our country's new career. The responsibility which rests upon you all is great and heavy. I sincerely hope in your future."

I wish I could reproduce here the three addresses which were given at our commencement. Graduate Iizuka's essay on "Individualism" would be well worth reading at home. After a clear exposition of his theme he subjected it to a closely argued criticism. He insisted that the common welfare is not best furthered by the individual's pursuit of prosperity. Free competition is not a good law for social effort. It is questionable whether freedom is a natural right. The State is not merely a collection of individuals. The State has an end for itself. To this the individual should be subject. Individualism ignores the social organism, and is thereby in conflict with true morality. It does not recognize the inseparable relation of each one to all. Freedom is a limited privilege. Present civilization is largely the effect of individualistic theories. So far much prosperity has followed these modern principles. The inevitable difficulties arising from individualism, however, have at length appeared; and individualism cannot remove them. State socialism must come. This only can solve the social problem and advance the world's higher civilization. Graduate Hasunuma's oration on "Japanese Ancestor Worship" began by a criticism of Herbert Spencer's theory that ancestor worship is the primitive and lowest form of religion. He claimed that ancestor worship as developed in Japan contradicts Mr. Spencer,—that in Japan, at least, it did not originate either in fear or awe. In establishing this claim, Mr. Hasunuma quotes freely from Japanese ancient records, to show that ancestor worship in Japan was but an expansion of filial piety, a tender regard for the dead, which had the semblance of worship. The speaker asserted that this ancient institution had had very beneficial effects upon the Japanese people. There has been unquestionably a close connection between the thousands of years of unbroken imperial succession and the stable State and reverence for parents, dead as well as living. Contrast the miserable dispersion of the Jews, who neglected the Fifth Commandment, with the established empire of Japan. Then what an important place ancestor worship has had in promoting Japan's beautiful virtues of loyalty and filial piety, honor, and social solidarity. Then, if Carlyle's religion of "hero-worship" has any meaning; if an ethical religion is to be preferred to one that is theological; if we are to remember how many philanthropists and martyrs have been supported by our reverence for ancestors,—surely, we cannot degrade our "ancestor worship" to a low level in religious consciousness. The latter part of the oration was historical, showing the various changes and developments of this cult or institution,—how it was influenced by Confucianism, and how even mighty Buddhism, which modified greatly Japanese religion, literature, and art, was compelled to yield to and to be itself shaped by the ancient native reverence for the dead. I shall not attempt to give any notion of Mr. Kato's address. It was a scholarly and eloquent utterance, as all Mr. Kato's public speeches are. He is one of Japan's most cultured and impressive orators, and the important place which Senshin Gakuin has secured in public regard here is shown in large measure by the fact that Mr. Kato honored it by speaking for it on its Commencement Day. I am desirous for special reasons that the home friends of our mission should realize how important this institution, as well as the other departments of our work, have become in the opinion of the Japanese people. On this account I have here noticed some things that ordinarily I should not make note of in a Register letter. The fact is that whatever is thought of Unitarianism as a whole by the people of this country is directed by what is seen of Unitarianism in its work here. The Japanese people are coming to regard Unitarianism with exceptional respect. Our Senshin Gakuin has a great career as a possibility, and from what it has already done much will be expected of it. For this reason the future of the school is fraught with more critical issues than would be true of an institution of less pretension, promise, and achievement. Indeed, the reputation and fate of Unitarianism, as a whole, so far as Japan is concerned, is involved, in the main, in the career of this school. The good name in particular of the American Unitarian churches, under whose sanction the foundations of this work were laid, is bound up with the course the school will take in the future. Let the school go on as it has been going on during the four years in which it has been in existence: it will gain more and more confidence among the people in the real worth of Unitarian principles and organizations. Let the school be made yet stronger and more worthy of its pretensions, and foreign organized Unitarianism will gain thereby in popular goodwill and support. But let anything occur at home by which this work here shall weaken or fail, and, beyond question, Unitarianism as a movement in religion will suffer seriously, and, dependent upon the causes at work, may lose regard wholly among the people who now look upon it with so much hope as a force in the direction of their new life. Much more is involved in the successful development of the work of our Japan mission than the mission itself. During the year past, under the restricted financial condition of the American Unitarian Association, our work here has had to bear its share in the limitations. Very well: all friends in Japan, as well as at home, appreciate and allow for these limitations. It is not of such things I am now speaking. I am speaking of the real sentiment, desire, disposition, spiritual attitude, of the home folk toward the mission. Through patience, perseverance, hard work, a large claim for Unitarianism has been made upon the people of Japan in this mission; and, at length, a desirable place in the confidence of the Japanese people has been gained. Much has been overcome, much has been secured, and now much is expected. Our work hereafter must therefore be done well, if done. Better than it has been done we must do it: worse should not be allowed. And failure would mean not merely the ruin of our local gains and reputation; but, if a failure were caused by a lack of sympathy and consequent lack of co-operation at home, the local failure would mean the degradation in this empire of the name we bear. I wish that our home people might understand fully the magnitude and the dignity to which the work of the Japan mission has attained,—that, in fact, there is no other one interest supported by the Association of so much importance as this.

But I must not take too much of the Register's space. Only let me say this much more: the prospect for the fall term of our school is very encouraging. Various improvements in our curriculum have been made. I will mail a catalogue of Senshin Gakuin to any one who may wish to see in detail what the institution is doing. I am glad to be able to say that Mr. Kishimoto, known to many readers of the Register, is to lecture for us next winter on "The History of Christian Doctrine" and on "Modern Rationalism." Since Mr. Lawrence left us, this chair has been unoccupied most of the time. There are now seven teachers in our faculty,—four professors and three lecturers. Our students number about twenty. Our rigid examinations and the necessity for students to have a working knowledge of English keep the number of students down. But our student limit is marked at forty-five. Our work is chiefly post-graduate.

The following extract from a letter just received from a Buddhist priest and professor in a Buddhist College may be of some interest to our friends:—

"I became a member of the First Unitarian Church in Japan on the 1st of this month. I hope you will be kind enough to instruct me henceforth. Formerly I was a Buddhist and a professor in a Buddhist school. Having investigated the principles of Unitarianism during the past three years, I have become a member of your church, not by the advice of others, but of my own will, through my own conviction. I am now devoting all my time to the study of the principles of the Unitarian faith."

This is a far-away country. But men are men, and we are all members one of another. Japan yet needs the helping hand, especially when her people walk by faith, not sight.

Karuizawa, Japan, July 17.

REPORT OF THE WORK OF THE A. U. A. ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

BY REV. CHARLES W. WENDTE, SUPERINTENDENT.

The value of the superintendent's office and work in the support of our missionary operations and extension of our principles has been proven during the past twelve months more convincingly than ever before. The financial depression existing throughout the United States is felt with especial severity in these new Western communities, still so largely dependent on the long-settled and wealthy Eastern States for the material and moral aid with which to develop their vast resources and build up their civilization. In such crises the pinch of want is felt most of all by the institutions and the men which represent the ideal interests of society. Especially has this been the case with the young churches of the Pacific Coast. Nearly all of these have been called into life within the past five or six years. It is not too much to say that two-thirds of them would have been compelled to suspend their services or go out of existence altogether, had it not been for the sympathy, the instructed supervision, and the generous aid extended them by the American Unitarian Association, through its missionary committees and agents in the field. As it is, while the past year has been the most trying we have ever experienced, we have been enabled to keep up our church life and missionary endeavors in creditable fashion. We have not lost heart or lost ground. We have even made a little advance.

THE SUPERINTENDENT'S WORK.

To begin with the superintendent's work. I have made three missionary journeys to Southern California, and one to the States of Oregon and Washington during the year, besides several shorter trips to nearer Central California points. I have thus visited every Unitarian parish save one, preaching, lecturing, making addresses, and conferring with pastors and church officers. Through my friendly mediation, San Diego, Santa Barbara, San Bernardino, Seattle, and Puallup have been supplied with ministers. Denominational aid has been secured for several societies, amounting to $5,450, with an additional $3,500 for special missionary services, superintendent's office, and the San Francisco Book-room and Headquarters. In October of 1894 I attended the Unitarian National Conference at Saratoga, N.Y., and continued on to Boston, where I met the American Unitarian Association Board, and presented the interests of the Pacific Coast.

The vast distances to be traversed in my department, as well as our remoteness from the denominational centres at the East, necessitate an unusual amount of journeying. In all, I have covered some 12,500 miles of railway and ocean travel; and, including my summer vacation, which was devoted as usual to missionary labors, I have been away from my Oakland pulpit twenty-one Sundays, in addition to week-day activities.

It has been my aim to be at the Unitarian headquarters in San Francisco on two days in the week as much as possible. I have written and dictated over a thousand letters on denominational business, and written extensively for our local organ, the Pacific Unitarian, and other journals in the same interest.

Finally, it will not be out of place for me to state here that, including the amount paid my esteemed church assistant, Rev. Eliza Tupper Wilkes, the entire amount of the salary I received from the American Unitarian Association, as its superintendent, has been expended in furthering our missionary work on this coast. I felt myself repaid for this additional labor by the privilege of doing it.

BOOK-ROOM AND HEADQUARTERS.

The book-room and denominational headquarters for the coast have become an important auxiliary in our missionary operations. The expense of maintaining them falls short of $1,000 annually, of which amount the American Unitarian Association pays $250. The remainder is provided for from local sources. We have been fortunate in securing a convenient and centrally located office on the ground floor, with ample display of signs, etc., at a rental only one-half that of the former room. Here is kept on hand a good supply of the publications of the American Unitarian Association, the Sunday School Society, etc. It is also the publishing office of the Pacific Unitarian and rallying-place of our various local organizations. Miss Metta Curtis is in daily attendance. Rev. William G. Eliot, Jr., is chairman of the Headquarters Committee, and devotes much attention to the interests of the book-room.

The Pacific Unitarian, genially edited and beautifully printed by Mr. C. A. Murdock, has a circulation of over one thousand copies, and is within $200 annually of self-support.

BUILDING AND LOAN FUND.

The Unitarian Church Building and Loan Fund has about $13,000 loaned, without interest, on eight church properties on this coast. Some of the parishes pay their ten per cent. annual instalments quite promptly, as they become due. Others are sadly derelict. Meanwhile I am glad to announce that, despite the hard times, the church indebtedness of the Unitarian societies on the coast has been reduced over $20,000 during the past twelve months. $10,000 of this amount was raised in Los Angeles. In addition, a bequest of $5,000 to the Santa Barbara church, when paid, will enable that society also to liquidate its entire indebtedness. To offset this, by the burning of the San Diego church an investment of several thousand dollars, over and above its insurance, was lost. The latter society has promptly rallied from its disaster. From the proceeds of its insurance and the sale of its site it will be able to liquidate all of its indebtedness, and feels to-day a peace of mind and a calm outlook on the future in happy contrast with its former dependent and anxious situation. Arrangements are now in progress by which, it is hoped, the Loan Fund's investment in the Olympia church also may soon revert to it again.

CHURCH WORK.

I am glad to report that one more society (Santa Barbara) has become entirely self-supporting. But Seattle has slipped back into the ranks of dependent societies, and San José and San Diego have had their appropriations increased. Grants have been made for the first time to Santa Maria, San Bernardino, Redlands, and Ontario. Olympia and Sacramento, having temporarily suspended services, are not beneficiaries of the American Unitarian Association this year. Fresno also is quiescent.

MISSIONARY WORK.

New missionary work has been done at Hanford, where Mrs. Sarah Pratt Carr has begun a most promising movement, which the National Unitarian Women's Alliance has promised to aid the coming year; at Los Gatos, by Rev. W. M. Jones and others; at Santa Cruz, where six services were recently held; at Eugene, Ore., by Rev. T. L. Eliot, Rev. E. M. Wilbur, Rev. W. E. Copeland, and the superintendent; at various points in East Washington, by Rev. A. G. Wilson; at Centralia, W. Wash., by Rev. F. H. Adams; and at Gilroy, by Rev. L. W. Sprague.

THE MINISTRY.

We have welcomed into our Pacific ministry Rev. E. F. Dinsmore, Rev. J. H. Acton, D.D., Rev. H. D. Johnston, and Rev. F. L. Adams, all formerly orthodox clergymen. We have lost, temporarily, from active service, Rev. Mrs. Caroline Norris, by removal from the coast Rev. T. J. Horner, and from our Unitarian ministry altogether Rev. J. H. Garnett, who came to us two years ago from the Baptists.

We have received within the year applications to enter our ministry from five other clergymen of orthodox connection, who were, however, for various reasons discouraged from uniting with us.

There are thirty Unitarian ministers in active service, or seeking it, on the Pacific Coast.

STATISTICS.

The statistics of our Unitarian church life on this coast remain very much as they were at the last session of the Conference. About twenty-seven churches number some two thousand families, with an average Sunday attendance of over three thousand souls. The value of the church property is $450,000, on which there is to-day (1895) $74,000 indebtedness.

The amount raised during 1894-95 for current expenses, to meet indebtedness, and for other purposes, is about $70,000. For general denominational causes some $3,000 was raised.

At the recent session of the Pacific Unitarian Conference held at San José, an exceedingly interesting programme, extending over four days, was presented. Eighty-three delegates, including fourteen ministers, were present. The spirit of our councils was harmonious and fraternal, the discussion earnest; and the following resolution passed with unanimity:—

"Resolved, That we acknowledge with gratitude the sympathetic interest of the American Unitarian Association in the work of our Church on this coast, and the financial aid without which many of our parishes could not continue operations; further, that we urge upon all our societies that they become contributing members of the Association."

THE WEIRS GROVE MEETING.

From July 28 to August 4 was held the eighteenth annual Unitarian Grove Meeting at the Weirs, N.H. This summer gathering was conceived in the broadest spirit at the start; and the men who began it, Rev. S. C. Beane, D.D., and Rev. Enoch Powell, meant it to be what it has always been,—a missionary meeting. This year the attendance was not as large as it has been on many previous years; but the character and spirit of both the speakers and the congregations were never higher or more enthusiastic. Two reasons are sufficient to account for the small audiences,—wet and cold weather and the coming National Conference at Washington. Grove meeting this year seemed a misnomer, for the weather made it impossible to hold but two meetings in "God's first temples." But, owing to the courtesy of our Methodist brethren, we held our meetings in the little chapel on the hill overlooking beautiful Lake Winnepesaukee. On both Sundays and on "Educational" and "Layman's Day" the chapel was filled to overflowing, and many could not get in who desired to do so.

The Saratoga resolutions furnished the key-note of all the week; and on the programme was printed, as "Our Purpose," "We strive to spread the religion of Jesus, which we believe to be summed up in love to God and love to man."

Rev. W. W. Fenn of Chicago sounded the clarion call of the week in a noble sermon on "Practical Religion," on the first Sunday morning. He had an audience so numerous that he could lay his hands on those who sat crowded close to his feet. No better and stronger word could have been spoken than he then and there uttered. He made a statement of religion which, as Emerson says, "makes scepticism ridiculous." In the afternoon Rev. Joseph May of Philadelphia lifted us all to a high plane of the ethical and spiritual life by his lofty and inspiring thought; and in the evening Rev. Charles J. Staples of Manchester called us all to a strict and loyal service to our glorious faith by his earnest words.

Monday afternoon Rev. Samuel Hamlet, who is doing such excellent service at Wolfeboro, gave a thoughtful address on "The Need of Liberal Churches in Small Communities." In the evening we had a conference, led by Rev. Enoch Powell, at which Rev. William I. Nichols of Philadelphia spoke with warm appreciation of the Grove Meeting and its purposes.

Tuesday we made our annual excursion on the "Mt. Washington," a large and noble steamer, over the beautiful lake to the Unitarian fair at Wolfeboro. We had a pleasant social outing, and made the Wolfeboro Unitarians materially richer by our visit. On the return trip we encountered a thunder-storm, and saw the lake in all the fury of a tempest. We were glad when we got safely back to Weirs. In the evening Rev. S. C. Beane, D.D., gave us a strong sermon on "Liberty and Responsibility."

Wednesday our hearts were made glad by the presence of Rev. D. M. Wilson, who spoke on "Our Work and our Needs"; and the Grove Meeting welcomed for the first time the earnest and enthusiastic new treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, Mr. George W. Stone. Mr. Stone stirred all our hearts by his winning personality and by the direct and forcible way in which he spoke of the faith we all love. He gave us two noble addresses, and no one at the Weirs this year made a more profound or positive impression. Surely, such a man is a tower of strength; and we are all ready to follow his leadership to the certain victories we are sure he will win for our common cause.

Prof. Booker T. Washington won fresh laurels and new friends among us, and went away a little richer for his noble work. In the evening the conference was led by Rev. J. B. Morrison of Laconia.

Thursday was "Educational Day"; and we were proud to welcome such men as Rev. Charles R. Murkland, president of New Hampshire's Agricultural College at Durham, Hon. Fred Gowing, State Superintendent of Education for New Hampshire, and, best of all, Rev. William J. Tucker, D.D., the much loved and progressive president of Dartmouth College. President Murkland spoke on "Authority: Religious and Educational,"—a thoughtful, scholarly, and inspiring essay which charmed us all. President Tucker spoke on "Greatness," finding it in three traits, "Authority," "Originality," and "Benevolence." He showed us that, tested by these qualities, there is as much true greatness to-day as ever, and cited as examples Bismarck, Gladstone, and Lincoln. Hon. Fred Gowing presided with admirable taste and tact; and, at the close of the addresses, Prof. James T. Bixby and Rev. Samuel B. Stewart both offered excellent and pertinent remarks. Taken all in all, this was one of the most helpful days of the week. In the evening a Syrian, Ezekiel Taminosian, from Antioch gave us a lecture on "Life in the Orient."

Friday morning Rev. James E. Wright of Montpelier, a man whom we all delight to honor, gave us a sermon straight out of his heart. In the afternoon there was held on a small scale a "parliament of denominations." Rev. A. J. Rich presided; and there were addresses by a Baptist, Rev. Mr. Lindh of Cambridge, Mass., Rev. P. A. McKenna, a Catholic priest of Marlboro, Mass., who made a profound impression by his eloquence and evident desire to co-operate in the common work in which all sects should unite. Rev. Mr. Batt of Concord, Mass., spoke for the Congregationalists; and a Methodist, a Shaker sister, and a Unitarian also spoke. It was a veritable Pentecost, and we all felt a long step had been taken toward "the unity of the spirit and the bond of peace."

In the evening Rev. H. H. Woude of Toronto gave a remarkable lecture on "The Merchant of Venice." He also gave a lecture on Saturday night on "Macbeth," and gave a reading at the cottage of Judge Fellows on "Shakspeare as a Man." Everybody was delighted with the scholarship and spirit in which these lectures were given; and Rev. Mr. Woude won a host of admirers, who were fascinated by his vivid and realistic interpretation of the prince of poets and "the greatest of all preachers."

Saturday, "Layman's Day," was a red-letter occasion. Judge J. W. Fellows of Manchester presided. The leading address was by Hon. William E. Chandler, United States Senator from New Hampshire. It was an exhaustive and analytical address on "Unitarianism as a Hope and a Faith, not a Creed"; and it is earnestly desired by the audience which heard it that it may soon be given to the readers of the Christian Register. Hon. Charles F. Stone also gave an admirable address on "Progress in Law and Economics," showing the wonderful advances we have made since the days of Salem witchcraft. It gladdens our hearts to know that in our ranks there are such prominent and talented laymen who are ready to come to Weirs to speak for the advance of the faith.

Sunday was the last day; and noble sermons were given by two Nestors of Unitarianism, Rev. Augustus Woodbury, D.D., and Rev. Alfred P. Putnam, D.D. There was a large attendance; and the music, furnished by talented singers from Concord and Boston, was of the highest order. At the farewell service in the evening Rev. S. C. Beane, D.D., presided; and in short and earnest speeches an attempt was made to gather up the chief impressions of this delightful and helpful week spent together on the shores of New England's most beautiful lake. Then we sang with deep feeling Chadwick's sweet hymn set to "Auld Lang Syne," and the eighteenth annual Unitarian Grove Meeting was history,—helpful and gracious and blessed to those who entered into its spirit of faith and hope and love. FRANK L. PHALEN.

NEW YORK LETTER.

Those who are at home in the imaginative world of Dickens's characters, and love and rejoice in those glorious brothers, the Cheerybles, who befriended Nicholas Nickleby, must have thought of them in reading of the late Simon Wormser, the millionaire banker, who died so suddenly last week while out taking his usual evening walk. The deep and tender attachment of Mr. Wormser and his brother Isidor was one of the picturesque features of Wall Street. The two, when the day's work was over, were always seen going home together. Their brotherly affection and their respect for each other's opinion were known and commented upon in New York financial circles as an inexpressibly touching example of fraternal regard. The street can ill afford to lose the clear-headed, wise banker; still less can it afford to lose the daily inspiration of his conduct. Mr. Wormser was a prominent member of the congregation of that noble and beloved apostle of liberal Judaism, Rabbi Gottheil.

A fortunate quarter of a million of our citizens are estimated to be out of town, enjoying the change of air, diet, and people that vacation time ought to bring to all. It is chiefly the toilers who remain, and they keep the business thoroughfares as crowded as at any time in mid-winter. And, of these toilers, over thirteen thousand have recently taken a voluntary respite from their daily labor. In other words, this number of garment-makers in New York during the last week in July left their employment, at the bidding of the officers of the United Brotherhood of Tailors, and for more than seven days were "on strike." Few strifes between "labor and capital" have been as quiet, orderly, and ultimately successful as this one. The trouble centered itself in that part of the tenth ward known as the Hebrew quarter, where, according to Jacob Riis, life means the hardest kind of work almost from the cradle. It is here that the shiploads of Polish and Russian Jews settle, many of them finding work in the sweat-shops, at the poorest pay of any workmen in America. It is these men who rose in rebellion against their taskmasters, accusing them of broken promises and demanding that, as contractors of labor, standing between the manufacturers and workmen, they should agree to the following terms,—to employ only the men belonging to the Brotherhood of Tailors, which would provide them with all the hands they needed, that fifty-nine hours should be called a week's work, ten hours a day for the first five working-days, and nine hours for the sixth day, that an hour for dinner should be allowed every day, and that no over-time work should be permitted.

The Brotherhood further provided a minimum scale of wages; for, like many other friends of labor, they have not yet learned that wages cannot be arbitrarily maintained at any fixed figure, but are lowered or raised by uncontrollable agencies.

The accession to these demands that has been made by the contractors will undoubtedly eliminate many of the evils of the sweat-shops. But those who have studied the question assert that sweat-shops cannot be abolished, that they are nothing more than private apartments, and that men cannot be prohibited from sewing in their own homes. It is a sad thought that there is no present redress for this pitiable evil. That, while the immigration of droves of foreigners continues, and the unwholesome tenement building abides, so long will women, children, and men toil ten to fifteen hours a day at starvation wages, in foul air and with insufficient food. Miss Jane Addams, of the Hull House, told before the Summer School at Plymouth one year of a little Italian girl that she rescued from one of the sweat-shops of Chicago. As in our public schools in the Hebrew quarter, where the teacher asks daily, "What must I do to be healthy?" and the whole school responds,

"I must keep my skin clean,
Wear clean clothes,
Breathe pure air,
And live in the sunlight," so Miss Addams tried to teach the little Italian waif. "When you get up in the morning, Tessa, what do you do?" "I sew pants," the child answered. "No: you wash your face, little one; and then, Tessa,"—"I sew pants," came again the answer. The child had literally known no other duties than the desperate ones of "a sweater."

The most engrossing topic these days with the press and the public is Police Commissioner Roosevelt's energetic efforts in enforcing the Sunday excise law. His position that, while the law remains on the statute book, his one duty is to see that it is strictly enforced, is approved by the Good Government Clubs, Dr. Parkhurst's City Vigilance League, and by many of the best citizens. A letter signed by some clergymen, among them Bishop Potter and by several social workers, has been sent to the Police Board. It states that their action has been helpful in securing a healthier, more orderly Sunday among the poor. The most recent statistics show that on Sundays, 1894, liquor then being freely sold from the side doors of saloons, the arrests for drunkenness numbered 311; while on the corresponding Sundays this year there have been only 198 arrests for the same offence.

By a happy coincidence the Silver Jubilee of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America has been held here this week. There have been over ten thousand delegates present from out of town; and they, together with the New York members, have held some mass meetings, which have opened the eyes of the Tammany politicians, who seemed entirely unaware on which side of the excise question the Catholic Church would throw her tremendous influence. This important fact was settled once and for all at these meetings. Said one of the fathers, "Catholic stands unmistakably for temperance, and the Church proposes to fight the saloon in this city as no other power has done." Said the president of the Union, in one of his addresses, "A man cannot be a good Catholic, a faithful, docile child of the Church, and continue in the unbecoming business of conducting a liquor-saloon."

President Roosevelt's action in enforcing the law here regarding Sunday liquor-selling is going to bring local option to the front as an issue in the State election which is to take place this fall. In which case the attitude of the Catholic Church in this city will be an important factor in determining the result of the vote.

There is a dearth of news in denominational affairs, with the churches closed and the ministers away; but work has been going on at the Unitarian headquarters, and plans have been formed which, when put into execution in the autumn, will result, it is expected, in an aggressive campaign throughout the territory embraced in the Middle States Conference. Among other features of this campaign will be a "forward movement" in Brooklyn. The secretary's arrangements for the National Conference to be held in Washington in October are now nearly completed, and will be announced from time to time in the Christian Register.

A cheering bit of tidings, especially for those who would, if they could, send every city child into the country during the summer, has come in a letter from Miss Harrington, kindergartner of the Willow Place Chapel, connected with the First Unitarian Church, Brooklyn. The kindergarten, for the second time, has been transferred to the country for the summer months. This year it is at Rutherford, N.J. The letter (dated in June) says: "We have been here two weeks, and are nicely settled. The first ten children have returned home; and how well they did look when they left! Our neighbors are delightful; and, having the Unitarian church so near (Rev. George H. Badger), we receive kindness all round. Mrs. Bell lets us have the use of her grounds; and, as there are hammocks and swings, one knows where to find our little ones."

"The children that came on our first trip were our babies, and we became very fond of them. They did not want to leave us, and it was very cunning to hear them talk it all over. One little fellow said 'that he would miss those lovely blankets on his bed.'" M. A. M.

THE POWER OF FAITH.

Whatever may be the real nature of faith, its power cannot be contested. There is profound reason for the Gospel affirmation that it can move mountains. The great events of history have been brought about by obscure fanatics armed with nothing but their faith. The great religions which have governed the world and the vast empires that have extended from one hemisphere to the other were not built up by men of letters, of science, or by philosophers. The creed on which the civilization under which we live was founded was first spread by obscure fishermen of a Galilean market town. Shepherds from the Arabian deserts, whose contemporaries hardly knew of their existence, were the men who subjected a part of the Greco-Roman world to the dogmas of Mohammed, and founded one of the vastest empires known in history.

A strong conviction is so irresistible that only an equal conviction has any chance of struggling victoriously against it. Faith has no enemy to be really afraid of except faith. It is sure of triumph when the material force opposed to it is the servant of weak emotions and of weak belief. But, if it is brought to face a faith of the same intensity, the contest becomes very active; and success is then determined by accessory circumstances, usually also of a moral order, such as the spirit of discipline and better organization.—From "The Work of Ideas in Human Evolution," by Gustave Le Bon, in the Popular Science Monthly for August.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

BOOK-ROOM CHAT.

The treasurer would like to have Unitarians generally, and especially those from a distance visiting Boston, know that they are welcome at 25 Beacon Street. We shall be glad to furnish any information we can; also inquiries about books, publications of any kind, including periodicals. We keep on our tables a supply of the Christian Register, Unitarian, the New World, Lend a Hand, and can generally supply any back numbers wanted. We also have catalogues of religious books by Unitarian authors and catalogues of our own publications, which we will send to any one wishing to make selections; also a list of Unitarian tracts which we publish. Perhaps it may not be generally known that the tracts in this list are furnished free of cost to any one applying; and it is to be hoped that Unitarians will familiarize themselves with these publications, and use them among their friends not acquainted with our views: that is what they are published for. It is perhaps well to repeat, also, that we can furnish almost anything in the line of books that you may want. The work at 25 Beacon Street is carried on for the benefit of the Unitarian denomination; and whether you belong to it now, or only want to belong to it, or only think that you may perhaps some time want to belong to it, or even if you only wish it well, you are welcome to utilize our facilities.

There are some books on our shelves that ought to be read more than they are. For example, every layman and laywoman can read with profit Prof. Carpenter's "Life in Palestine when Jesus lived." It costs only 50 cents post-paid. It contains information indispensable to an intelligent comprehension of the work accomplished by Jesus. No matter how weary one might be of the popular cant and mysticism so prevalent about the life and work of Jesus, all this weariness would be forgotten in a new and intense interest in the problem he had to solve, as the reader meets, it may be for the first time, the real Jesus, and sees the matchless blending of courage and wisdom with love and patience which distinguished him. There is no romance in the conditions described, no attempt at the dramatic, but a plain and practical treatment of an historic period.

After this the other book of Prof. Carpenter's, "The Three Gospels," naturally follows. Like all this author's work, this is clear and interesting; but, what is more to the point, it gives the reader the latest results of the best scholarship on the origin and relations of the Synoptic Gospels. The price of this book is $1.25, post-paid.

Now, if Prof. Carpenter, with his magnet of scholarship, will gather into narrative form the life and teachings of Jesus, using only such materials as have survived the reverent criticism which he has made, we shall have the record of a life that for wisdom, strength, and beauty has no parallel in human history.

VISITORS.

The dulness peculiar to vacation time still continues at these rooms, enlivened occasionally by visits from our Western and Southern friends on their way to the New England coast to get a breath of real sea air and enjoy the music of the winds and waves. We hope to see them on their return brown and hearty and ready for a year of rousing work.

WASHINGTON AND ATLANTA.

From the inquiries already made and the preparations now going on, the meeting of the National Conference in Washington in October is likely to prove a success in numbers and interest. Washington is at its best in October; and the city is not only interesting because it is the national capital, but also because it is a very beautiful city in every way. It is to be hoped that many of our Unitarians will extend their trip to Atlanta. The great Southern Exposition will be in its best trim at that time. Our superintendent of the Southern work, Rev. George L. Chaney, will have a Unitarian exhibit in the Exposition. Atlanta is the Chicago of the South. It is the most enterprising of all the Southern cities, and it would be very helpful to our church there if our people would encourage them by their presence and an expression of interest in their work.

STATISTICS.

The treasurer is not receiving answers to his inquiries for information from the churches as promptly as is desirable. It is impossible to carry on denominational work intelligently without knowing where the people are with whom we have to deal, and how many there are, also. It cannot be that Congregationalism implies isolation, or is hostile in any degree to co-operation; and it is impossible to conduct any work such as the missionary work of our denomination without some statistics upon which to base estimates. Will not those who have received postal cards fill up the blanks and return them, or, if they cannot do it, hand them to some one who can do it?

GEORGE W. STONE,
Treasurer.

The Sunday School.

The annual meeting of the Unitarian Sunday School Society will be held at Providence, R.I., Wednesday evening and Thursday, October 16 and 17. The five liberal religious churches in that city will give a hearty welcome. These sessions for Sunday-school workers are deservedly popular; and the usual interesting programme of speakers and subjects will be provided.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

REV. F. W. HAMILTON has been called to the First Universalist Church at Boston Highlands, to succeed Rev. Dr. Rexford.

THE Minnesota Conference of Unitarians will be held at St. Cloud, Minn., September 17 to 19. It is hoped by holding it at this time that it will not conflict with other interests or meetings. H. G. Putnam, Secretary.

BOSTON.—Bulfinch Place Church (Benevolent Fraternity of Churches): Sunday-school at 10.30. Subject, "William Cullen Bryant." Vesper Service at 7.30. Duets by Mr. and Mrs. Lester Bartlett. Violin selection by Mr. S. E. Goldstein. Rev. C. R. Eliot will speak upon "A Religion for Men." All are cordially invited.

Boston Common: Favorable skies attended the religious service at the cotton-wood-tree last Sunday. A special feature was the presence of many children, who left the grass plots, gathered near the speakers, sang right heartily, and listened patiently. The speakers for next Sunday, 5 p.m., are Rev. F. B. Hornbrooke and Rev. B. F. McDaniel.

HANCOCK CONFERENCE.—The sixth annual session of the Hancock Conference was held in the Unitarian church of Bar Harbor, Me., on Wednesday, August 7. In spite of the foggy weather, more than a hundred delegates from the various villages around Frenchman's Bay attended; and these, with the Bar Harbor contingent, both summer and permanent residents, filled the prettily decorated church. By steamboat or buckboard people came from South-west Harbor, North-east Harbor, Seal Harbor, and Somesville on Mt. Desert Island, and from Ellsworth, Lamoine, Sullivan, Steuben, West Gouldsboro, Prospect Harbor, and Winter Harbor on the mainland. At four of these places there are regularly established Unitarian churches: the remaining places have union churches, with liberal preaching in the summer season. The only settled ministers are Rev. L. D. Cochrane and Rev. Cora S. Cochrane, who preach at Ellsworth and Bar Harbor, and maintain a circuit among the other churches; but in summer many Unitarian ministers resort to the various villages about the bay, and for twenty years the region has been a practising field for divinity students. Among the ministers who were present at the conference were: Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D., who lives in the summer time at Seal Harbor; Rev. F. G. Peabody, D.D., and Rev. C. F. Dole, who have houses at Bar Harbor and South-west Harbor respectively; Rev. S. A. Eliot, who lives at North-east Harbor; Rev. S. W. Brooke, who has rented the Homans Cottage at Schooner Head; Rev. S. M. Crothers, who is staying with Mr. Peabody; and

Rev. W. H. Fish, Jr., who is staying with Mr. Brooke; Rev. T. E. Allen, who is spending the summer at Lamoine; Rev. T. J. Horner, Mr. C. M. Langston, and Mr. C. H. Porter, Jr., who are preaching at Sullivan, Prospect Harbor, and West Gouldsboro. With such a force of ministers, a large, earnest, and responsive congregation, and the cordial hospitality of the Bar Harbor church, the success of the conference was assured. The meetings of the conference have always been entirely simple and informal, and there was no departure from that unwritten law this year. A spirit of good-fellowship and natural co-operation prevailed. The addresses were all extemporaneous, not a manuscript appeared, and the unaccompanied singing, led by Mr. Eliot and Mr. Porter, was sweet and hearty. The morning session opened with devotional exercises, conducted by Rev. S. W. Brooke of Boston. Then Dr. Peabody, with his accustomed felicity, extended the greetings of the Bar Harbor church. In the absence of the president, Hon. John D. Hopkins of Ellsworth, who came in later, Rev. S. A. Eliot presided, and read letters from Mr. Hopkins and the greetings of the Maine State Conference through its secretary, Rev. J. L. Marsh. Rev. S. M. Crothers addressed the conference on "The Latent Spiritual Power in our Churches." Though he refrained from being witty, needless to say that he was wise. He held the closest attention of his hearers, as he revealed the as yet unrealized possibilities of the liberal gospel. Mr. Dole followed him with an earnest and animated address. Dr. Everett added his calm words, placing just the right emphasis on just the right points; and Rev. T. E. Allen closed the discussion. It was a morning given to high thought in simple expression.

Dr. Peabody then summoned the conference to the collation spread by the ladies of the Bar Harbor church in the Grand Army Hall, and all enjoyed a pleasant social hour. The afternoon session was opened by a brief service conducted with charming spirit by Mr. Charles H. Porter, Jr. President William De W. Hyde of Bowdoin College gave a most interesting address upon "The Working of the Interdenominational Commission in Maine." This commission, of which Dr. Hyde is the originator and president, has conducted for three years past an important experiment in denominational co-operation among the evangelical churches, preventing the multiplication of needless churches through sectarian zeal, and checking the abuses of sectarian rivalries. Dr. Hyde demonstrated the urgent need of such a commission, and explained the principles upon which the Maine Commission does its work. The success of this interesting experiment in Maine is worthy of close attention, and points the way to the efficient conduct of the work of church extension, be it orthodox or liberal. Rev. L. D. Cochrane of Ellsworth followed with a telling address on "Our Liberal Gospel," which was full of good points, clearly and strongly made. Mr. Booker T. Washington of Tuskegee, Ala., was then given the floor, and made one of his short and spirited speeches about the splendid work of the Tuskegee School for Colored Youth. The Committee on Resolutions reported through Mr. Langston a resolution of thanks to the speakers and to the ladies' committee of the Bar Harbor church. On the report of the Committee on Elections the following were elected officers of the conference for the ensuing year: president, F. Noyes of Sullivan; vice-president, Capt. Deasy of Prospect Harbor; secretary, Rev. L. D. Cochrane of Ellsworth; delegates to the National Conference, Mr. and D. B. Flint of Winter Harbor, Mrs. F. G. Peabody of Bar Harbor; delegates to the Maine Conference, the officers of the conference. This election marks the transfer of the affairs of the conference to the charge of the permanent residents of the district. Hitherto the summer visitors have largely controlled the conference; but now local interest has become quite strong enough to permit of the withdrawal of the summer people from active work, though their hearty co-operation is of course assured. A special vote of thanks was given to Rev. S. A. Eliot, who started the conference in 1889, and has ever since arranged for its annual meetings. As the collection taken at the close of the afternoon session far exceeded the modest needs of the conference, the balance was given to Mr. Washington for Tuskegee. The conference was brought to its close by a beautiful service conducted by Dr. Peabody; and the people separated with the sense that they had been together through one of God's best days, had heard noble truths, and felt unutterable things.

SOLEMN CEREMONY BY WHICH LOUIS SINGERMAN ENTERS MANHOOD.—The confirmation of Louis Singerman on his thirteenth birthday took place at the Jewish synagogue, corner of Seneca and Eighth Streets, Saturday morning, at 10.30 o'clock, in the presence of an audience that filled every inch of available space in the edifice. The ceremony was interesting, and at different times extremely pathetic, particularly so when the youth was praying to God to bless his people and strengthen him to the end of his days, that he might cling steadfastly to his laws. The special feature of the ceremony, however, was the maiden speech of the youth before the vast audience, wherein he told of the significance of the occasion, declared his arrival at the age when he could no longer plead tender years as an excuse for sin, and expressed publicly his desire to be received into the spiritual bond of his people:—

"To-day, by the laws of our holy religion, I step from childhood to manhood,—an event which is the most sacred of my life. I can no longer plead my tender years as an excuse for sin, nor will my beloved parents be held to account for those things wherein I may be wanting as a true Jew and son of God. Though but young in years, I feel deep and fervent pride in the fact that I am a Jew; and at this most solemn hour I can but rely upon the goodness and mercy of God to lead me in the paths that I should go through life. God grant me the power to so live that I may become a useful Hebrew, and not only that, but that in the years to come I may be a true man. Let me say here that my heart overflows with tender love for the sweet parents who have watched over and cared for me since first my infant eyes beheld the light. May their days be long in the land which the Lord God has given them! To teachers who have instructed me I express my gratitude. May the synagogue wherein my voice is heard to-day move on to prosperity, and may Heaven so strengthen me that I may live in honor to carry out all religious resolutions. As a son of Israel, I desire to be received into the spiritual bond of my people. I am ready to accept the faith of my father, and willing to share with my brethren the responsibilities of our common obligation."

He then recited the creed of the Jewish religion, saying:—

"I believe that God is one, holy, and purely spiritual, the Creator, Ruler, and Preserver of the universe, to whom alone belong homage and adoration. I believe that God has created man in his image, and has endowed him with an immortal spirit, through which he may sanctify himself in his thoughts and actions. God has proclaimed the immutable law of morality on Mount Sinai, through Moses, the greatest of all prophets, as an infallible guide for my conduct. Man is responsible for his actions. God is merciful, but also a righteous judge, who renders to every one the fruits of his doings. I believe that Israel is the priest-people of God, destined by him to proclaim and spread all over the earth the knowledge of the One Eternal, and to teach obedience to his holy will to all families of man. This universal mission of Israel will be realized in the future. The Messianic time, predicted by our prophets, will come when all mankind, redeemed from error and evil, shall acknowledge the Holy One of Israel as their Father and Redeemer. Deeply imbued with the truth of these principles, I solemnly profess before God and his congregation that I am resolved to live in conformity with this faith, to make the fulfilment of these duties the highest task of my life, and to strive amid all trials and temptations to remain faithful to my God."—Seattle Post Intelligence.

Since the New England Hospital for Women and Children on Dimock Street, Roxbury, has been partly closed for very extensive repairs and improvements, we have come to realize more than ever before what an important place this institution fills in the community. We are happy to announce that the hospital is again open for patients in all its departments, and better able than ever before to contribute to the comfort and relief of those who need hospital aid.

Business Notices.

From London.—Every woman who is anxious to improve the appearance of her parlor should take the trouble to see one of the new London divans which have come suddenly into fashion this season. They are going to be very much in evidence in the next few years in polite society. Perhaps the best place in Boston to see such a divan is at the Paine furniture warehouses on Canal Street. They are not at all expensive.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Deaths.

At Templeton, 3d inst., Mrs. Mary S., wife of Capt. C. Sawyer, of Philadelphia, Pa.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

A LADY with a pleasant home near Boston, and having the care of a young girl of thirteen, desires to communicate with parents or guardians who may be seeking a temporary or permanent home for one or more children. References exchanged. Address GUARDIAN, care Christian Register.

TO LET. The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. Two furnished cottages, West Falmouth. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

A VESPER PRAYER.

From all its little bells the brook
Shakes out a silver peal,
And faintly from the forest nook
Their elfin echoes steal.
The shadows lengthen on the sward,
The light dies in the west:
Now, through the dewy twilight, Lord,
Send down the balm of rest.

The glimmering kine upon the grass
Lie crouched in dumb content;
And wandering breaths of blossoms pass,
In one rich perfume blent.
The braided gnats in sweet accord
Wail where the willows weep:
Now, through the solemn night, dear Lord,
Send down the gift of sleep.

—James B. Kenyon.

The Pulpit.

TRUE RELIGION.*

BY CHARLES A. ALLEN.

"The faith of the saints."—REV. xiii. 10.

"I do not call you a religious person," said the young atheist, Donovan, to Dr. Tremain, in Edna Lyall's interesting story. But Donovan was mistaken, nevertheless. The doctor was really a deeply religious man. He held clearly and strongly to Christian truths, and felt the power of them in his heart; but he was not tied to any mere dogmas,—the shells and husks by which Christian truths have been sheltered and sustained in certain minds or in certain periods of history,—and therefore he knew how to deal gently with doubters, who have often been repelled by outgrown dogmas. And, on the other hand, there was this to be said for Donovan,—that he had led a life of suffering and bitter discouragement; that the so-called religious people whom he had known had been unjust and heartless to him; that, when he was a young boy, he had been left to the care of a nurse who had treated him harshly, but made him say his prayers; that his mother's religion was shallow and heartless, for she had insisted on his going to church regularly, when his keen perception told him that it was all a piece of hypocrisy with her and with most of the congregation; that at boarding-school his manly honesty had brought him into trouble, so that he was at last disgraced and expelled by the pious teachers; that his good father had died before Donovan had an opportunity of really knowing him, and his mother had married a cousin, who cheated the boy out of his inheritance, and yet was a model of formal religion. All these "religious" people were constantly hammering at him with their dogmas, which to him seemed as false and mocking as the voices of fiends. What wonder that he thought of religion as a gigantic hypocrisy and cruelty! And, when he became acquainted with Dr. Tremain, a wise, loving, sympathetic, generous, broad-minded Christian, he was somewhat confused, and said, with ingenuous frankness, "I do not call you a religious person."

With a gentle laugh, the doctor replied, "Thank you!" for he instantly saw what Donovan really meant; and the result was that, through the loving wisdom and patient warm-heartedness of Dr. Tremain and his family, Donovan was gradually drawn out of his defiant, morbid, unhappy atheism into an appreciation, such as had never dawned on him before, of what religion really is and of what Christianity really is.

It is a very instructive book, this story of "Donovan." There is good material in it for a hundred sermons: it is full of religious lessons well adapted to our times, and perhaps none need these lessons more than we Unitarians do. For many of us are inclined to cherish prejudices somewhat similar to those of Donovan, though seldom so extravagant,—to be distrustful of everything emotional in religion, and perhaps to sneer at piety, or even to speak of religion itself in a tone of contempt, because we have seen so much hypocrisy and selfishness that take the names of religion and piety; and so, when we meet a religious man or woman who wins our respect and love, we are tempted to say, "I do not call you a religious person."

Well, it is always hard to restore damaged words to their ancient beauty; and sometimes it seems as if the only possible course were like that generally taken with infected garments,—to bury them out of sight. For some words are hopelessly damaged. Who of you would ever think that "silly" once meant "holy" or "innocent," that "simpleton" once meant "a man without guile," that "plausible" once meant "deserving applause," or that "cunning" was once applied to honorable skill in the fine arts! We sometimes feel the same about the word "piety": it has so many disagreeable associations to some of us that we would rather dislike to be called "pious."

But the trouble often is that, when we drop the old words, we are liable, for lack of suitable words in their place, to lose our grasp of the realities that these words stood for, and even to let everything that was ever connected with these words be overwhelmed with distrust and contempt. For instance, the words "libertine" and "free thinker" once meant honorable independence in thinking for ourselves; but they have become so offensive to many Christian people by being associated, often very unjustly, with moral laxity that some people have not the courage to speak their honest thought because they dislike to be called "free thinkers." The degradation of this word has thus in some degree degraded the commendable spirit of honest, brave truth-seeking, for which the word once stood. And there is just the same danger in letting such words as "piety" and "religion" become demoralized and degraded. We are liable to become blind to the lovely reality for which these words stand in many minds; and thus we may commit the grievous mistake, full of mischief to susceptible and innocent souls, of sneering at piety and religion, and even at Christianity, without discriminating the true from the false and without doing justice to the reality of character for which these words still stand to many, and for which we have no other words to serve as well.

For instance, what better word is there than "religion" to describe that reality of character which gives to saintliness its sweetest charm and to heroism its loftiest grandeur? You and I have known people whom we could not help reverencing and trusting and loving, whom we felt to be something more than merely honest in the ways of common life, or merely charitable in the form of beneficence to the poor, or merely kind-hearted in the home and the highway. They are something more than all this. Most of us feel it instinctively, just as we see and feel the sublimity of a snow-capped mountain. It is possible, to be sure, that some of us have never felt this reverence, just as there are people who have lived all their lives in sight of some sublime natural object, and have never looked at it with admiration, and wonder with an immense wonder when other people journey hundreds of miles to see this mountain, and to admire it. In like manner, some people live for years in the constant presence of the highest goodness and sweetness and sublimity of character, and yet never feel any emotion of admiration for it. It must have been so with many who saw and heard Jesus day after day in his wonderful ministry, and yet at the last joined with the throng in crying out, "Crucify him!" Is it strange that such people sneer at religion, when they are so blind to the sublime reality of character, for which the word "religion" in its best sense stands?

But, whether we see it or not, there is such a thing as saintly character. And now what is it that really makes the difference between the true saints and the commonplace, average, respectable men and women, who never do anything bad, and yet show no beauty or greatness of character above the general type of respectably good men and women? It is not mere conscientiousness; for a man may be very conscientious, and yet we may not call him a saint. It is not mere honesty and kind-heartedness, "doing justly and loving mercy," admirable as these may be; for with these there may be mingled weaknesses of character which do not, indeed, impair our respect, and yet may prevent our feeling reverence. And then, besides, a thoroughly honest, conscientious, kind-hearted man may yet act with a certain coldness of temper, even when he always does what is right, so that we feel somehow that it is rather hard work for him to do what is right. We feel sure that, with all his conscientiousness, he has no very ardent love for doing right: his conscientiousness is cold-blooded, and therefore fails to warm us with admiration. And then, often under the apparent conscientiousness we detect the metallic ring of a refined but hard selfishness,—a doing right for the sake of the reward,—not the warm, human tone of a voice that throbs with love. We say in all such cases that the man is good, to be sure, but that he has "no soul," no enthusiasm, no earnestness; and he therefore kindles no enthusiasm in us. We feel that he has a great respect for duty, and would always do his duty when he sees it; but we have our doubts whether he has much love for his fellow-men beyond a very limited circle. We do not count on him to make any great sacrifices, because he has so little ardor of love. He is like a piece of granite, firmly standing in his place and lot of common duty,—

"A tower of strength
Which stands foursquare to all the winds that blow,"

rather than a flame of self-forgetful sympathy and helpfulness that takes the whole world into its ardent love, as the morning sun pours its holy, warm, and life-giving light over a chilled and suffering earth.

Now, what is it that makes this difference in character? Surely, it must be a secret of great value; for such loveliness of character deserves, not our admiration only, but our emulation. Do we not all feel that we would gladly become such as these saints are, whose presence touches us with so much reverence, and sometimes with something like awe, as if we stood before an angelic court of justice and were convicted of many sins? And do we not instinctively ask, What is the secret of this marvellous beauty of character, this angelic charm?

As we come to know such people well, we find that the secret of their charm is this,—that these people have a great deal of deep, true feeling on certain subjects, with regard to which most of us are rather cold, or perhaps entirely indifferent. I say, "true feeling,"—not mere sentimentalism or gush, that flames up in fervid talk, but leaves no impression on the life. There is plenty of such false and shallow feeling, which is apt to make earnest people distrust all feeling and prefer to be like icebergs themselves rather than to be like the crackling fire of thorns which blazes up with a great deal of foul smoke and quickly goes out, leaving only a grimy spot on the green earth. But true feeling may be very calm, though never cold. Some people of the most intense feeling that I have ever known have been very quiet and calm in manner, saying little, but showing the signs of their deep, true feeling in the earnest eye, the glowing face, the warm tone of voice, the decided, eager action. No one would make the mistake of saying that these are cold-hearted people. The devoted father or husband or wife or mother may not be always chattering words of endearment; but the warm heart of true love is constantly felt in the atmosphere of the home, beams from the eye, and throbs in the voice. The patriot does not need to make fiery speeches and protest his readiness to die for his country; but his few words are so warm with true feeling that they electrify with patriotism all who hear him, and his brave deeds intensify the power of his words.

So it is with religion. For what is true religion but noble character, elevated, purified, consecrated, and glowing with intense feeling about our duties to God and man! The man who is deeply in earnest about his duties to himself, because he warmly feels that the voice of duty is the voice of God; who is deeply in earnest about his duties to his fellow-men, because he warmly feels that his fellow-men are his brethren in God, children of the same Father and heirs of the same immortality,—such a man is a religious man in the true and high sense of the word. And his religion is an intense reality of which every one feels the glowing earnestness. Even the mocker feels it, whose tongue is ever ready to sneer at piety and faith. Such a religion puts to shame all flippant sceptics, and silences their heartless jeers; and they can only say, "I do not call you a religious person." Such a religion makes the home where it dwells a house of prayer, and lights up the features of the true saint with a beauty and calm before which we bow in reverence.

To be deeply in earnest, then, about our duty to ourselves and to others, because we believe so intensely that duty is the voice of God, and that all men are the children of God; to speak with intense earnestness whenever our word is needed; and to act with resolute, self-sacrificing earnestness whenever action is needed,—this is being truly religious.

And the best morality or conscientiousness amounts to very little without this earnestness. Christian churches have been perfectly right in saying that morality without religion is of little value, though they have often made the sad mistake of lowering the meaning of religion to some mere creed-belief or ritual form or spasm of devout emotion that had no influence on the character. Morality without religion may be only a bundle of respectable habits, or it may be only the cold calculation of prudence; or, at the best, it is cold-blooded, has no enthusiasm or aspiration. It does not kindle a glow of emulation in other hearts, and does not rise into ever higher attainments of character. It has not the earnestness that strenuously resists temptation and eagerly fights against the evils of life. And, therefore, such morality will never save anybody, and will do nothing to make the world any better. "No heart is pure," says "Ecce Homo," "that is not impassioned: no virtue is safe that is not enthusiastic."

It is true that a strong habitual sense of duty, a sincere reverence for what is pure and noble, will give much strength. Any sincere reverence for goodness is the beginning of true religion. But reverence does not become truly religious, and does not give to character all the strength that is constantly needed in the common temptations of life, till it bows in worship before the infinite goodness of God.

A recent writer, in speaking of the dangers to which young women are exposed in our great cities, urges that the only safety for such girls is an intense religious feeling of the sacredness of their integrity and their virtue. When strong temptations beset them, if they hesitate they are lost. If their highest motive is a merely conventional habit of good behavior or a cold-blooded prudence, if they think only of keeping up a good appearance, or if their conscientiousness is not made strong by deep religious feeling, they will easily trip and fall. "God knows that the temptations of life are terrible," says this writer; "but the men and women, high or low, who withstand, and refuse to lie, to steal, to envy, to malign, and to be vicious, are those, and those only, who are inspired by a sentiment that is dearer to them than life itself."

It is said that, both here and in Ireland, the Irish Catholic girls are generally more virtuous than the Protestant girls of a similar social class, for the reason that with these Catholic girls feminine virtue is a part of their intense religious feeling. It is hallowed to them by an exalted enthusiasm. It is passionately and reverently cherished as a holy duty that they owe to God; and, therefore, if a hot temptation comes, there springs up instantly within their hearts the hotter flame of religious enthusiasm by which they have consecrated

The Duchesse Glove

Thousands of ladies to-day wear only the DUCHESS GLOVE, and no glove is so well adapted for general use by our best New England family trade.

PRICE LIST.

Four Large Buttons, Dressed Kid, Colors.....	$1.50
Four Large Buttons, Dressed Kid, Black.....	1.75
Five Medium Buttons, Dressed Kid, Colors.....	1.50
Five Medium Buttons, Dressed Kid, Black.....	1.75
Four Large Buttons, Undressed Kid, Colors and Black.....	1.65
Four Medium Buttons, Undressed Kid, Colors and Black.....	1.50
Seven Hook, Dressed Kid, Colors and Black...	1.75
Seven Hook, Undressed Kid, Colors and Black Mousquetaire, Undressed Kid, Colors and Black.....	2.00
Mousquetaire, Dressed Kid, Colors and Black	2.25
16-Button, Undressed Mousquetaire.....	3.00
20-Button, Undressed Mousquetaire.....	3.50
24-Button, Undressed Mousquetaire.....	4.00
Men's Two Button.....	1.50
Men's Two Clasp.....	1.50
Men's Two Clasp Prex Seam Kangaroo.....	1.75
Men's Two Clasp Plain Black.....	1.75

The DUCHESS GLOVE always represents the latest fashion—always fits perfectly—always wears well.

OUR GUARANTEE GOES WITH EVERY PAIR.

CHANDLER & CO.,
Winter St., Boston.

*Preached in the First Church, Bridgewater, Mass., June 13.

themselves to virtue, and thus the temptation is foiled. Must we not think that many fair lives which we have known in Protestant homes might have been saved from shame and bitter misery, if they had been trained to feel warmly this enthusiasm for what is pure and right and honorable,—the enthusiasm which true religion inspires?

I speak with earnestness, because I feel,—and many others in our ministry feel,—that the special danger of Unitarians is indifference to this enthusiasm. Other churches have their own special dangers, as well as their special merits. We may admire and emulate their merits; but we had best let them attend to their own dangers, while we ourselves consider what are our own peculiar perils. Other churches may tend to Pharisaism, to exaggerating the importance of rites and dogmas and all the outward expressions of religion, which may draw attention away from the inner life of faith and love. But our tendency—a far more dangerous tendency—is toward that Sadduceism which has its doubts about everything deeply religious, which takes life easily, complacently, self-indulgently, doing a good deal that is creditable and nothing that is scandalous, yet lacking that deeply earnest feeling which puts a glowing enthusiasm into every duty, and is sensitive to every obligation, and kindles in other hearts around us the passion of a consecrated purpose. The force of old habits in which our parents trained us keeps our older people still attached to church-going ways; but, as for any enthusiastic feeling about religious duties, most of us are rather incredulous of it, and some of us are apt to look upon it with contempt. Is it strange that indifference to everything religious is far more prevalent in our Unitarian circles than elsewhere in Protestant lands, and that our homes, though ever so refined and cultured and pure, do very little to train our young people in a warm enthusiasm for their duties to their fellow-men and to their God? I have known Unitarian congregations where this moral decay had gone so far that the general spirit was thoroughly irreligious, and any appeal for a more earnest spirit provoked a quiet jest or perhaps a bitter reply of resentment and contempt. For such irreligion there is no remedy but the cleansing fire and awakening shock of some grief or terror or calamity, such as God often sends in his infinite mercy to arouse in heedless souls the consciousness of a higher life. If God is not merciful in some such judgments, it were better that such sham churches were swept away, so that the ground may be cleared for more faithful servants of God to enter in.

This, then, is the secret of true religion,—a deep, earnest, enduring feeling about the duties of life as obligations placed upon us by the Father of our souls. And this, then, is the faith of the saints,—the inner life of love and trust and loyalty toward God that creates the saintly life. For true "faith" is not a creed-belief, though a clear conviction of certain religious truths is essential to nourish the life of faith. It is not a momentary blaze of emotion, though an expression of intense emotion often testifies to the life of faith within the heart. It is the deep, patient, enduring feeling about duty, which is awakened and sustained by our belief in God as the Father of all souls,—an enthusiasm of conscientiousness, of self-sacrificing love and earnest concern for the welfare of others, of humility, forbearance, forgiveness, purity, and courage. Such traits as these make the good life; but, when they glow with a deep, warm enthusiasm and consecration, they constitute the religious life, the perfection of which is the saintly life. True religion, then, is "the faith of the saints,"—the faith that leads to saintliness.

But how shall we sustain in ourselves and kindle in others this enthusiasm that feeds the saintly life? Is there any more important means to this end than our frequent meeting together for worship, breathing together the atmosphere of prayer, meditating together on the great thoughts that nourish in us the spirit of faith, listening to the words that come from an earnest heart and that speak of holy duties and sublime hopes, of our human ties of brotherhood in God, and of the grandeur that immortality gives to the most trivial tasks? And then, whatever else may be helpful to us in any degree,—these special services of communion, these affiliations in church membership for closer fellowship and cooperation, these special meetings for prayer and mutual help,—these all have their preciousness, and we must not neglect them. It is so easy to become irreligious; it is so hard to struggle against the evil of the world, and to save others from the foul and withering sins that constantly beset them, that we are grossly unfaithful unless we earnestly and constantly use all these helps, and do our utmost to make others feel their need of these helps, so that they may be strong in every hour of temptation and earnest in every way of duty.

Spiritual Life.

The real gist of religion is loving service: all else is form and vaneer.—Selected.

Heaven itself would fail to please the heart that had not learned to know heaven's supreme delight here.—The Golden Rule.

As the principle of love is the main principle in the heart of the real Christian, so the labor of love is the main business of the Christian life.—Jonathan Edwards.

Love grows by culture. To him that hath shall be given. Love to-day with all your heart, and to-morrow your heart will hold more than to-day.—James Caleb Jackson.

Sorrows are like window-blinds which, in shutting out the sunlight, shut us in from the world's distracting scenes, and make for us a quiet place where we may be alone with God.—Richmond Christian Advocate.

The secret of a happy life is having one's heart full of praise; and, when we count our blessings every day in a spirit of thanksgiving for them, we shall find many a reason why we should praise God.—Selected.

Let us beware of losing our enthusiasm. Let us ever glory in something, and strive to retain our admiration for something that would ennoble and interest us in all that would enrich and beautify our lives.—Phillips Brooks.

The peace which the world gives is by subtraction: it comes by the removal of the things which disturb us. The peace which Christ gives us is by addition: it comes in the midst of the things which disturb us.—Richmond Christian Advocate.

Recently it was a bold thing to say that conduct was three-fourths of life. It is beginning to be seen that it is all of life,—not doing simply, but knowing and being. Never before have men been so conscious that every study and every art culminates in this.—John C. Learned.

In the sight of God greatness does not depend on the extent of our sphere or on the effect produced, but on the power of virtue in the soul, in the energy with which God's will is performed, the spirit in which trials are borne, and the earnestness with which goodness is loved and pursued.—W. E. Channing.

Men, in their short-sightedness, may judge us by what we seem or what we do. God judges us by what we are. Our real contribution to the world is not what we give from our pockets or even from our hands, but from our souls. Life alone begets life; love, love; virtue, virtue; character, character. This is the law. There is no other.—J. T. Sunderland.

Spirit of the Press.

The Advance, in an article on "Tolstoi as a Spiritual Leader," thus draws his portrait:—

Much is made of Tolstoi's manner of life. In the possession of wealth, he assumes the garb of poverty, and engages in the most menial vocations. Thus he puts himself in close connection with the poor, for whom he has a deep and doubtless genuine sympathy. He has been called the Russian Buddha, though he lacks the complete self-renunciation of Sakyamuni. Renouncing his works of fiction, he yet edits new editions and receives an income from his royalties. Aiming to assist in bringing in a millennium in which men, "relieved from the incubi of organized religion and government, shall dwell together in equality, peace, and mutual brotherly helpfulness," he yet brings to his task no great inspirations, lofty views, and assured hopes. He is thus far short of possessing the qualities of great spiritual leadership. Grotesquely a non-resistant, and professedly magnanimous, he yet thinks meanly and judges harshly of the church of his people and of organized government; affectedly earnest, he ignores the supernatural source from which all great earnestness has its issues; the national ensample of sacrifice for the poor, he holds and increases wealth; loving souls, he holds out no hopes for the soul's future welfare; and, claiming to possess and to teach the principles of a manly fortitude, he lacks the faith which is the fibre and strength of lofty heroism. Put his name beside that of Knox, the regenerator of Scotland, or Luther, the soul of the Reformation, or of Edwards or Finney or Park, and the sane mind must be instantly impressed with his immeasurable inferiority.

The Interior has the following criticism of Dr. Kuyper's use of the phrase "the glory of God":—

In a review of Dr. Kuyper's Encyclopædia, a work recently published in Amsterdam, Prof. Huizinger gives in the Presbyterian Review four propositions defining Revelation, as laid down by the German professor, the first of which is this, "God reveals himself for his own sake, and not for the sake of man, 'for his own glory,' as the Westminster theologians would say." By an elaborate and not altogether candid explanation this statement can be construed so that it will not represent God as a being of infinite selfishness, regardless of the welfare of his creatures, destitute of goodness, benevolence, and all those attributes which render him an object of love. Such a conception of God is as far in opposition and as antagonistic to his revelations of himself as is possible. It takes the goodness and divine self-sacrifice out of the gospel. It takes the glory out of the cross. It makes all that we love and cherish and adore a vain display, and it is a denial of that which it is an attempt to describe; namely, the glory of God. What is the glory of God? The word "glory" has been subjected to a change in and a perversion of its primitive and plain meaning. It has been made to stand for the fame of Napoleon. He sought and attained great military glory. His utter selfishness, his entire disregard for the welfare of his fellow-creatures, make his character fulfil Dr. Kuyper's definition. Napoleon fought and conquered "for his own sake, not for the sake of man,—for his own glory, as 'French militarism' would say." This is the definition of the word "glory" which Dr. Kuyper appears to have adopted. It is the opposite of the meaning of the word in its original signification and the opposite of the intent of the Spirit in the Scriptures. Glory is the outpouring of light. The glory of God is the outpouring of his divine attributes.

The Advance, in an editorial on "Christ a Positive Teacher," gives an outline of the way in which he deals with error and wickedness:—

But Christ did not turn upon these wrongs with the fierce wrath of the old prophets. It has been called a defect in his teaching. But was it? It has been said that he was not a reformer of the evils of his generation. There is a sense in which this is true. He was not a reformer, but a regenerator. The common type of reformer, as we have seen, deals in denunciation. He is a man of wrath against sin. If he succeeds, it is by driving a wedge into the social or national compact. All reforms inaugurated and conducted by denunciation run to violent conflict and tragical conclusions. The regenerator goes deeper. He touches new springs of action. He sets in motion a new law of life. He does not call fire down from heaven, but he calls up burning enthusiasm from the slumbering spark of divinity within the soul. He does not destroy men's lives, but he raises the dead in their lives. When the Saviour taught, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," he set a law of life and blessing over against all drunkenness and harlotry. When he said, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," he put the strongest of all doctrines against wars of conquest. And in the Golden Rule he gave the world a principle of conduct which would undo all wrongs, and which admits of no improvement. His parables are pictures of the new principle. He is a sower. His word is seed. Sown in the human heart, it springs up and bears fruit, some sixty and some an hundred fold. Cut down the thorns and weeds in a field, even pluck them up by the roots, and then leave the field to itself; and soon they will cover it again. But sow it with grain, and you will have a waving harvest. Christ sowed our humanity, trampled under foot for ages, with all good things, watered it with his tears, warmed it with his love; and the world has ever since been reaping the golden harvest.

NAPOLEON'S ABDICATION.

Napoleon had ridden nearly two hundred miles without rest, and all to no purpose. Going into the little posting-house near the fountain, he dropped into a chair and for an instant rested his head upon the table. But no. He must not sleep: he must work. He called for lights. He spread out the war-maps upon the table, and, sticking his pins here and there, as was his custom, at once began to study the situation. Philip never forgot that scene,—the gray of the morning, the group of silent soldiers, and, through the open door of the cottage, in the circle of flickering light, the tired and defeated leader of men poring over his maps, planning a new campaign.

But that campaign never came. Fate was too strong for him; and, yielding to the inevitable, Napoleon finally gave up his determination to make an instant march on Paris with the troops who were following him from the eastern frontier, and rode wearily to his palace at Fontainebleau, a few miles to the south. Bad news travels quickly. And bad news speedily found its way to Fontainebleau. The Allies entered Paris. The city,—"faithful Paris," as the emperor had called it,—instead of rising against the invaders, welcomed them. France was weary of war. The dignitaries of the empire, following the lead of Talleyrand, "that arch-conspirator," one by one deserted the emperor who had made them rich and loaded them with honors. They gave their allegiance to the new government. The white cockade and the white flag of the Bourbons appeared in the streets. "Long live the king!" began to be heard where "Long live the emperor!" had so often been shouted. The abdication of the emperor was demanded; and fickle Paris at last made ready to welcome back the Bourbons whom nearly a generation before it had driven away in the days of terror.

Treason hastened the work. Napoleon's army, upon which he had depended for his revenge, dwindled away; and Marmont—brave Marmont, who had so valiantly defended Paris—went over with his entire corps, and forever after was esteemed a traitor by the France he hoped to serve and save.

The marshals, whom the emperor had raised to rank and riches, joined in the cry for his abdication. They conspired against their old leader. It is claimed they even doomed him to death if he refused to obey their will.

Then, deserted by his companions-in-arms, worn out with a useless struggle,—loath now to bring about civil war by appeals to the people who were loyal and

LONDON DIVAN.

Some pieces of furniture are built for beauty alone, others for pure utility, others for comfort, others for the advantage of limited space, others for convenience. When you find a piece that combines all these advantages, you have a sight well worth your West End car-fare.

This London Divan may fairly claim such distinction. It is a charming piece of cabinet-work. The seat is fully 23 inches deep and heavily cushioned, the covering being of satin damask. The frame of Cuban Mahogany is inlaid with boxwood, tulip, rosewood, and mother o' pearl.

We select this Divan as a special leader for this month, and give it an unusually low price.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

the old soldiers who were faithful to him,—Napoleon, with that serenity that marks a great soul, yielded to the inevitable, and on April 11, 1814, signed his abdication.

This is the act of renunciation he signed,—this victor, subjugated by Fate and by his own ambition:—

"The Allied Powers having proclaimed that the emperor is the sole obstacle to the re-establishment of peace in Europe, the Emperor, faithful to his oath, declares that he renounces, for himself and for his family, the thrones of France and Italy, and that there is no sacrifice, even to that of his life, which he is not ready to make for the interests of France."

The tricolor had indeed fallen. The man who for so many years had given glory and greatness to France, who had distracted England with war, startled the whole Continent with his success, and filled the world with his name, stepped down from his throne; and Europe once more breathed freely. Great in everything he did, Napoleon was as great in his fall as in his glory. The empire was dead.—From "A Boy of the First Empire," by Elbridge S. Brooks, in August St. Nicholas.

DR. HOLMES'S PROFESSION.

Apparently, the law did not tempt Holmes to persevere in it; and before he had been two years out of college he abandoned it finally, to take up the study of medicine,—his grandfather's profession. Although he had already written much, and was helping to edit a miscellany, he seems never to have thought of authorship as his calling; and, indeed, there was here in America in 1833 but little chance that an author might support himself comfortably by literature alone. American literature was hardly older than Holmes himself, if we trace it only to the publication of Franklin's "Autobiography" and of Irving's "Knickerbocker's History of New York," both of which first appeared about the time of Holmes's birth.

Having made his choice of a profession, Holmes devoted himself to it,—at first in Boston, and then in Europe, making the voyage chiefly that he might study it in Paris, where at that time the best instruction in medicine was to be obtained. "I was in Europe," he wrote half a century later, "about two years and a half, from April, 1833, to October, 1835. I sailed in the packet-ship 'Philadelphia' from New York for Portsmouth, where we arrived after a passage of twenty-four days. . . . I then crossed the Channel to Havre, from which I went to Paris. In the spring and summer of 1834 I made my principal visit to England and Scotland. There were other excursions to the Rhine and to Holland, to Switzerland and to Italy. . . . I returned in the packet-ship 'Utica,' sailing from Havre, and reaching New York after a passage of forty-two days." He received the degree of Doctor of Medicine in 1836, being then twenty-seven years old; and in that year he also published his first volume of poems. Nothing of Dr. Holmes's has been more popular than "The Last Leaf," contained in this early collection; and none has more richly deserved to please by its rhythmic beauty, and by its exquisite blending of humor and pathos, so sympathetically intertwined that we feel the lonely sadness of the old man even while we are smiling at the quaintness so feelingly portrayed. Dr. Holmes was like Bryant (who composed "Thanatopsis" and the "Lines to a Water-fowl" long before he was twenty) in that he early attained full development as a poet. Although each of them wrote many verses in later life, nothing of theirs excelled these poems of their youth. In their maturity they did not lose power, but neither did they deepen or broaden; and "Thanatopsis" on the one side and "The Last Leaf" on the other are as strong and characteristic as anything either poet was ever to write throughout a long life. What Bryant was, what Holmes was, in this his first volume of poems, each was to the end of his career.

To neither of them was literature a livelihood. Bryant was first a lawyer, and then a journalist. Holmes was first a practising physician, and then a teacher of medicine. He won three prizes for dissertations upon medical themes, and these essays were published together in 1838. In 1839 he was appointed Professor of Anatomy and Physiology at Dartmouth, and the next year he married Miss Amelia Lee Jackson. Shortly afterward he resigned the position at Dartmouth and resumed practice in Boston. He worked hard in his profession, and contributed freely to its literature. And in 1847 he went back to Harvard, having been appointed Professor of Anatomy and Physiology,—a position which he was to hold with great distinction for thirty-five years.—Prof. Brander Matthews, in August St. Nicholas.

Literature.

"CHAPTERS FROM UNWRITTEN MEMOIRS."*

It is a delight to come upon a book that one can praise so heartily as this. Mrs. Ritchie's style in it is at its best, with very little of a certain fluffiness into which she has often fallen heretofore. "And my daughter wrote it," said Thackeray to Fields, "every word of it; and I fairly blubbered over it." He was speaking of one of her earliest stories, perhaps "The Village on the Cliff." What tears of happy tenderness would rain down from behind those omnipresent spectacles upon these pages if he could read them! They make him more lovable than ever. Once he appears upon the scene, we are never happy when he retires from it until he comes back again, with one exception,—the last chapter, which Fanny Kemble makes complete with her large, sumptuous personality. Mrs. Ritchie praises Mr. Henry James's essay on Mrs. Kemble as one of the few adequate studies of her character, and certainly she has written no sentence better than Mr. James's "A prouder nature never fronted the long humiliation of life"; but we got from that subtle and elaborate essay no such impressive sense of Mrs. Kemble's tragical experience and her ethical nobility as we get from the brief sketch that we have here.

Mrs. Ritchie is her own heroine much of the way,—not a particularly heroic one. Indeed, her favorite line is that of self-depreciation. It is her blunders and misfortunes that she dwells upon with most insistence. There is no parading of her distinguished acquaintance, but evidently the range of it has been very wide. Her first chapter, "My Poet," celebrates her young delight in Jasmin, the French Provencal poet, and her disappointment in finding him a very fat and ridiculous and red-faced little man. Her next chapter, "My Musician," is most pathetic in its brief glimpse of Chopin. "My Triumphant Arch" celebrates her intimate personal relations with the "Arc de Triomphe." "My Professor of History" is a bit of "silver music with a golden ending" about a dear old Parisian lady to whom Mrs. Ritchie sent money during the siege of Paris, all of which the old lady gave for the cannon presented by her quartier to the city. Her "Witches' Cauldron" summons to her view and ours a long procession of her father's friends, one of them Charlotte Brontë, about whose party at her father's house, a very funny story is told. The little lion would not roar at all, and the disgusted showman let himself quietly out of the front door and went to his club, leaving his guests to shift for themselves. Just after this episode we find ourselves reading something about Charlotte Brontë which sounds like Thackeray; and, sure enough, it is, but the quotation-marks have been omitted.

The procession of friends continues in the Kensington chapter, John Leech being one of the most notable. And here comes out the evidence that Leech was the little boy who sings "Home, Sweet Home," in "Master Birch's School." Next we have an account of a visit to Weimar, where Thackeray had been in 1830, and seen Goethe two years before his death: so much the same and so much different makes up a pleasant whole. The reminiscences of the Carlyles somehow make a different impression from Mr. Froude's volumes without controverting them. In Mrs. Carlyle's self-regulation and in Mrs. Kemble's there is encouragement for people who under the stress of sorrow are disposed to let themselves go with the current. There are other chapters reflecting experiences of travel and periods of residence in Paris, Rome, and Switzerland. It is all so sweet and good, and the spirit of Thackeray is so pervasive of it all, that we find ourselves crying mournfully, "Why, oh, why, will not the hand that has done this write us the biography of Thackeray, enriched by his delightful letters, and not leave some one else to do it who will not do it half so well as could the author of this delightful book?"

*CHAPTERS FROM UNWRITTEN MEMOIRS. By Anne Thackeray Ritchie, author of "Records of Tennyson, Ruskin, and Browning," etc. New York: Harper & Brothers.

THE PEOPLES AND THE POLITICS OF THE FAR EAST. Travels and Studies in the British, French, Spanish, and Portuguese Colonies, Siberia, China, Japan, Corea, Siam, and Malaga. By Henry Norman, author of "The Real Japan." With sixty illustrations and four maps. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—The war between China and Japan, probably ending in the proposed treaty of peace between these countries, has brought vividly before the world the extent and importance of the great changes which are taking place in the Far East; and it is not too much to say that the recent work by Mr. Henry Norman treats of this whole subject in a comprehensive manner. This book, the author tells us, is the result of nearly four years of travel and study in the country and colonies of which it treats. Much of his knowledge has been gained at first hand, and verified by an extensive study of various sources of information. Hence we have the results of personal observation interwoven with investigations. It is not too much to say that we therefore have in this book a fuller knowledge of the Eastern question and the present condition than can anywhere else be found in a single volume. It is very clear that we are on the eve of great changes in the East, and these have a wide special interest because of the relation between the great European nations and their Eastern colonies. The point on which affairs now turn is the relation between Japan and China. The war has brought us two surprises,—that of the weakness of the Chinese Empire and the strength of Japan. The growth of the latter within the last twenty-five years is one of the marvels of history, and places the nation in front as one of the shaping forces of the future. The dogged obstinacy with which China has pursued her exclusive policy makes it evident that she will only yield to outside pressure. "She has never been opened except by war, and will never admit reform except at the point of the bayonet or at the sight of the iron-clad." Japan, on the other hand, after breaking from her feudalism, has developed from within, and is reaching forward to greater commercial and military power. If the reports of the recent treaty are correct, she has not only forced several of the Chinese ports open to her trade, but also has demanded that the same privileges be extended to other nations. The means for an intelligent and full knowledge of this and other questions bearing on the problems of the Far East will be found in this valuable book by Mr. Norman. It has a large number of illustrations made from photographs taken on the spot, and also from original maps.

EVOLUTION AND EFFORT, AND THEIR RELATION TO RELIGION AND POLITICS. By Edmond Kelly, M.A., F.G.S. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—On its theoretical side Mr. Kelly's book is an arraignment of Spencer and Weismann and Kidd, whom he finds much alike in the determinism of their evolutionary doctrine for all their special differences, and a cordial acceptance of Huxley's opinions as developed in his celebrated "Romanes Lecture." The contention of that lecture—that the evolution of the Cosmos is anti-ethical—is not so discouraging for him as the related doctrine of man's voluntary power to "take up arms against a sea of troubles, and by opposing end them." It seems to us that Mr. Kelly very greatly overrates the influence of ultimate theories of ethics upon conduct. It would not be easy to make out that Spencer, for example, has been more disposed than Huxley to discourage "effort" for the improvement of society, and to let "evolution" have its unimpeded sway. Natural selection and the struggle for existence have in war their most obvious contemporary expression. Yet war has found in Spencer as earnest an opponent as it found in Voltaire in the eighteenth century and in Erasmus in the sixteenth. On its practical side Mr. Kelly's book is for the most part extremely sane. If its tendencies are socialistic, they are so with great moderation. The indictment of partisan politics is no whit more severe than it deserves. At various points there are admirable suggestions. Those in behalf of pauper farms are certainly among the best; but they would meet with furious opposition from the labor unions, and the legislators are generally at their beck and call. All that is written about the relation of preachers and politics is not rich in saving common sense. Preachers are advised that they must confine themselves to non-partisan politics. By so doing they will disarm the censure of the partisan members of their congregations. Alas! there is nothing the partisan politician so abhors as non-partisan politics! As between the partisan politician and the non-partisan, give him the former every time; for with him he can make a deal. The event has shown that there was much less of moral enthusiasm in the New York elections of 1894 than Mr. Kelly, writing in the flush of victory, imagined. Reform was a good cry for the campaign; but "the reform legislature" proved to be as sordid, as partisan, as favorable to jobbery, as opposed to every good and honorable thing, as any legislature that ever met at Albany.

THE WAYS OF YALE IN THE CONSULSHIP OF PLANCUS. By Henry A. Beers, author of "A Suburban Pastoral," etc. New York: Henry Holt & Co.—As a literary performance, Mr. Beers's "Ways of Yale" is far and away behind his "Suburban Pastoral." The college man in that was much in evidence, the literary man in this. But in that the literary man was dominant throughout: the college man is dominant here. We have not so much the literary workman's reminiscences of Yale in the sixties as we have the survivals of the college boy in the literary workman's book. Here are many jokes which would not be half so amusing as they are to Mr. Beers if he could detach himself from them and see them in their naked worth, without the subjective fallacy. Nevertheless, for those who once were college boys, if they have not become hopelessly senile, it will be exceedingly attractive. Every Yale man will want a copy. Its popularity will probably far exceed that of its more worthy predecessor. It does not put its best foot foremost in the first chapter nor the second. It does in the third, which is entitled "Chums." The next, on "Eating Clubs," is almost as good. "The Diary of an Undergraduate" is made of dissecta membra that could not be articulated with the preceding chapters. "Our Own Percival" and "A Sub-Freshman's Impressions" have a faint odor of padding about them; but it is good padding, and therefore not to be condemned. Mr. Beers has fired a laugh that will be heard round the world, wherever a student of Yale shall read his jolly book.

A CHILD OF NATURE: STUDIES OF THE OUTWARD AS RELATED TO THE INWARD LIFE. By Marion D. Shutter, D.D. Boston: James H. West, 174 High Street.—We have here a series of very sweet and lovely natural parables foreshadowing spiritual things. In the first, "A Wayside Prophet," it is a clover blossom that teaches the blessing; and, if it sometimes nods, it does no more than Homer did, or than a clover blossom naturally does. "The Joy in Harvest" is less curiously considered, and is by so much better than its predecessor. Next in order comes "Monuments of the Leaves." Ruskin is quoted here, but the quotation is one of those "pathetic fallacies" which he denounced in other folk. Spiritual qualities are attributed to the leaves which they do not possess. Nothing better can be said of "The Mission of the Snowflake" than that the remembrance of Gannett's "Treasures of the Snow" does not spoil it for our enjoyment, its charm is such a different charm. "Down to the Lake" makes a fresh use of Simon Peter's "I go a-fishing,"—a use, we are bound to say, that was not in the text until Mr. Shutter put it there; but it is none the worse for that. "Back to nature and work, when all the best seems lost." As face answers to face in water, the experience of many a reader will answer to the truth and soberness of this advice.

THE HEAD OF A HUNDRED. Being an Account of Certain Passages in the Life of Humphrey Huntoon, some time an Officer in the Colony of Virginia. Edited by Maud Wilder Goodwin, author of "The Colonial Cavalier." Boston: Little, Brown &

Just
a line

to tell you that if you want to do your washing easily, in the "up to date" way, the Sunlight way, without rubbing your clothes all to pieces (and your hands too) you must

USE Sunlight Soap

Cleanse clothes and most everything else—with less labor and greater comfort.

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N. Y.

Co.—It would be a monstrous shame if a book so exquisitely made as this in every outward fashion did not have a soul to match. But this it has in very deed and truth. The story is told as if by the hero, and, if not with the fidelity to contemporary forms of thought and speech to which Thackeray aspired in "Henry Esmond," and measurably achieved, there are very few who can put a finger on the spots which ail, and tell us they are "here and here." Moreover, whatever the measure of fidelity, the form is very pleasant in its quaintness and remoteness from our modern ways. The substance of the story is not below the level of its style. It is simply and naturally conceived, and moves to a satisfactory conclusion in a manner that is in agreeable contrast with the characteristic story of the present time. If we must hint a fault, it is that the order of society in which the story moves seems more developed than it could have been a dozen or twenty years after the settlement of Jamestown.

AMERICA OR ROME: CHRIST OR THE POPE. By John L. Brandt, author of "Turning Points in Life," etc. Illustrated. Toledo, Ohio: The Royal Publishing Company.—This book is the work of a sincere fanatic, and it is conceived entirely in the spirit of the A. P. A. It will do something to extend and aggravate that spirit. It contains a considerable amount of harsh and homely truth, together with much that is puerile, exaggerated, and absurd. A book of the same size upon Protestant follies and excesses would contain much disagreeable matter. Unquestionably, there are dangers connected with the increase of Roman Catholicism in this country; but they are dangers that can best be encountered in a spirit of absolute religious equality, trusting to the spirit of our institutions to mould its temper more effectually than can any propaganda all compact of sectarian animosity and bitterness. The illustrations of Mr. Brandt's book sink to a deeper level of vulgarity than his written matter. The most effective of them is the picture of Brother Jonathan and the Roman priest contending for the body of a school-boy. He seems to be in quite as much danger from one as from the other.

THE WAY OUT: EXEMPLIFIED PHILOSOPHY. New York: The Irving Company.—Utopias are as plenty as blackberries in these latter days. Mr. Samelson's has the virtue of sincerity, and it abounds in incidental criticisms on the existing order that are not void of sense. The practical outcome of the whole matter is a graded system of taxation upon incomes, one per cent. on incomes of $1,000, and then gradually increasing until an income of $1,000,000 would be taxed $771,150. Evidently, the author has found pleasure in developing his scheme, and that he will give pleasure to a certain class of readers is tolerably sure; but that "the way out" is any clearer for his showing we cannot bring ourselves to believe. From a literary point of view the book is extremely crude; but, as it was not written to give pleasure to the literary sense, but to usher in the great millennial dawn, any criticism on this score would be out of place.

THE CURSE OF INTELLECT. Boston: Roberts Brothers.—If Max Nordau had waited a little longer, he would have had another degenerate for his collection,—the author of this book. It is horrible and disgusting. It is the story of a man who, tired of humanity, domesticated a monkey, taught him human speech, and infected him with "the curse of intellect." The monkey is not grateful. When he comes to understand human society, he likes it as little as his friend. Finally, he murders his friend and then himself. It is a waste of good paper and ink to make such a book, a waste of time to read it. If there is power in the writing, it is wasted power.

SENTIMENT AND SONG. By James Sumner Draper. Boston.—Criticism is disarmed by a book "printed for private distribution," of which the author says in a prefatory note that it is "intended only for the tender touch of friendship and affection." To that touch it will no doubt respond, with many pleasant intimations of things past and gone; but of literary value it has an inappreciable amount, and it is both contradictory and cruel that its modest worth should be subjected to the unsympathetic curiosity of a larger world than that for which it was originally meant.

Miscellaneous.

The "Students' Series of English Classics" numbers now nearly thirty books, and affords in substantial form, at reasonable price, books with which every student ought to be acquainted. The latest issue is Scott's "Lady of the Lake," edited with introduction and notes by James Arthur Tufts, Professor of English in Phillips Exeter Academy. Leach, Shewell, Sanborn & Co. are the publishers of this excellent series.

"Webster's Speech on Bunker Hill Monument" is published in Heath's "English Classics," with preface, introduction, and notes arranged by Mr. A. J. George. We like much Mr. George's theory as to the use of notes. He protests against that method of annotation which prevails too frequently in our text-books of English literature, and which furnishes criticism instead of directing to the sources of criticism. He agrees with Dr. Johnson's vigorous opinion, "Notes are often necessary, but they are necessary evils." His own, on the contrary, are framed "to stimulate inquiry, and send the mind on voyages of discovery."

Literary Notes.

Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Story of Bessie Costrell," a powerful and dramatic story of a woman's temptation and her degradation, is about to be dramatized, and will be put upon the stage this fall.

The Sunday School Times is publishing a series of articles giving a general view of Greek manuscripts from the earliest times, by Prof. J. P. Mahaffy, of Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland. The article appearing in the issue of August 10 continues an account of Greek manuscripts before the time of Christ.

Macmillan & Co. announce the publication of a new quarterly review to be entirely devoted to history, and called the American Historical Review. It was founded by a conference representing some thirty universities and many eminent historical scholars; and J. Franklin Jameson, professor in Brown University, is to be the editor-in-chief.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co. have recently published a new volume in the "Students' Series of Standard Poetry," edited by Dr. William J. Rolfe, "Tennyson's 'In Memoriam.'" It has been prepared for school use in the careful way that characterizes all of Dr. Rolfe's work; and the book has a portrait and biographical sketch of Arthur Henry Hallam, the brilliant young Englishman in whose memory the poem was written.

The University of Chicago has assumed the financial responsibility of the American Journal of Sociology. The head of the department of sociology in the University of Chicago, Prof. Albion W. Small, will be editor-in-chief of the Journal; and the other members of the sociological staff will be associate editors. Some of the most eminent sociologists in the United States and Europe will be advising editors and contributors, and the new journal will not be the "organ" of any school of sociological opinion.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From D. C. Heath & Co., Boston. Coleridge's Principles of Criticism. With Introduction and Notes by Andrew J. George.
From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. The Heart of Life. By W. H. Mallock. The Honor of the Flag. By W. Clark Russell. An Island Princess. By Theo. Gift.
From A. C. Armstrong & Son, New York. The Song of Solomon and the Lamentations of Jeremiah. By Walter F. Adeney.
From Funk & Wagnalls, New York. The Saloon-keeper's Ledger. By Louis Albert Banks, D.D.
From the American Book Company, New York. Patriotic Citizenship. By Thomas J. Morgan.
From the Humboldt Publishing Company, New York. Merrle England. By Robert Blatchford.
From the Romance Publishing Company, Atlanta, Ga. Love-fugue. By Jon. B. Frost.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. Bay State March. For Two Mandolins and Guitar. By A. H. Plante.
Sunshine and Roses Waltz. Mandolin and Guitar. Rock-a-bye, my Honey. Plantation Lullaby. Words by Al. B. Van Fleet. Music by Bertha Baker.
The Convict's Little Child. Words by Geo. Cooper. Music by C. F. Shattuck.
Trusting in Thee. Religious Song. Words by Wm. Henry Gardner. Music by Robert Coverley.
The Wayside Cross. By Alfred Rawlings.
Genevieve Gavotte. For Pianoforte. By Wm. Dressler.
The Heart of a Soldier. Words and Music by Hastings Webby.
Ever Safe with God. Sacred Song.

SILVER
ELECTRO SILICON
POLISH
Shines Silverware
Surprisingly WITHOUT Scratching

Sample sent if you say so.
Box post-paid, 15 cts. in stamps. It's sold everywhere.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh
ANCHOR.
Cincinnati.
ATLANTIC.
New York.
BEYMER-BAUMAN,
Pittsburgh.
BRADLEY,
New York.
BROOKLYN,
New York.
COLLIER,
St. Louis.
CORNELL,
Buffalo.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS,
Pittsburgh.
ECKSTEIN,
Cincinnati.
FAHNESTOCK,
Pittsburgh.
JEWETT,
New York.
KENTUCKY,
Louisville.
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS.,
Philadelphia.
MORLEY,
Cleveland.
MISSOURI,
St. Louis.
RED SEAL,
St. Louis.
SALEM,
Salem, Mass.
SHIPMAN,
Chicago.
SOUTHERN,
St. Louis and Chicago.
ULSTER,
New York.
UNION,
"

SUMMER READING.

A Child of Nature.

By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, 50 Cents.
Special gift edition, full gilt, $1.00.

Philadelphia. To-day.—One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful.

Minneapolis Journal.—Dr. Shutter has a keen zest for Nature, and a mind to receive lasting impressions from her manifold moods in sky, water, cloud, leaf, grass, and flowers. He makes some charming applications and analogies in this volume, which will be prized by all who love homilies in stones and running brooks.

Toronto Week.—The ideas are so simply and so strikingly expressed that it is a pleasure to read it from cover to cover. The author strikes us as having eyes to see.

For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid, on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

MESSAGES OF
Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

BY JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

When you buy a house you make sure that the title is clear.

When you paint it, use Pure White Lead.

Examine the brand and see that it is right.

It makes all the difference in the world

whether the White Lead is genuine or not.

(See list of genuine brands.)

For colors, use the National Lead Co.'s

Pure White Lead tinting colors. No trouble making or matching shades. Send for pamphlet and color-card—they are free.

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,

1 Broadway, New York.

Lectures and Sermons

BY

WILLIAM J. POTTER.

With a Biographical Sketch

BY

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Ph.D.

This book is published in style of Mr. Potter's previous volume, "Twenty-five Sermons in Twenty-five Years." Gilt top, bevelled boards.

Price $2.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Spiritual Life.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troublous, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star! The Star!"

"Afterglow," like Gannett's "Wrestling and Blessing," is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged."—Christian Register.

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMANDIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

Light on the Cloud; or, Hints of Comfort for Hours of Sorrow. By M. J. SAVAGE. 176 pages. Cloth, gilt edges, $1.25.

The Religious Life. By M. J. SAVAGE. 212 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

A Living Faith. By GEO. S. MERRIAM. 300 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

The Way of Life. By GEO. S. MERRIAM. 206 pages. Cloth, gilt top, $1.00.

Helps for Daily Living. By M. J. SAVAGE. 150 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Home.

For the Christian Register.

LONG BEACH.

BY ANNA OLCOTT COMMELIN.

A stretch of white and shining sand,
It gleams along the level strand,
Its crystals sparkle at my feet,
In blue the sky and ocean meet
Far onward as the eye can reach.
I hear the sea's deep rune and roar,
Its billows break upon the shore
In crest and foam, with ruby glow
And tints of amethyst below.
O summer glory at Long Beach!

The changeful spirit of the sea,
Whether in calm of majesty
It moves the waves in rhythmic play
Or whether, clothed in sullen gray,
In storm, with surging, heaving breast,
It writhes in trouble and unrest,
A wondrous tale it tells in each.
When the wild billows headlong leap,
Stirred from the waters' hidden deep,
A moving liquid wall it rears,
And close and closer still it nears,
As if to hide in overflow
An isle of emerald and snow.
O storm-tossed ocean at Long Beach!

But, green as haunt of bright Undine,
The meadow lies the sea between
And the still azure of the bay,
A marvel at the close of day,
When earth and air transfigured show,
Illumined in the sunset glow,
And thought is thrilled too deep for speech.
The clouds are jasper, rose, and flame,
The darkling waves reflect the same.
Over the gold a lacelike spray
Foams on the billows' molten way.
The ocean, sky, the island fair,
Gleam in unnumbered colors rare.
O sunset glory at Long Beach!

AT THE MENAGERIE.

"What have I seen this afternoon?" said Uncle Burton, as the children gathered round him when he came in. "Well, I was at the menagerie; and I saw a monkey governed by moral principle. What do you think of that?"

"A monkey!" said Tom.

"Perhaps I should have said a chimpanzee. He had an apple,—he is very fond of apples; and he broke it in two, and stretched his hand through the bars toward the cage at a right angle to his own, and gave the other half to a little monkey, and seemed to grin with pleasure to see the monkey enjoy it."

"That wasn't moral principle," said Miss Mary.

"What was it, then? Not common animal feeling?"

"I don't know. Don't you remember when Jack and Gill, the setters, were chained up so long, and Jack got loose, and went and brought Gill a bone?"

"Well, you'll admit that it was very good-natured on the part of Mr. Chim?"

"I guess monkeys are good-natured," said little Jane. "I saw a monkey once catching the fleas for another monkey who was kneeling down and holding still; and every time he found a flea he held it up to the light like—like a curiosity, and looked at it, and laughed as if it were the greatest joke in the world."

"Monkeys don't laugh," said Will. "Man is the animal that laughs."

"It was all the same as laughing," said little Jane. "It was his way of laughing."

"I saw a monkey pare a huckleberry once," said Tressy, "and it made me laugh. It was the monkey that used to swing by his tail from the top of the clothes-pole in Marcia Meyer's back yard. I should think it would have made him sick."

"Who ever heard of a sick monkey?" cried Tom.

"I did," said Miss Fanny, "at the 'Zoo,' in London. He had the rheumatism, and the keeper had put him on the hot-water pipes. Sir Edwin Landseer had just died; and there had been at Burlington House—the Royal Academy, you know—a great gathering of all Landseer's pictures, and among them was one called 'The Sick Monkey.' In that painting the poor, sick monkey looks entirely miserable, and as if the last drop of his misery was caused by the medical monkey's devouring the orange that had been sent in for the invalid; and I had wondered if that strange, gray pallor on the invalid's face were not fantastical, till I saw this sick monkey on the hot-water pipes myself. It put me in mind of a little pickaninny I met once in a colored woman's arms; and she was saying she had thought the child poorly, he was so pale and so dark under his eyes, poor little bit! My sick monkey had life enough in him, though, to be very much interested when another monkey put out his hand and clutched the bird of paradise feather in a lady's bonnet and made off with it."

"They are uncanny caricatures," said Uncle Burton. "Sometimes I have thought the Zoölogical Gardens are good places to go and study what human nature ought not to be."

"There is a great deal of human nature in some of the animals," said Miss Mary. "Did you never hear of Bayard Taylor and the African lion in the 'Zoo'? Some African potentate had sent the lion over to the queen, from his private collection; and the poor beast, away from his bright, hot place, was homesick beyond expression in that cold, dim London. They thought he was dying. He ate nothing. He lay listless, with his eyes shut, now and then giving a deep sigh. When Mr. Taylor said something to him in Arabic, the lion opened his eyes. Mr. Taylor then said something else. The lion got up and came forward and knelt in front of the bars, and gazed at Mr. Taylor with his wide, yellow, unblinking eyes. And, as Mr. Taylor went on speaking in Arabic,—he looked a good deal like an Arab himself, you know,—the lion purred and fawned and made every manifestation of pleasure. Mr. Taylor went to see him daily as long as he stayed; and before he left town the lion was eating his rations, and becoming contented."

"That is like Campbell's story of the parrot," said Tressy, "only it ends better,—

"He hailed the bird in Spanish speech, The bird in Spanish speech replied, Flapped round his cage with joyous screech, Dropped down and died."

"The last time I went to the 'Zoo' I had the most horrible time I ever had in my life," said Miss Fanny. "I had taken mother there; and you know she was very old and quite infirm, and could only walk very slowly. We were going leisurely down one of the paths when, happening to look over my shoulder, I saw an enormous shadow that darkened the sunshine. It was Jumbo, the big elephant, coming along the same path, escaped from his keeper. There was no way of safety from him there, either to right or left. There was nothing to do but to keep straight ahead to a little house in the distance. And I couldn't hurry mother. She could hardly walk, anyway; and now it seemed as though it were all she could do to stand up. I had heard that Jumbo had grown very cross; and I remembered all the dreadful things I had read of elephants, and my heart just stood still with terror. I pulled and lifted and dragged mother along, expecting every second to see her tossed in air by that prodigious trunk, and to be trampled under those great feet myself; and we got inside that little house just as Jumbo reached the door and his keeper came running up. It was a place where they sold cakes; and the poor, innocent creature remembered it, and had come down for some. I wondered when I saw him afterward in this country, and offered him a seed-cake, if he recalled that morning."

"The 'Zoo' is a great institution," said Uncle Burton, looking at his watch.

"It is a very old one," said Miss Mary.

"Yes: Belshazzar had one, evidently."

"Adam had one before him," cried Will.

"King Francis had one when the lady threw her glove into the den of lions to see if the knight who was vowing he only wanted a chance to die for her was in earnest," said Miss Mary, as she lighted the spirit-lamp under the silver tea-kettle.

"Well, nowadays, any plain citizen is as well off in the matter of the 'Zoo' as if he were a monarch with caravans bringing him tigers and boa-constrictors from their desert lairs," said Uncle Burton. "In Amsterdam once we paused before an immense tank full of dark water. A man of some unknown country was there. 'Want to see hippot?' he asked; and then he whistled. Thereupon the surface of the tank began to wrinkle in great, silent circles, bubbles came up and broke, the circles grew larger, and the enormous head of a hippopotamus appeared,—the behemoth of Job, they say it is, you know. 'Want spik?' said the man. Of course, we wanted 'spik'; and the man whistled again, and then the vast object raised his head and threw forth a sound as if the heavens were rushing together,—a bellow, a roar, a noise of many waters, a trumpet blast to which the bugle call of Roncesvalles was a whisper. That was this man's idea of speaking, apparently. But it was the noise that ought to issue from such a mass of repulsive ugliness."

"I remember her," said Miss Mary. "Yes, the water boils. She was the mother of the one in London. And they fed the gigantic thing with balls of brown bread no bigger than an egg."

"The Zulus feed them with something smaller yet. They throw quantities of dried peas in their way, and these make the animals thirsty, after which they drink vast draughts of water; and then the peas swell, and kill them."

"Oh, Uncle Burton!"

"How cruel!"

"But is it my fault? Cruel, indeed. There are states and conditions where humanity is more cruel than the brutes," assented Uncle Burton.

"Once when I was in Italy," said Miss Mary, "I saw a little green and gold lizard come out of his hole in the crevice of a rock, and lay hold of a great worm as long and as large as my finger!"

"Enormous!" said Uncle Burton.

"He didn't think so," answered Miss Mary. "He carried the worm off to his hole triumphantly, and to his dismay found the hole too small. He evidently thought about it a moment. And then, just as plain as day, he gave me a wink, and turned round and backed himself into the hole. Then he rolled his eyes up at me again, with another wink, as if he would say, 'More ways than one to kill a worm,' and proceeded easily to bite the worm in two and eat him on the spot. There, the tea is ready."

"That wasn't cruel, I suppose," said Tom.

"No, indeed. That was only nature,—an incident in illustration of the law of demand and supply."

"I wonder what the worm thought," said Will.—Harriet Prescott Spofford, in the Independent.

HOW BOB WON THE PRIZE.

A group of boys were standing one day by a village pond. They were evidently tormenting something in the water, and enjoying themselves very much. Only now and then one less hardened than the others would exclaim,—

"Let the poor little wretch be!"

Fortunately for the poor little kitten which was struggling in the water, there was more grass than stones at hand, or it must have been killed; and then the great bull-dog Bob might never have won the prize.

Suddenly a deep-toned bark sounded near at hand. At the first notes the bullies dropped the pebbles or grass they held, and listened; but, when the second bark came nearer still, there was a cry from all,—

"It's Bob!"

And all the boys took to their heels like the cowards that they were.

Bob, the squire's bull-dog, came bounding to the scene of action. He hated boys of any kind; but, most of all, he hated such naughty boys, and he never saw a knot of them together without considering it was his duty to disperse them. He caught sight of the youngsters at the pond as he was starting for his morning walk, and he dashed up like a steam-engine to see what they were after.

The boys meanwhile had scrambled into various trees, and watched the enemy's proceedings.

Bob looked round with a sneer on his already well-turned-up nose, and was perhaps reflecting on the cowardice of bullies, when he caught sight of something struggling to climb up the edge of the pond.

"My!" exclaimed Jack Hunter, the boy who had pleaded for mercy: "I wouldn't give much for the little beggar's life if Bob gets hold of it."

But Jack was wrong. Bob could be gentle as he was strong. He seized the poor, exhausted kitten and trotted gravely home with it in his mouth.

"No, Bob, no: we don't want any drowned rats here," said the squire, as he met his favorite dog.

But Bob trod majestically on till he reached his own kennel, then he dropped the poor kitten on the nice, clean straw, and began licking it all over. Half an hour afterwards Squire Strange, looking in, found Bob lying fast asleep, with the kitten nestled between his big paws.

That was the beginning of the strange friendship between the wee kitten and the big bull-dog. Where Bob went, there pussy was bound to go, too. Sometimes she would ride on his back, sometimes Bob would carry her in his mouth, and sometimes the kitten would leap about by his side; but, wherever one was, there you would find the other.

Now it happened one day that a dog show was to be held about three miles off, and Bob's master determined that he should go.

"He's bound to get a prize," the squire said to his coachman.

"Yes, sir, if he don't cut up rusty at being shut up in one of them cages. Bob's got a temper, sir; and, if they do anything he don't like, he'll let 'em know it."

The squire laughed.

"Never fear: Bob will be all right. You'd better take that kitten away over night. Lock her up in the loft, and tell your boy George to feed her, but not to let her out all day to-morrow."

The kitten was taken away; and Bob spent the night howling, till the coachman got out of bed and whipped him.

"I suppose it was the moon," he remarked next morning to the squire; but his eight-year-old son knew better.

He fed the kitten, as his father had told him. Then he tied a piece of blue ribbon round her neck, and crept out of the loft very quietly, with pussy in his arms.

Meanwhile, Bob had been dragged most unwillingly to the show. He was accustomed to freedom, and resented the chain by which the coachman led him. Still more did he resent being thrust into a sort of cage, and having numbers of people staring at him. Finally, he turned his back on every one, curled himself up in the farthest corner of his box, giving an occasional growl if any one rattled the bars to rouse him, and looking a perfect picture of sulkiness and discontent.

"I thought Squire Strange's bull-dog was to be here," said one of the judges. "He ought certainly to take the first prize."

"He is here, I believe," was the reply; "but he's in such a bad temper that no one can get to look at his points. Hello, what's that? This isn't a cat show!"

A tabby kitten, with a blue ribbon round its neck, was rushing about from cage to cage, mewing piteously, as if looking for something. Suddenly Bob gave a start, shook himself out of his bad temper, and uttered one loud, glad bark. The kitten sprang through the bars; and, when the judges came round again, they had no difficulty in finding Squire Strange's Bob, for there wasn't another dog to equal him.

As for the kitten, she was just bubbling

The MAGEE

RANGES

ARE THE BEST

Examine the patent OVEN THERMOMETER, Pronounced by ALL COOKS to be the GREATEST IMPROVEMENT of modern times.

No one can afford to keep house without a Magee Range and Furnace, because the saving in fuel and food will pay many times their cost over any others on the market.

The name MAGEE carries our Guarantee of PERFECT SATISFACTION with proper use.

Descriptive Circulars Free.

FOR SALE BY LEADING DEALERS EVERYWHERE.

MAGEE FURNACE COMPANY,
Boston. New York. Chicago.

Says Miss Parloa of the American Cooking School.

over with delight at having found her big friend, and began playing with his tail as if it were a mere reel of cotton.

"How on earth did the kitten get here, I wonder?" said the squire, when he saw them together. He did not know for a long time that little George had carried her all the way, and then given her a push in among the dog kennels to find her friend.—Little Folks.

WHAT HAPPENED TO DINAH.

There were too many cats at the farm,—there was no doubt of that. Only this morning Jake, the hired man, had said he must drown black Dinah and her two gray kittens. Both Harry and Dick, the eight-year-old twins, who were spending the summer at the farm-house, had heard him say so. But, oh, how dreadful it sounded! Kill dear Dinah, the mother of so many promising kittens! The little boys, you must know, were great friends with all the cats on the place. Every evening, when the long line of cows came slowly up to the barnyard to be milked, they begged some of the foamy new milk, and, filling the cats' basin, would call all the hungry pussies to their supper. How they would run and race to reach the dish first, pushing and crowding each other in the most impolite way!

"Dick," said Harry, "we must do something about Dinah. There aren't so very many cats here.

"Let's see: there's Snowball and Midget and Fidget,—her kittens, you know,—they always stay in the wagon-house; then the old Maltie, he's so old he's generally asleep in the rocking-chair in the kitchen; those two big tiger-cats live in the woodshed, and Dinah and her kittens up in the hay-mow.

"Have you been keeping count?"

"Yes," chimed in Dick, "that's nine; and Jake said, 'Good land! six cats is enough for one farm-house.'

"I tell you what, Harry," added tender-hearted little Dick, "we must find a home for Dinah. I should think 'most anybody would be glad to have such a fine cat; and where could you see prettier kittens? Let's walk down the road and notice all the houses, and pick out a good one for Dinah."

So, after dinner, never minding the warm sun, with broad-brimmed hats well pulled down over their eyes, off they started. The nearest house was a quarter of a mile below, and lying on the door-step was a fierce-looking dog. That would never do. The next house seemed well supplied, for two fat cats sat in an open window. The boys were getting tired, the road was dusty, and it was a pretty long walk; but they thought of Dinah, and trudged bravely on. At last they reached a big yellow house, far back from the road, with tall, green trees around it and a broad piazza,—just the place for cats. How nice to see black Dinah stretched out there sunning herself, while the kittens played around her!

"We'll go in and get a drink from the well," suggested Harry, "and look around a little, and see if there are any cats."

A sweet-faced old lady was sitting by an open window. "Could they have a drink of water?" "Oh, yes, yes," she answered, smiling at the two polite little boys. Not a cat was in sight.

"I know she'd be good to Dinah," announced Dick, as they started for home. "That's just the place we wanted to find. I s'pose we might have asked that lady if she wanted some cats, but she can't help liking Dinah. We'll take the cats down this evening; and, when those people find 'em there to-morrow, I guess they will be pretty glad."

After supper they borrowed a big basket with a strong cover, and placed the cat and her kittens safely inside. It was growing dark as they started once more down the road. The basket was rather heavy; and every few minutes Dinah mewed dolefully, the kittens joining in.

"Dinah, dear," whispered Harry, "don't you know we are taking you to a nice place? We'll walk fast, and won't keep you shut up very long." And the cat seemed to understand, for she lay quietly in the basket.

Now they had reached the house. No one was in sight. They walked up to the steps, took the cover off the basket, out jumped Dinah, the kittens followed, and all ran under the piazza.

When Jake looked for Dinah the next day, he couldn't find either her or her kittens. "I guess they heard me say I must drown 'em, and ran off; but it's sort of funny," he said to himself.

A few days later the little boys went back to the city, and heard nothing more about the black cat and her family till the next summer, when they again visited the farm. The very first walk they took, you may be sure, was past the yellow house; and what do you suppose they saw on the piazza? Who but Dinah herself, asleep in the sun, and playing around her not the gray kittens, but three little pussies as black as herself.

"Harry," said Dick, "we won't bring them any more cats this summer: I guess they have enough now."—Alix Thorn, in The Outlook.

A LITTLE GIRL'S IDEA OF DUTY.

Our blue-eyed daughter with locks of gold, Rosy and dimpled and eight years old, Went to Sabbath-school one fine day, When grass was springing in balmy May. The question swiftly went round the class, And soon came the turn of our little lass. "Your duty to neighbors?" the teacher said. Promptly replied our golden head, "I don't know what kind of duty, you see; But I know plain duty as well as can be." Her hand on her curls the teacher laid: "Well, what is 'plain duty,' my little maid?" "Why, duty's the thing," with a moment's thought, "That you don't want to do, but you know you ought!"

—Amelia Barr.

THE BRAVE LITTLE TREE.

It grew close against a dingy little house in the corner of a big lumber-yard, with piles of lumber all about it, some yellow and sweet-smelling, and some brown and musty from rain and storm.

The children who lived in the little house called the great towering stacks mountains, though they did not know how a mountain really looked; and they pretended that a brindled cat, with one ear gone, that went prowling about the lumber-yard, was a tiger, very fierce and dangerous.

There were three of the children, two boys and a girl,—almost too many for such a very small house; but they were so jolly and rosy and good-natured that one would not have objected to half a dozen of them. It was Betty who first discovered the tree the day after they moved into the house, when they were all a little homesick. She was poking about among the tin cans and old shoes and rubbish, and all at once she noticed the brave little tree. It had started to grow right under the window that jutted out like some sort of a swelling from the front of the house. It must have been disappointed when it grew up against the floor, and found it could get no further that way; but it just bent its head forward and went pushing out toward the light, until at last it got beyond the window, and could grow up toward the sky. When Betty saw it, she shouted,—

"O Timmy, we've got a tree, a little, crooked tree!"

Timmy and Joe ran to see. They had been thinking of a tree to climb; and, when they saw the slim little thing, Joey said, "No, that ain't anything!"

But Betty said, "If it keeps on growing, maybe it'll get up so's to shade the window and have birds' nests in it."

"Oh!" said Timmy. "Let's clear away all the trash, so's it'll grow faster."

Away went old shoes and tin cans, whirling among the lumber piles, while thirty little brown fingers did the work of a rake very well.

"Doesn't it look sweet!" said Betty, tying a bit of scarlet braid about the slender brown thing, and leaning her rosy cheek against it. "It's our very own tree."

That night at supper Betty said, "Do you know all kinds of trees, father?"

"Yes," said the father, "once they're done up into boards, I know 'em: growing in the woods, they're all alike,—just green leaves and bark. Then there's kinds that has apples and cherries and plums to grow on 'em: them ain't for boards."

"Oh!" said the children, their eyes shining. "S'pos'n' our tree should be that kind!"

"And what kind is best for birds, father?" asked wise little Betty.

"For birds? Well, then, I don't reckon birds is very choicey. 'Most any sort'll do, so it's quiet and cats not too neighborly; but birds hereabouts have to take what they can get, same as folks."

The next morning Betty took her father out to examine the tree; but, though he looked very wise, and even broke off a tiny twig and smelt and chewed it, he only said,—

"It ain't any kind at all, I'm thinking,—just a bush like; but you can't rightly tell till it gets leaves."

So every day the children ran out as soon as they were dressed to see how the little brown buds were swelling; and Betty always said, "Hurry, little tree, and make your leaves!"

"I'll give you some glory seeds to plant around it," said Betty's mother. "They'll run up fine, and be all over blooms, pink and purple and red." But Tim and Joey had a far finer picture in their minds of every twig hung thick with shining apples and long-stemmed cherries and purple plums, such as old Nicholas sold at his stand on the corner.

Very slowly, as the weather grew warmer, the pale-green leaves began to push out of their snug brown wrappings,—such a lovely, lovely green! But one little twig at the very top had the queerest little knobs, not at all like leaves, just a brown scale and a soft, gray thing that crept out further and further from its house.

"It's a caterpillar," said Joey: "they grow on trees."

"They're tree-kittens," said Timmy, stoutly. "The teacher had some once in school."

"Oh," said Betty, "do you s'pose they'll want to stay up here? 'Cause, then, we couldn't have a bird's nest!"

"They're just a kind of flower," said Timmy, walking off in disgust, "and don't anything come of 'em,—apples nor cherries nor nothing 't all."

But Betty reached up her finger, and softly stroked the pretty gray things, and said, "It's a dear, lovely little tree, and it's making the best things it can."

The next day, when the downy catkins were lightly powdered with gold, Betty led her father out again to see them.

"Sure," he said in surprise, "and if it isn't a pussy-willow! There's not much to that."

"It's the prettiest thing in the world," said Betty; "and I just love my dear little tree."

She patted it with her rough little hand, and her father looked at her with a queer smile about his mouth.

"It is a brave little thing," he said; "but I know of something a deal prettier and sweeter." And he lifted Betty up, and kissed her on both red cheeks.—Emily Huntington Miller, in Outlook.

RUNAWAY RUSTY.

Lulu Brown has a funny little cat named Rusty. It has dark yellow-brown fur and queer little paws with six toes. It used to be a tramp cat, without any home; but one morning Lulu found it crying on the door-step, and took it in and fed it. Ever since then the cat has stayed with her, and now Lulu would not part with her pet for anything.

Besides the cat Lulu has a little fox-terrier named Fido. At first Rusty would have nothing to do with Fido. She would raise her back, and swell up her tail, and spit at him whenever he came near. After a while they became friends, and drank their milk out of the same saucer, and slept in the same chair in the kitchen.

This spring the Browns moved to a new house across the city, nearly a mile away from the old one. Of course Lulu took her pets with her. On the very last load of furniture there was a large clothes-basket, with a cloth tied firmly over the top. In the basket were Fido and Rusty.

When the wagon reached the new house, the cartman took the basket down and brought it inside. Then Lulu carefully took off the cloth.

Rusty made one jump out of the basket, and ran out of the door as fast as she could. Lulu and the cartman chased her, but that only seemed to frighten her worse. She ran across the street, and through a vacant lot; and the last they saw of her was her yellow tail flying over a fence.

When night came, and Rusty did not come back, Lulu thought that she must be lost for good, and that they would never see her again. But the next day, when Mr. Brown went back to the old house, there on the doorstep was Rusty! She had gone all the way back to her old home during the night. How she ever found her way back was more than Lulu could tell, but the little girl was very glad when her father came back with the cat in his arms.

After a few days Rusty settled down in her new home, and now stays there as contented as can be.—Exchange.

KINDNESS OF ANTS.

A naturalist who has studied the ways of ants found that some of them feel friendship and pity for suffering; and he tells it thus:—

"One day, watching a small column of these ants, I placed a little stone on one of them to secure it. The next that approached, as soon as it discovered its situation, ran backward in an agitated manner, and soon communicated the intelligence to the others. They rushed to the rescue. Some bit at the stone, and tried to move it. Others seized the prisoner by the legs, and tugged with such force that I thought the legs would be pulled off; but they persevered till they got the captive free. I next covered one up with a piece of clay, leaving only the ends of its antennæ projecting. It was soon discovered by its fellows, which set to work immediately, and by biting off pieces of the clay soon liberated it. The excitement and ardor with which they carried on their unflagging exertions for the rescue of their comrade could not have been greater if they had been human beings."—Olive Thorne Miller.

A PRETTY STORY.

It would be a pleasant thing if all people who are plagued with short memories had the ready tact by which the composer Rossini once turned his own defect into a graceful compliment. He met at a dinner one evening Bishop, the famous English song-writer, to whom he had been introduced on a previous occasion, and to whom he had taken an instant liking. "Good evening, Mr. —," began Rossini, cordially, extending his hand; but the name of his English acquaintance had basely deserted him for the moment. There was scarcely a perceptible hesitation on his part, however; for instantly he began to whistle softly the opening bars of Bishop's glee, "When the Wind blows." The face of the "English Mozart," as Bishop was often called, lighted up with a smile of gratification; and Rossini's failure to recall his name was instantly forgiven in the recognition of his pretty compliment.—The Independent.

Bowel * Troubles

among infants and small children in summer is most to be dreaded. Improper food and insufficient nourishment is always the cause. A few drops of added to the milk at each feeding will regulate the bowels, strengthen and save the child. Twenty-five thousand physicians endorse it. Children who take BOVININE are protected against diseases of every kind.

Bovinine

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

"DIRT IN THE HOUSE BUILDS THE HIGH-WAY TO BEGGARY." BE WISE IN TIME AND

S A P E

STAR TEACHERS.

Even as a bird sprays many-colored fires,
The plumes of Paradise, the dying light
Rays through the fevered air in misty spires
That vanish in the height.

Vanish beyond the stars and further dreams,
The heaven of heavens. Here in my thought the dome
Flashes about me with familiar gleams
Of birthplace and of home.

These myriad eyes that look on me are mine.
Wandering beneath them, I have found again
The ancient, ample moment, the divine,
The god-root within men.

For this, for this, the lights innumerable
As symbols shine, that we the true light win;
For every star and every deep they fill
Are stars and deeps within.

Heroes and gods beneath them come and go:
Still the heroic, the divine, remain,
Breathing from these the strength that quiets woe,
With beauty crowning pain.

—A. E., in Homeward Songs by the Way.

REV. JOHN LANGDON DUDLEY.

On the 24th of July, 1895, the body of Rev. John Langdon Dudley, whose death occurred in Boston, Nov. 21, 1894, was removed from the receiving tomb of Mt. Auburn Cemetery, and interred in the Andover, N.H., cemetery, he being a native of this place. Brief services at the grave were held by Rev. Lyman Clark, pastor of the Unitarian society, and Rev. John Thorpe, Congregationalist. Mr. Dudley having been called for a time to the pastorate of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, his grave will be associated in the thought of many with the other grave in Italy where Theodore Parker's body is buried. Mrs. Marion V. Dudley will edit and publish a volume of the sermons of her late husband. On the Sunday following the interment Rev. Lyman Clark read to the Unitarian society, Andover, a sermon by Mr. Dudley, the subject of which was "The Ethical the Essential Element in Christianity." The discourse was prefaced with a biographical statement, and was heard with much interest by a congregation of his native town. A photograph of his face was present. It is, perhaps, not often that a minister supplies a pulpit on the Sunday following the burial; but Mr. Dudley found this opportunity. The publication of the volume of his sermons will be awaited with interest by his friends.

Personals.

The widow of the late Philip Gilbert Hamerton is to have a pension of $500 a year in recognition of his services to literature.

Charlotte Perkins Stetson of San Francisco has gone to Chicago to assist Miss Jane Addams in the management of Hull House, the social settlement institution.

A monument to Ibsen is to be erected at once without waiting for his decease. It will be the work of Herr Stephen Sinding, and will stand before the Royal Theatre in Christiania.

S. R. Crockett, the Scottish novelist, worked his way through Edinburgh University on less than $2 a week. He is a farmer's son, and was accustomed to "roughing it" in his youth.

Temperance.

Twenty-one temperance associations have been formed in India during the past winter, with an enrolment of two thousand new members.

Rev. Louis Albert Banks, whose interest in temperance is well known, has written a new book, "The Saloon-keeper's Ledger," with the aim of educating the public mind and conscience afresh in regard to the drink question.

In 1874 there were 300,000 distillers of brandy in France, who were only permitted to produce forty litres apiece. The number has now increased to 900,000. There has been a corresponding increase in drunkenness among the French lower classes; and, whereas in 1884 there were only 133 cases of insanity to each 100,000 of the population, now there are 166 to every 100,000.

A great railroad corporation recently collected and tabulated all the facts pertaining to the men and conditions of every accident which occurred on its lines for five years. 40 per cent. of all accidents were due altogether or in part to the failures of men who were drinking, besides 18 per cent. where there was every cause for suspicion of a similar condition. In one year over a million dollars' worth of property was destroyed by the mistakes or irresponsibility of beer-drinking engineers and switchmen.

Education.

Drury College has received from the king of Siam the gift of the new edition of the writings of Buddha, in forty volumes, printed in the Siamese language. Only twelve other sets are to come to this country.

According to the "Yale Senior Class Book," just published, the average expenses of students at that college are $912 for the Freshman year, $943 for the Sophomore, $942 for the Junior, and $1,032 for the Senior.

In the Harvard Divinity School there has been an increase in the teaching force of the school by the appointment of a new professor, a graduate of the Andover school, who for two years has been studying in Germany for this purpose. He will be associated with Prof. Thayer in the department of the New Testament, and will bring to his work unusual ability and promise.

Illinois has now a law providing for the retirement of public-school teachers,—after twenty-five years' service in the case of men, and after twenty years' service in the case of women. The statute provides, however, that no taxes can be levied for the use of the pension fund established. The fund is to be maintained by the deduction of one per cent. each year from the salaries of all public-school teachers employed in the State.—Exchange.

Dr. Charles Peabody, who has been assisting in the important excavations at Eretria, carried on by the American School of Classical Studies at Athens, reports that the explorers have made discoveries quite as notable as those of last year. He states that a gymnasium and other well-paved buildings have been uncovered, as well as three inscriptions, three heads, and some good architectural fragments; while the excavation of the theatre found last year has been nearly completed.

Our present commerce with the Central and South American Republics is as nothing to what it will be twenty-five years hence, when a knowledge of the Spanish language will be absolutely essential to all young men engaged in the counting-houses of the firms engaged in business with that part of the globe. Let parents and pedagogues, therefore, put into the boys' heads a practical knowledge of Spanish, which they will find it not difficult to build upon a tolerably fair foundation of Latin.—Philadelphia Record.

Science.

Chinese dentists rub a secret powder on the gums of the affected tooth, and after about five minutes the patient is told to sneeze. The tooth then falls out. Many attempts have been made by European dentists to secure this powder, but none have ever succeeded in doing so.—The Presbyterian.

The spider is so well supplied with the silky thread with which it makes its web that an experimenter once drew out of the body of a single specimen 3,480 yards of the thread,—a length but little short of two miles. A fabric woven of spider's thread is more glossy than that from the silk-worm's product, and is of a beautiful golden color.

The city of Paris has been trying the experiment of establishing hot-water fountains, which, it was thought, would be useful to the public, and particularly to the poor people who cannot afford to have a fire at all times at their homes. The water is delivered from automatic machines. Put a half-penny in, and you get eight litres of water (about fourteen pints) at a temperature of 60 degrees Centigrade; that is to say, 140 degrees Fahrenheit.

NONE SUCH

MINCE MEAT

is particularly valuable in the summer because it is always fresh and sweet.

It is unexcelled for the home, the camp, seaside or mountains. Sold everywhere.

Merrell-Soule Co., Syracuse, N. Y.

PRATT INSTITUTE, Brooklyn, N.Y.

NORMAL, professional, and special training in the various branches of Applied Art, Literature, Science, and Mechanics, and carried on under the following departments: Fine Arts, Domestic Art, Domestic Science, Science and Technology, Kindergarten, Library, and Museum. The Manual Training High School offers a Four Years' Course for both sexes, in preparation for College or for the advanced work of the other departments.

FREDERIC B. PRATT, Secretary.

Mozoomdar's

BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Poet-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Croswell Cressey, Ph.D.

CONTENTS: Preface; I. The Conditions of the Problem; II. The Nature of Man; III. The Persistence of Mind or Soul; IV. The Nature of the Universe; V. Personal Belief; VI. Conditional Immortality; VII. Conclusion.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1885, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

Single copy, 2 cts.; per hundred, 50 cts.

Address Christian Register Association,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites

many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods

in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus,

love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR AUGUST.

The Gift of a Day. Rev. Charles E. St. John.
Adaptation. Hattie Tyng Griswold.
Spencer's Ethics. Frederic W. Sanders.
A Confessional. II. Ursula Tannenforst.
Vanity and its Cure.
Along the Way. Rachel B. MacMullin.
Col. Ingersoll's Latest Views about the Bible. I. Howard MacQueary.
Causes of the Reformation. S. Fletcher Williams.
To G. L. C. W. I. L.
Intuition. G. B. Stebbins.
As Others see us.
A Suggested Doxology.
Congregational Installation.
Unitarianism in Transylvania. Joseph Ferencz.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; Guilds;
Temperance Work, C. R. Eliot; Literary Notes.
Children's Corner.
NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

. Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

19. A STUDY OF MATTER AND MOTION: An excellent digest of a much vexed question, with quotations from many authorities. By Hon. A. N. ADAMS.

20. PRIMITIVE MAN: Pliocene, paleolithic and neolithic races; the ages of bronze and iron, cave-men and lake-dwellers; mound builders; primitive tools. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.

21. GROWTH OF THE MARRIAGE RELATION: Its earlier forms; polygamy; polyandry; marriage by capture; monogamy; divorce and divorce laws. By C. STANILAND WAKE.

22. EVOLUTION OF THE STATE: The growth of political institutions; family tribe, clan, city; the State's final form. By JOHN A. TAYLOR.

23. EVOLUTION OF LAW: How law begins; statute law and judge-made law; the conversion of customs into law. By PROF. RUFUS SHELDON.

24. EVOLUTION OF MEDICAL SCIENCE: Supernatural ideas of disease; the beginnings of medical science; modern sanitary science. By ROBERT G. ECCLES, M.D.

25. EVOLUTION OF ARMS AND ARMOR: The struggle for existence; Nature's methods; individualism and co-operation; final universal peace. By JOHN C. KIMBALL.

26. EVOLUTION OF THE MECHANIC ARTS: Development of the human hand; earliest use of implements and tools; inventions; the laboring classes. By JAMES A. SKILTON.

27. EVOLUTION OF THE WAGES SYSTEM. The definition of wages; economic characteristics of the wages system; wages the outgrowth of slavery; development of the system. By PROF. GEORGE GUNTON.

28. EDUCATION AS A FACTOR IN CIVILIZATION: Early methods in Egypt, Persia, China, Greece, and Rome; early Christian ideas of education; Catholic and Protestant views; the common-school system. By MISS CAROLINE B. LE ROW.

29. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. I. The Theological Method. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

30. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. II. The Socialistic Method. By WILLIAM POTTS.

31. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. III. The Anarchistic Method. By HUGH O. FENECOST.

32. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. IV. The Scientific Method. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.

33. ASA GRAY: His life and work. By MRS. MARY TREAT.

34. EDWARD LIVINGSTON YOUNG: The Man and his work. By PROF. JOHN FISKE.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

LITTLE MEXICAN CHILDREN.

The dear little brown-skinned babies of Mexico play very much as little children in the United States do, though their country is so hot that the sun tans them brown and they must learn not to care for the heat when they run about and play. They make mud pies and build houses in the sand and stones and play marbles; but best of all they enjoy swinging in a big swing suspended from some tall tree. Sometimes the Mexican papa fastens a long pole high up on a row of cocoanut-palms, and then hangs a swing between each two of the trees from the pole. Then all his little Mexican children can swing together in the sunlight. And the big Mexican boys and girls, and even the Mexican fathers and mothers, are fond of swinging, too.

The little brown boys and girls are not as noisy at their play as the little children in the States. They seldom cry or even laugh aloud. But they all love music very much; and every morning, as soon as the first sunlight comes in at the window, the Mexican father springs out of bed and begins to sing a beautiful morning hymn, and all the family join in, down to the wee-est brown baby of all, and the little Mexican babies have very sweet voices. When all the families in the houses and all the people on the streets have joined in the singing, it makes a great morning chorus. Is it not a beautiful custom?

The children of Mexico can make pretty little clay and wax statuettes. If a little Mexican boy should go to your kindergarten, he could model such beautiful things for you in the clay that you would almost think big people must have made them.

The houses the Mexican children live in are made of adobe; but, instead of having the garden behind, as we do in the States, they have the garden right in the middle and the house built all around it. And there are great, long rooms, with high ceilings; for the houses are but one story high, but only little openings for windows because they have no glass. But they spend most of the time out of doors in the plaza or alameda, the public square and park, where they sell flowers and fruit or listen to the band concerts.

Mexican children do not celebrate the Fourth.—Child-Garden.

IMPORTANCE OF BIRDS.

A paper was recently read before the Biological Society of Washington, the subject of which was the food of birds. So much has been said about birds as being destructive to fruit and vegetation that an investigation of this kind is of the utmost importance. In the stomachs of some of the birds there were thousands of ants. Over six hundred stomachs were examined, and in almost all of them insects formed the greater part of the contents. Ants especially seemed to be popular, and in almost every instance the other insects were of harmful sorts. In one of the reports of the Agricultural Department it is said that each bird has its favorite foods; but, when these fail, it casts about to find something that can be substituted. Another peculiar fact discovered in birdology, and the appetite of our winged friends for ants, is that these industrious little insects plant colonies of mealy bugs on certain varieties of the coffee-tree. These bugs are cultivated by the ants for their food; and, as they flourish and increase rapidly, they furnish abundance of subsistence, and the ants thrive correspondingly. It is suggested by a number of scientists that the woodpecker should be encouraged and protected in every possible way, as many circumstances seem to indicate that he would be the very best assistant in getting rid of the grubs that are destroying the elm-trees all over the country.—New York Ledger.

Charities and Reforms.

The City Board of Charities of Portland, Ore., have published the biennial report, together with a directory of the charitable and beneficent societies and institutions of the city.

That idiots may be improved, educated, and possibly cured, is demonstrated by the recent report of a training school in England which takes these imbeciles in charge. More than 30 per cent. of those under treatment were taught to conform to moral and social law and to "work like the third of a man," more than 40 per cent. were rendered capable of conducting under friendly control the ordinary transactions of life, of "working like two-thirds of a man," and some 25 or 30 per cent. have risen so closely to the standard of manhood that only experts could differentiate them from ordinary young men and women. The course of training in this remarkably successful institution lasts seven years.—Evangelist.

Here and There.

Five-cent telegrams are to be tried in Italy. The government is also trying to have the tariff with other European countries reduced.

Electric lights will soon be authorized in the churches at Rome, Italy, for illuminating purposes, though wax candles and oil lamps must be retained for the use of the altars and shrines.

It will cost a million drachmas to put the Parthenon, the Temple of Theseus, and the other monuments in Athens damaged by last year's earthquake in a safe condition. An appeal for help will be sent out to all countries.

"Two Ocean Pass," in the Rocky Mountains, is so called because there is a marshy lake in it from which flow two streams,—one into the Pacific, the other into the Missouri, and through the Gulf of Mexico into the Atlantic. The pass is just south of Yellowstone Park.

The citizens of St. Ignace, Mich., have decided to honor the last resting-place of Father Marquette with a monument befitting the courage and enterprise of the explorer and missionary who in 1670 established his Jesuit college, military station, and missionary headquarters there.

The sardine industry in the United States is largely confined to the eastern coast of Maine. There are in all about sixty factories, employing about nine thousand persons, the yearly product amounting to nearly six hundred and twenty-five thousand cases. The fish used is a small hering.

An old Gobelin of the seventeenth century, hitherto kept in the Hohenzollern Museum, has just been repaired, and taken to the Royal Palace in Berlin. It represents the deed of the great Kurfurst, and measures about five yards high by four yards broad. The subject is the siege of Stettin, with batteries and groups of generals and soldiers.

The penny-in-the-slot system of gas-meters has succeeded beyond expectation in South London. The consumer can put a penny in the slot on any number up to ten, and in return have gas to the value of the pence supplied. Following the example of Paris, there is a proposal to establish a system by which Londoners will be able to obtain a supply of boiling water by placing a penny in the slot.

A novel method of rewarding the Japanese troops for their services in the war against China has been resolved upon by the Japanese government. Instead of being presented with medals, each soldier who has served in the campaign is to be given a watch; and the Japanese war office has just entered into contracts with several Swiss firms for a large supply of these timepieces. The presentation of the watches will be made by the Mikado when he reviews his victorious troops at the close of the war.

A bicyclist has succeeded in sailing a bicycle over rough country roads by the aid of a sail and mast of his own make. The latter is of spruce, seven feet in length, and is lashed to the frame of the wheel with a strong cord. The sail is of light cotton cloth. While it is impossible to beat into a head wind on a narrow street, yet it runs well with a good stiff breeze on either quarter or behind. The managng of a wheel with a sail on is not as difficult as it may seem; and there is no reason why, on a good level road, with a large sail, a person should not make good progress, even with a moderate breeze.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,

The Largest Manufacturers of
PURE, HIGH GRADE
COCOAS and CHOCOLATES
On this Continent, have received
HIGHEST AWARDS
from the great
Industrial and Food
EXPOSITIONS
IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

Caution: In view of the many imitations of the labels and wrappers on our goods, consumers should make sure that our place of manufacture, namely, Dorchester, Mass. is printed on each package.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.

WALTER BAKER & CO. LTD. DORCHESTER, MASS.

GLENWOOD

RANGES

AND HEATERS
MAKE HOUSEKEEPING
EASY.

TWO GOLD MEDALS.

Made by WEIR STOVE CO., Taunton, Mass.

Books of Value.

Sermons for the Church. Twenty-five Discourses by CALEB DAVIS BRADLEE, D.D. Cloth, gilt top, 275 pages, $1.25.

They have for their object the dissemination of pure religion rather than sectarian beliefs. They are strong and honest.—Boston Times.

Four Great Questions concerning God. By M. J. SAVAGE. 86 pages. Paper 25 cents.

CONTENTS: I. Can we Think God? II. Can we Trust God? III. May we Pray to God? IV. May we Worship God?

Discourses. By EDWARD H. HALL, Pastor of the First Parish, Cambridge. 244 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

The whole volume is marked by that high style of thought and feeling which has always characterized the best spiritual products of New England, and which has done so much to keep religion from stagnation and to hold public and private conduct amenable to the highest standards.—The Nation.

Belief in God. By M. J. SAVAGE. An Examination of some Fundamental Theistic Problems, to which is added an Address on the "Intellectual Basis of Faith," by Rev. W. H. SAVAGE. 176 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Seeing and Being, and Other Sermons. By JOHN W. CHADWICK. 234 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Great Hopes for Great Souls; "A Mere Man"; The Constructive Achievements of the Higher Criticism; Tempted of God; The Price of Moral Freedom; Orthodoxy, what is it? Morality and Religion; The Unconverted Country; Two Meanings of Religion; The Old, Old Story; The Fullness of Time; The Unbridled Tongue; Immortality; Seeing and Being.

Vexed Questions in Theology. A Series of Essays. By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. 250 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

The remarkable faculty possessed by James Freeman Clarke for presenting difficult problems in a simple way—clearing away all non-essentials, and having the heart of the subject stand out vividly and helpfully—is nowhere better seen than in the present volume. For any earnest seeker after the more reasonable thought of God, duty, life, religion, the book has very much of help.

Modern Ideas of the Birth of Jesus. By HENRY A. MILES, D.D. (Second Edition.) 212 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

It is the purpose of this book to show that the common interpretations of the birth of Jesus were unknown in the primitive Church; were never appealed to by Jesus as proofs of his divine mission; are not once named in the Acts of the Apostles; are not alluded to either in the Epistles or in other Christian writings of the first century and a half; but that they originated in the theological speculations of the Alexandrian mystics, etc., etc.

Phillips Brooks in Boston. Five Years' Editorial Estimates. By M. C. AYRES, Editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser. With an Introduction by Rev. W. J. TUCKER, D.D., President of Dartmouth College. 120 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

"One of the most valuable of monographs upon the late Bishop Phillips Brooks. No editorial pen in Boston has done such discriminating and appreciative work along religious, ethical, and literary lines as that of Mr. Ayres in the Advertiser. The publisher has done well to gather these five years' estimates."—Journal of Education.

Jesus and the Men about Him. By CHARLES F. DOLE. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents.

No one can read Mr. Dole's little book without counting him a friend who makes us personally acquainted with the long apprehended but never before closely seen people of the gospel story.

CONTENTS: I. John the Baptist, the Ascetic; II. Nicodemus, the Pharisee; III. Nathanael, the Pure in Heart; IV. Peter and John, the Disciples; V. Jesus, the Master.

One of the freshest, strongest and highest treatments of the subject it has been our pleasure to peruse. Original, attractive, and helpful.—Madison Courier.

Pleasing and suggestive character-sketches, written from the humanitarian point of view with much appreciation and reverent feeling.—Independent.

The New Bible and its New Uses. By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER. 286 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction: The New Bible; I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible claims for itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix, Contradictions in the Gospels.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

IMPORTANT WORKS BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE

The Peak in Darien: With Some Other Inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and Body. An Octave of Essays. 266 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"Vigorous in thought and style. We have read the volume through from preface to the end, and enjoyed it."—Watchman.

Darwinism in Morals, and Other Essays. 422 pages. Cloth, $2.00.

Some of the chapters: Darwinism in Morals; Hereditary Piety; The Religion of Childhood; Prehistoric Religion; The Religions of the World; The Religions of the East; The Religion and Literature of India; Unconscious Cerebration; Dreams; The Evolution of Morals and Religion.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"The profoundest, wisest, purest, noblest book in principle, aim, and tone yet written upon the true position of woman in society."

The Scientific Spirit of the Age, and Other Pleas and Discussions. 243 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Religious Duty. 311 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

A Faithless World. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. F. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. F. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
- No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Crooker. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY: THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
- No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
- No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Christian Registers
WANTED.

Copies of The Christian Register for Feb. 15 and March 29, 1894, are wanted to complete files. Any one having copies of the paper for above dates which they do not care to preserve will confer a favor by sending them to the office of the Christian Register, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Pleasantries.

Customer: "Let me have a steak, rare." Aesthetic waiter (calling): "One June day steak!"—Exchange.

A French Canadian editor has been sentenced to pay a fine of $200 for calling a brother editor "a Methodist."—The American.

"Do you know your letters, Jack?" "No, sir; but the postman does, and he always tells. I don't need to know 'em."—Harper's Round Table.

"Suppose," said little Mabel, "that our pug should try to follow his nose: would he run down his throat or would he turn a back somersault?"—Youth's Companion.

Mrs. S.: "What is the name of your cat?" Mrs. W.: "Claude." Mrs. S.: "Why do you call it Claude?" Mrs. W.: "Because it scratched me."—Harper's Round Table.

Impecunious Lover: "Be mine, Amanda, and you will be treated like an angel." Wealthy Maiden: "Yes, I suppose so. Nothing to eat and less to wear. No, I thank you."—St. Louis Humorist.

"You ought to have apologized to the lady for stepping on her foot," said his mother, after the caller had gone. "I did," answered Willie. "I told her I was sorry she couldn't keep her feet out of my way."—Religious Herald.

Master (examining pupils in geography): "What is the name of this town?" Pupil: "Birmingham." Master: "What is it noted for?" Pupil: "Fire-arms." Master: "What are fire-arms?" Pupil: "Poker, shovel, and tongs."—Tit-Bits.

"I think I ought to stay home from school to-day," said Bobbie. "Why so, Bobbie?" asked his father. "You aren't ill, are you?" "No, poppy; but I dreamed I was in school answering questions all last night, and I think I've had enough for one day," said Bobbie.—Harper's Round Table.

Recently Nellie was told that birds that migrate are called migratory birds. A day or two later she saw a flock of wild geese going south, and ran to tell mamma in great excitement. "O mamma, look!" she cried. "See the my gracious birds going to the warm country!"—Youth's Companion.

A country paper declares that "Mr. Johnson, a farmer of our village, on returning to his house the other day, found in his ground-floor bedroom, the door of which had been left open, a cow, probably astray." The conjecture expressed in the last two words may be set down as, on the whole, a fair one.—Youth's Companion.

A lady gave her little niece, on her birthday, a beautifully mounted stuffed kitten. "But, aunty, I can't take it!" exclaimed the little girl. "Why not?" "Because I've got some little birds." "This cat won't catch your birds: it's a stuffed cat!" "But my birds are stuffed ones, too!"—Youth's Companion.

"The ostrich is a foolish bird," a gentleman was saying. "When it sees an enemy coming, it sticks its head into the sand instead of running away." "Oh, well," said his wife, "that's its nature." "I know it, but just the same it isn't logical." "Oh, yes, it is, my dear." "How do you make that out?" "It's ornithological."—Washington Star.

"He's not what you would call strictly handsome," said the major, beaming through his glasses on a baby as he lay howling in his mother's arms; "but it's the kind of a face that grows on you." "It's not the kind of a face that grew on you," was the indignant and unexpected reply of the fond mother: "you'd be better looking if it had."—Sacred Heart Review.

MISSIONARY METHODS.

That is a delicious description which Crockett gives of little Wattie Carmichael's soundness of faith. Wattie was a Cameronian, and anticipated an era when the black savages of all the earth would quit eating one another and attack the problems of Effectual Calling as set forth in the Shorter Catechism. Of the other savages, not black (Free Kirkfolk, U. P.'s, or Established Churchmen, for examples), Wattie was scarcely as sanguine. He charitably hoped much for them, but inwardly expected very little. His duty toward them, however, he knew very well; and he did it, his historian says, to the best of his ability. "It was, when he met a Free Kirk or Established boy, to throw a stone at him; or, alternatively, if the heathen chanced to be a girl, to put out his tongue at her. This he did, not from any special sense of superiority, but for the good of their souls."—The Interior.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.

ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.

S. E. TRULL, Secretary.

WM. E. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement.

Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building,

BEACON STREET, BOSTON,

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM

DANVILLE,
New York

Established in 1858.
A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P.O. Box 1873.

The merits of the Palmer Woven Patent Hammocks have never been equalled. Their superiority of material, construction, and design has made them the Standard since first introduced. While there is a continual effort by imitators and infringers to produce something similar, it has all been without success, and the "Palmer Patent Hammocks" still stand pre-eminent superior to any of the imitations. They are produced in larger quantities and infinitely more varieties than the combined production of all others.

Before purchasing, insist upon seeing the "Palmer Patent Hammocks." Remember, the name "Palmer" is a synonym for all that is best in Hammocks. If your dealer does not have them in stock, he can get them for you, but be sure that he does. I. E. Palmer, Middletown, Conn.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin.

BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sellCHURCH
CARPETS

at manufacturers' prices.

John H. Pray, Sons & Co.,

Wholesale and Retail CARPETS

and UPHOLSTERY.

658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston.

Correspondence Solicited.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every Library and Reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,

50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL,
Bridgewater, Mass.

Regular, special, and post-graduate courses for men and women. Excellent advantages. Examination for admission SEPT. 3 and 4. For circulars address ALBERT G. BOYDEN, Principal.

SCHOOL OF DOMESTIC SCIENCE AND CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

Courses for Teachers, Matrons, Home-makers, City Missionaries, Pastors' Assistants, Y. W. C. A. Secretaries, etc. Eighth year. Address for Circulars,

Miss L. L. SHERMAN, Principal
(Formerly Principal D. L. Moody's Training School),
52 Berkeley St., Boston, Mass. (B. Y. W. C. A.)

Mr. HALE'S SCHOOL 86 BEACON ST.,
BOSTON.

The 13th year will begin September 25. Preparation for Harvard College and the Institute of Technology. Full Classical and Scientific Courses. Primary department for young boys nine or ten years of age. Fine situation, directly opposite the Public Garden. Large, sunny, high-studded roomy, open fireplaces, gymnasium, extensive laboratories, covered fire-escape, lunch-room. Teachers: ALBERT HALE (Harv.), E. D. MARSH (Harv.), E. K. STEVENS (Harv.), C. S. STREET, Amherst. Address ALBERT HALE.

Rev. and Mrs. John A. Bellows'

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS will begin its seventh year Sept. 18, 1895. Number of boarding pupils limited to eight. Address
91 DANFORTH STREET, PORTLAND, ME.

MISS KIMBALL'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
Worcester, Mass.

Thorough preparation for College. Intermediate, Academic, and Special Courses. Send for Illustrated Circular.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. Mrs. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

In the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address
HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL,
Framingham, Mass.

Entrance examinations WEDNESDAY, Sept. 11, 1895. For circulars address
ELLEN HYDE, Principal.

West Newton English and Classical School.

ALLEN BROTHERS.

Family School. Both Sexes. Unsectarian. Prepares for College, Scientific Schools, Business, and for a useful life. Forty-third year begins Wednesday, September 18. Catalogue of
ALLEN BROTHERS, WEST NEWTON, MASS.

THE MORGAN SCHOOL, PORTSMOUTH,

N.H. This Home and Day School for Girls will reopen September 25 for its second year under the new management. College, Preparatory, and Finishing Courses. Address for circular
Miss GEORGINA S. WOODBURY, Principal.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D.
REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

THE HIGHLAND MILITARY ACADEMY.

WORCESTER, MASS., begins 40th year September 11. Classical, Scientific, Business, Preparatory Departments. Gymnasium. Athletics encouraged. Careful training. Home influences.
JOSEPH ALDEN SHAW, A.M., Head Master.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address
JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE

Springfield, Mass.

Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN McDUFFIE, PH.D.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address
E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY
Law School.

Fall term opens Wednesday, October 2. For circulars address
EDMUND H. BENNETT, Dean.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION

for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods; large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. R. W., Christian Register.

GEO. H. ELLIS,
Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, AUGUST 22, 1895.

NUMBER 34.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; The Vitality of Faith,	529
An Out-of-door Reverie; Orthopraxy,	530
MUSINGS,	530
BREVITIES,	531
PRO AND CON.
An Opportunity; The Advantage of the Free Pew Method; The Free Church System, . . .	531
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
International Prison Congress, I., by Samuel J. Barrows,	532
The Adirondack Wilderness, by Augusta Larned; An Appeal to Housekeepers, . . .	533
The Minister's Black Gown; The American Unitarian Association,	534
Miss Victoria B. Williams,	542
Poppy Cultivation in India,	543
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	535
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	535
THE PULPIT.
The Moral Element in Christianity, by Rev. G. W. Field, D.D.,	536
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	537
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	537
LITERATURE.
"Meadow Grass Tales"; Other Book Notices, .	538
Miscellaneous; Magazines; Literary Notes; Music Received,	539
THE HOME.
Princess Legend; Johnnie's Strange Adventure,	540
A Chat about Dogs; What was the Reason; Three amusing Stories,	541
POETRY.
The Comfort of the Stars,	532
Recompense,	534
Confession of Faith,	536
The Messenger,	540
New Dark Days in Armenia,	542
PERSONALS,	542
TEMPERANCE,	542
HERE AND THERE,	542
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	543
EDUCATION,	543
SCIENCE,	543
PLEASANTRIES,	544

Editorial.

In a recent sermon on "The Church of Christ" Dr. Lyman Abbott showed that he was a catholic Congregationalist in the following words: "It is said that a church that has not a creed is bound together by a mere bond of sand. It has been said recently, as a condemnation of the Congregational Church, that there is one Congregational church so broad that it will receive into its membership even Quakers and Unitarians. I do not know whether Plymouth Church was meant or not; but Plymouth Church is ready to receive into its membership either Quakers or Unitarians on the simple basis of loyalty and love for the Lord Jesus Christ. It is true that it seems to me the Unitarian is illogical in his philosophy. But the measure of the man is not the logic of his philosophy, but the loyalty of his life; and the Church of Christ, built on the simple basis of loyalty to the Lord Jesus Christ, is broad enough to take in John G. Whittier on the one hand and Channing on the other."

THE political reaction in England, which has restored the Conservatives to power by a great majority, is one of those electoral tidal waves which come without announcement, but not without precedent. Such reactions have occurred in this country in both liberal and conservative directions. No politician can be sure that the tidal wave which has suddenly floated him into power will not as suddenly recede and leave him stranded on the shore. An earnest and prominent Liberal in London, in analyzing the Conservative victory, attributed much of it to the withdrawal of a great personality. Mr. Gladstone's retirement was indeed a severe blow to the liberal cause; and Lord Rosebery could not, nor could any other liberal leader, make good the place made vacant by this extraordinary man. It is another illustration of the power of personality in politics. Voters are swayed by men quite as much, and often much more, than by measures or principles. There are a multitude of illustrations of this in our own history, some of which show the power for good which personality may wield in politics, and some which show its power for evil.

THOUGH England does not follow the custom of holding its Parliamentary elections on the same day throughout the country, as is done in Presidential contests in this country, the formation and opening of the new Parliament is an illustration of the ease and rapidity with which a great political change can be made in England by submitting it to the people. The custom of changing the ministry at critical junctures seems to an American an illustration of the danger of what Mr. Lincoln called "swapping horses crossing stream." And, if changes of ministry in England were followed by the overturn in the civil service which has marked transitions in our Presidential administrations, they would indeed be disastrous. But, while changes in the cabinet take place, the permanence of tenure in the civil service in all the departments secures a constant and firm administration and an adhesion to tradition that insure stability, and which in matters of detail may even be carried too far. There are certain lines of policy, too, which survive political changes. While Home Rule has received a strong set-back, for instance, there is every reason to believe that the policy and demands of the Liberal government on the Armenian question will be backed up and carried out by the Conservatives. Though further Liberal advance is checked for the present, it is not likely that the solid gains which have been made by the Liberals in various directions will be undone. The Conservatives are too conservative themselves to wish to change anything which has become a part of the established order.

It is evident that in the future the prosperity of a church is not to depend alone on its dogmatic accent or history. Lines of division established many years ago cannot survive the changes which time is sure to bring. The wooden fence rots, the barbed wire rusts, and even the stone fence comes down after a while. Ecclesiastical barriers have no more permanence. There are many theological notions which are bound to pass away because they are no more needed. They will disappear as the candle disappears before the lamp or the lamp before the electric light. The church which is simply intellectually dry and cold may furnish a shelter for opinion, but it will not warm and nourish hungry sentiments. Churches are undergoing certain tests of utility,—not the utility of the market-place, but the utility of the soul. If the soul has no use for it, a church will soon become a spiritless corporation. The tests to-day which a church must undergo are tests of service, of human interest, of fitness to meet the needs of human society, of sympathy with the poor and distressed, of fellowship with the laboring classes, as well as that firm hold on the abiding and essential verities of religion without which a church becomes a secular enterprise. The growing power of the ritualists in England arises not from the narrowness of their creed, but from the breadth of their symthies. The ritualists have identified themselves with socialistic movements: they are inviting the sympathy and interest of the working classes. The Salvation Army, likewise, owes its success not so much to drum and tambourine as to warmth of heart and readiness of hand. The little village church in some secluded country district may continue to plod on in the same old-fashioned way; but the churches in the great centres of population must in some way adjust themselves to the new and momentous problems with which they are confronted. This adjustment cannot be purely theological: it must be ethical, social, and religious.

In the Forum for August Justice Henry B. Brown of the United States Supreme Court has an able article on "The Twentieth Century," which gives us the major part of his elevated address before the graduating class of the Yale Law School. Justice Brown focalizes and condenses the rays of progress which have expanded in every direction during the last fifty years. He notes the social, industrial, economic changes brought about by the introduction of steam, electricity, and other inventions; but the immediate effects of these he finds less important than certain secondary effects which have become apparent in the last thirty years, and which threaten not only to affect the political future of every State, but to revolutionize the entire productive industry of the world. "It may be summed up in the single word 'consolidation,'—consolidation in politics, in business, in society. . . . The consolidating influence is not less manifest in matters of internal economy, and is as potent in business as in politics. In fact, it may be said to have revolutionized the whole system of production." Looking at the changes likely to take place in the twentieth century, Justice Brown thinks they promise to be social rather than legal or political. He doubts if monopolies have ever fastened themselves upon the necessities of life to the extent they have done within the last twenty years. Labor, on the other hand, is gradually consolidating its various trades-unions with the avowed object of dictating terms to capital. The solution of this does not lie, according to Justice Brown, in the destruction of private property. He does not accept State socialism. "Under our present social system, with all its faults, the civilized world is constantly growing richer, freer, more prosperous than ever before,—the richer less ostentatious in the display of their wealth, the poorer better housed, better clad, and better fed. Certainly, the burden of proof is upon those who claim that this civilization is a failure."

EVERY American who has had a few months' experience of travel or business in England or on the Continent comes home impressed with the superiority of the English and Continental telegraph system and parcel post to our own methods. The rapidity and cheapness with which even large articles may be sent by parcel post over the Continent, across the Channel, and in Great Britain, are surprising to one who has been accustomed to pay the high rates of expressage in the United States. A young man who is making a bicycling tour in Switzerland told the writer that the parcel post had been invaluable to him on his tour, and that he had even sent a bicycle wheel by post to have it repaired. In the article referred to above, Justice Brown, while he feels "assured that the social disquietude does not point to the destruction of private property," thinks it is not improbable that it will result in the gradual enlargement of the functions of government and in the ultimate control of natural monopolies. "If the government may be safely intrusted with the transmission of our letters and papers, I see no reason why it may not also be intrusted with the transmission of our telegrams and parcels, as is almost universally the case in Europe, or of our passengers and freight through a State ownership of railways, as in Germany, France, Austria, Sweden, and Norway. If the State own its highways, why may it not also own its railways? If a municipality owns its streets, and keeps them paved, sewered, and cleansed, why may it not also light them, water them, and transport its citizens over them, so far as such transportation involves a monopoly of their use? Wherever the proposed business is of a public or semi-public character, and requires special privileges of the State or a partial delegation of governmental powers, Justice Brown finds no sound reason why such franchises, which are for the supposed benefit of the public, should not be exercised directly by the public. He finds in the satisfactory development of civil service reform an answer to the most formidable difficulty in the way of such a change.

THE VITALITY OF FAITH.

We live in an age of faith,—not of blind, unreasoning faith, but of faith with its eyes open. The eye of faith is the capacity of spiritual perception. It enables us to see the spiritual elements which may be hidden in material things. It may not reveal to us the constitution of a mystery, but it enables us to look through it. It puts us into relation with the heart of existence. The solution it furnishes is not that which is revealed by knowledge, but that which is conveyed by trust.

But it is a mistake to suppose that faith teaches only submission. This is indeed one of its most valuable lessons. It suffuses the hard, cold inevitable with the glow of piety and trust. But faith has as much to do with action as with submission. It teaches us to strike as well as to yield, to work out our own salvation as well as to stand still and see the salvation of God.

No age has given more examples of the faith which inspires activity than our own. It is its mighty, impelling power which has tunnelled mountains, spanned rivers, girded the earth with a belt of fire, opened new highways of trade, and established new relations of neighborhood and brotherhood upon the earth. It has set before us vast possibilities, and has kindled the energy necessary to realize them. The great cathedrals and temples of the past are not the only monuments of faith. The Brooklyn Bridge, the continental railways, the ocean liner, the telegraph, the telephone, the electric light, are illustrations of the vitality of faith. They show, first, man's faith in God, and, second, his faith in himself. Man's faith in the constancy of the laws of nature leads him to attempt and to achieve works which he would not undertake or fulfil if nature were fickle and deceitful. He believes in the promises of God. He predicts an eclipse or the rise and fall of the tides with an unshaken confidence in the fulfilment of prophecies which he has learned to read from the book of nature. It is faith founded on knowledge, and it is knowledge founded on faith. If faith and sight are sometimes opposed to each other, they may also be in harmony. Their revelations may lie in the same direction. Knowledge may support faith, as faith may stimulate knowledge.

That faith which helps to make this an age of action is seen in the ends to which action is directed. The basis of trade subsists not wholly in selfishness, but in a recognition also of the truth of human brotherhood. The great works of human achievement in this age are founded on a faith in the solidarity of mankind and in the possibilities of human development. In spite of the selfish competition which enters into business, there are elements of justice, righteousness, and mutual helpfulness which reveal the presence of deeper and nobler sentiments than one might suspect in the clash of interests and the struggle for advantage. These nobler elements are the conscious or unconscious manifestations of man's faith in his own higher destiny. In the discord of competition they reveal the vitality of love, hope, and faith,—the prophecy of something better yet to be. The power to discern this yearning and the confidence which seeks to fulfil it are illustrations of an active, working, vital faith in the triumph of goodness and justice in the social order.

There are those who are pessimistic enough to declare that religious faith has pretty much died down to the roots. But this is only because they are looking at some little patch of their own shut in from light and air. The vitality of faith may be seen in new growths of trust, larger conceptions of Providence, and a more radiant view of the nature and purpose of the universe. It is not merely owing to larger knowledge, but to larger faith, that much superstition has been banished and healthier growths of conviction have taken the place of lurid mistrust and trembling uncertainty. It is the vitality of a more vigorous faith that has expelled from the pantheon a horde of demons, and sent them rushing down like possessed swine into the sea of oblivion. It is the vitality of faith as well as the lucidity of reason that makes our conception of God more beautiful and more just, and brings us into peace with him and into peace with ourselves.

AN OUT-OF-DOOR REVERIE.

It is not an ecclesiastical Sabbath: it is one of Nature's own Sabbaths somewhere in the middle of the week. The spirit of peace and rest is brooding over the woods. A gentle breeze is toying with the leaves near the shore and wrinkling the placid surface of the lake; but there is no storm nor violence in its breath. Soft, fleecy clouds are floating in the sky, filtering the sunlight of its glare. There are deep pauses of calm when the leaves have ceased to flutter and the water to ripple, when every tree, twig, and bush is asleep, and the earth is as silent as the sky. There is no death nor stagnation in this calm. Nature is simply dreaming. And every few minutes she opens her eyes, and the sportiveness begins again. Apparently, it is the sportiveness of aimless leisure. There is no purpose in the clouds that one can discover. They are held with no leash and driven with no impulse. They hang noiselessly in the air. The winds are as light as the breath of a child. They are in no working mood. They do not sigh to turn windmills or to push sails,—not they. This is an August holiday. They will dance a summer jig with the sunbeams on the water, blow a thistle-down for the fun of it, dangle the poplar leaves, or, like the angels in the Talmud, balance themselves on the points of the pine needles. And the waves are as aimless and harmless as the wind. They are hardly big enough to be waves. They are simply laughing dimples in the lake.

Nature is far from dumb this day; but who can tell what she means to say in all her coquetry of mood and action? It looks very much as if she had put on her holiday clothes just for the pleasure of wearing them, and were content to smile and frolic, with little snatches of sleep in between, just for her own rest and enjoyment. There is nothing didactic nor sermonic here. Nature is not now a grammar or a text-book or a treatise on ethics. She may be loaded with erudition for your instruction, and full of enigmas for your speculation; but she does not thrust any of them upon you. They are far enough out of sight and mind. You may ask as many questions as you please. "Nature, are you conscious of your own beauty? Where did you come from, and where are you going? How old are you? What is your object in life?" But the only answer you will get will be the floating clouds, the rippling waves, the rustling leaves, and the soft, wordless air.

To know what Nature is saying, one must learn her language. It is not the dialect of the pulpit or the bar or the naturalist's table. Just now the artist and the poet are her truest interpreters; but the best of them can only catch a few sentences.

Is it a wonder that men who do not take life seriously and men that do may both find relief in coming into companionship with Nature? The man who does not take life seriously may find an apparent justification for his aimlessness in the way in which Nature seems to live just for the pleasure of living. And the man who takes life seriously may find in the companionship of Nature release from the perplexities and problems and sorrows which come from human society. The life of the hermit is perfectly explicable. It may not be courageous or generous, but it is intelligible. In human society there is an artificial element: it becomes burdensome and oppressive; it constrains liberty. One escapes it when he leaves human society altogether. "Here," says the Hermit of Birch Bay, "I am once more free. I am free from the vices, the pains, and penalties of civilization. Here there are no prisons for me to visit, no insane asylums, no hospitals. There are no beggars on the street corners asking me for alms. Gaunt poverty has gone. Here is no intemperance, no riot, no gambling, no spectres of foul disease. I am solitary, but I am free from the evils of society. My religion is that of Nature. I worship the sun and the moon and the stars, the clouds, the sky, the water. I know nothing and want nothing of creeds, dogmas, legends, popes, or Bibles. I keep the sacraments of communion and baptism,—communion with Nature in her visible forms, and baptism into her peace and joy; and I keep her holy Sabbaths on whatever day of the week they may happen to come."

The Hermit of Birch Bay has gone to his hermitage. "Nature is taking a nap," said he: "why should not I? Here in this solitude I have lost the reality and the consciousness of human society. If now I can lose completely my own consciousness for a while, I shall be happier still; and, when it comes back to me again, it will burn brighter and better."

ORTHOPRAXY.

Orthodoxy is not as militant as it was, but orthopraxy is gaining in influence. The compensation will be more than adequate for society and for religion. It is a curious and beautiful comment on this tendency to read, "He that doeth the will of my Father shall know of the doctrine whether it be true." The path to right believing seems surely to be by the way of right doing. This subtle truth has been overlooked by mediævalism. To elevate the creed alone lost often the deed; but to do with our might what our hands found to do never left us intellectually empty. "Experience is Nature's teacher," says Taylor. "She was installed before the rectorship of St. Andrew's was ever heard of." "Set any man to lead an honest life, and he can write a book at the end of it." "Bodies of divinity" are well named. "They have seldom any souls in them"; for the only real divinity is God working in us to do his good pleasure, and that while we are striving to work out our own salvation.

Agnostic pride is a vagary. It marks no passage in intellectual or manly activity. It is the conceit that makes an idiot asylum an ideal paradise. It is a pleasant fact to note that the leading statesmen of England and America have been positive and aggressive "defenders of the faith," but doers also. The life of Gladstone is not one-sided. He has worked at political and social problems; and he has been a rifle's range ahead of the Palmerstons and Cannings and Pitts, whose believing was as narrow as their doing was selfish. Balfour's "Foundations of Belief" have reached somewhat beyond the experience of doing; but the book, at least, indicates that our age leaders are not resting in the vanity of ignorance. Science for a brief period was supposed to have settled down to facts, and ignored the synthesis of facts that lightens eternity with a blaze of hope and love. But to-day our leading scientists are, by the very force of doing, brought into a tremendous activity of believing.

But to do, simply to be bravely, fiercely active, no longer suits the times. Voltaire we can hardly find it in our minds to hate, because he was such a tremendous doer. We are inclined to honor Tolstoi because of his devotion to work. But the question must be answered, Is he orthoprax? Is he working rightly, or is he only reviving the hair shirt of Saint Sylvester and the nasty personality of Saint Stylites? Voltaire's activity went with a detestable heteropraxy. The type is worthless for human progress. Who shall live aright? Who shall live, purely, truly, and strongly? American character gets a vigor of righteousness out of Washington and Jefferson. It has never learned to love Burr or Hamilton, brilliant as they were. The immense power of a right life is something that always constrains us. It is hard to find out what Jesus was believing, he was so busy with doing. "I must do the will of my Father."

The effort of the Church in the earlier centuries to take all rightness into its own organic life led to terrible blunders. Rightness, or riteness, not only became a vast ritual of church ceremonies, but charity and love became ceremonial. To love man was to dole charities: to love God was to dole prayers and sacrifices. But, worse than this, the State was looked on as outside of morals,—a Machiavellian affair, belonging to a world under condemnation. Literature became divided into sacred and profane; while education, apart from religion and theology, was not conceived as possibly moral. This divorce of the moral from secular doing we inherit; and the ludicrous debate we cannot shake off, whether our common-school curriculum can be positively and constructively moral without teaching a creed. But the signs are that not only in America, but in England, we are drawing close to a reunion of statecraft and morals. Charity must be right charity, wise charity, and State charity, as well as church charity. If the Church desires to educate, let it do so; but that does not release the State from the duty of engrossing moral culture with intellectual training. Business must be readjusted to humanity, co-operation, fellowship. It is not enough that the Church preach love on Sunday and teach us to pray for forgiveness for our selfishness. We must do as we would be done by in our offices and counting-rooms and fields and homes. There are church morals, and there are morals that the schools must inculcate. Church and State are two collateral divisions of the human family, evolving side by side. Neither one is dissociated from the law of right doing. Good citizenship does not consist in obedience to statutes of legislatures, but in infusing our relations to our fellow-citizens with the spirit of helpfulness.

A new faith in the Golden Rule as workable characterizes the close of the nineteenth century. No one can be found who believes that our present social order of elbowing out the weakest is to continue. Every one who has to propose a scheme of social betterment is listened to with avidity. The books that have had for ten years the largest sale have been those which anticipate great religious and secular progress. Mr. Bellamy and Henry George may be argued down, but it still remains that they are greedily read because they have faith in deed. The people are with them, not as indorsing their special schedules of reform, but as believing that the twentieth century will work out a nobler social evolution. The two books dealing with social economy that have recently secured the largest attention of students have been Pearson's "National Life and Character" and Kidd's "Social Evolution." The last is a distorted bit of logic and a perversion of history; but it sings the song of human progress.

Jefferson inaugurated in American politics the principle that politics is, or ought to be, only applied ethics. "With nations," he said in his second inaugural, "as with individuals, our interests, soundly calculated, will ever be found inseparable from our moral duties." This application of the Golden Rule to government and statecraft our nation has never quite forgotten. There are sure signs that a revival of Jeffersonian ethics is immanent in living politics. The application of ethics in civil service is grasping our municipal failures, and pointing the way to decent government at the nuclei of society.

Orthodoxy will not fail from the world: it will rather increase in its power; but it will follow, not precede, orthopraxy. To do according to the best light of the age will be the supreme law. Churches will not cease to exist; but they will multiply as homes of the people, as workshops, as schools of good will, as the headquarters of noble deeds. Lincoln said, "Show me a church that believes in the Golden Rule, and I will join it." His was that Church invisible that has never wasted its force in contentions over Pharisee and Sadducee boundaries.

Musings.

THE foreign office of the Christian Register is just now established in London. After rolling over England, through Brittany and Normandy, in and about Paris, and through Switzerland, it is settled once more for a brief period almost under the shadow of Westminster. It is seldom that one finds an amanuensis enjoying a more desirable or a more historic site than the one who is writing from dictation this paragraph. I am looking out upon the Parliament Square, which is surrounded by some of the greatest buildings of which England may boast. On the left are the great towers of the Parliament Houses,—noble examples of Gothic art, with the intervening buildings of the House of Lords, the House of Commons, Westminster Hall, and the other historic apartments, which every traveller must see. It is but three or four days since I went through them again, and admired the exquisite decorations of the House of Lords and the House of Commons and the noble proportions and grand ceiling of Westminster Hall. It is surprising to think that the business of the House of Commons can be done in such a small hall, nearly one-third of the members being left unseated; but, with the lobbies and the great hall outside, I suppose as much business is done without the hall as within. There is a fear that, if the House of Commons were made as large as it ought to be, its acoustic properties would be destroyed. Every fifteen minutes "Big Ben" strikes out the quarters, each time with a little pattering melody, which expands at the full hour into a tune. With the exception of a slight variation in the opening notes, it is the old familiar tune that we have heard at Cambridge and Salisbury and other places where time is set to music in cathedral clocks. It does not become quite as monotonous as the "Fisher Maiden" in Amsterdam. Directly before my eyes are two little green parks, with beds of flowers, giving freshness and verdure to Parliament Square. Four statues adorn the park, among them those of Beaconsfield and Peel. Every now and then a bird lights on the head of Sir Robert in a kind of benedictory way. Just beyond the Square is St. Margaret's Church and Westminster Abbey. Externally, the Abbey is badly dwarfed by the imposing towers of the Parliament buildings. One must enter it to come within its spell. It is somewhat disturbed by the crowd of monuments, many of which are too pompous and elaborate; but it is a pleasure to sit in nave or transept and hear the music roll through the vaulted aisles. To an American it is interesting to find the American flag blended with the British on one of the windows on the threshold of the Chapter House. It is the window to James Russell Lowell, which has been happily conceived and skilfully executed.

SITTING here one may hear the low, dull roar of London. The marvel is not that there is so much noise, but that there is so little. One does not hear in London the whizz of the electric car, as in Boston, or the rush of the elevated road, as in New York, nor the deafening rattle of the vehicles as in Paris. The whole business centre of London is now laid with asphalt; and, though there are thousands of omnibuses and innumerable cabs, one hears only the clatter of hoofs or a dull roll of wheels. Standing near the Bank of England, where the crowd of omnibuses is sometimes the greatest, I have often heard nothing but the clatter of the hoofs, which drowns the noise of the wheels, so that one might think, if his eyes were shut, that he were hearing the march of a great troop of cavalry. The time may come when the clatter of hoofs will disappear, and one will hear nothing but the roll of the wheels over the dead asphalt. This time seems to be predicted by the electric carriages, which are now being developed rapidly in France, and which may be seen from time to time in the streets of Paris. It is very curious to see such a carriage moving along without horses and without any apparent means of propulsion. I share the feeling of a writer in the Petit Journal who said that he distinctly missed the thills until reflection showed him that a carriage that did not have any horses did not need any thills. The disadvantage of asphalt pavement is that, when wet, it is too slippery for horses; but, when the electric carriage becomes general, this pavement may be introduced everywhere. Already this time seems to be foreshadowed by the bicycles which I see coursing around the Square, or finding their way to the most crowded portions of Cheapside or the Strand. It must require a great degree of self-confidence to venture into this immense throng of vehicles on a machine which must be kept going if it is to preserve its equilibrium. Yet the other day I saw a woman on the Strand, past middle life,—I should say nearer sixty than fifty,—riding with the greatest composure a tricycle made on the bicycle pattern, with the two hind wheels very close together. She held a parasol over her head with the left hand, and guided her wheel with the right. If she had been in a drawing-room, she could not have been more composed. "Well," said an omnibus driver to me, "women will do anything!" Why shouldn't they?

It is not uncomplimentary, I hope, to any of the other good people who live in London, whether they be princes, dukes, earls, or bankers, bishops, or shopkeepers, to say that I have found the omnibus drivers among the most interesting of my London acquaintances. The queen, I venture to say, has not really seen London; because she has never, I take it, ridden on the top of a 'bus and talked with the driver. No private livery, however exalted, can furnish the same privilege. It would cost her majesty but a penny if she did not ride too far. She would not have to send word in advance to see that the driver was becomingly dressed. The London omnibus driver belongs ostensibly to the gentry. His boots are blacked every morning, and he wears a stove-pipe hat. When a man attains these two extremes of gentility in London, he may be fairly indifferent as to what comes between them. His coat may be shabby; but he is fitted to enter the presence of kings, on the highways at least. There are drivers who assert the liberty of their profession, and affect a more youthful and nobby appearance by wearing Derbys and very high collars; but such a levity in costume is more frequently left to the conductor, who never, that I am aware of, boasts a high hat. The mademoiselle who comes with us to London for the first time finds it drôle that these drivers and conductors can wear just what they please; that they are too aristocratic to wear a uniform, such as prevails in Paris or as she will see in Boston or New York. There is a convenience in the uniform. It helps to distinguish the conductor from the passengers. Yet this distinction in clothing did not prevent two Germans in Boston last spring from seriously assuming that I was the conductor and tendering me their fare. They were a little surprised when I thanked them for their generosity, and told them I had already paid mine. I have long been an honorary conductor, without emolument, on the Boston lines, accustomed to stand on the platform and ring the bell when my associate on duty was wedged in the mass of ninety passengers in the middle of the car, and dependent for information upon the "All rights!" or the go-ahead bell from the rear end; and only once have I pulled the wrong cord and registered a passenger on the dial instead of summoning the motorman to let one off. The company failed to profit by this mistake in exacting five cents from the driver to square accounts; for the next man who got on was not counted, and there were no "spotters" in the "freight" to report the omission. The London omnibus conductor and his Paris confrère know nothing of the joy of having a 'bus or car so loaded down from stem to stern that it is only by cutting his way through like a snow-plough that the conductor can collect the fare. In London and Paris, strange to say, an omnibus never carries more than it can hold; and the horses consequently never have to draw more than they can pull. It is a little aggravating to the impetuous American to see 'bus after 'bus pass him in Paris marked complet, and find himself obliged to get a ticket at an omnibus station, and wait his turn for a place; but it is merciful to the beast and to the passengers. Electricity has rendered mercy to horses superfluous in some American cities, and mercy to passengers is something we may attain in the distant future.

If the London omnibus driver illustrates the conservative respectability of the English gentry, the vehicle he drives is bizarre enough. I have never seen a vehicle which had so much geography painted on the outside. Apparently, at first sight, every omnibus goes everywhere. All you have to consider is the matter of color. Experience rectifies this error. You find that there is some difference in the medley of names, and that all you dare to affirm is that every white omnibus goes to as many places as every brown one. Then comes the difficulty of distinguishing between the geography and the advertisements. If the geography abounds, the advertisements do much more abound. When I was in London a few years ago, soap seemed to have the predominance; but now there is hardly an omnibus rolling that is not pledged to "Nestle's Milk." No amount of agitation seems to break the globules of this advertisement. It is never "Nestle's Cream" nor "Nestle's Butter," but always "Nestle's Milk." I never saw milk that would bear so much transportation without souring. I do not know who Nestle is; but it is only because the omnibuses do not give any more information,—do not carry the biography, so to speak, beyond the period of lactation. The Paris 'bus, on the other hand, is sobriety itself. Instead of a bill of geographical particulars, a single conspicuous signboard on the top or above the windows indicates the destination; and no advertisement, not even of soap or milk, is allowed to settle on the outside. The tramway driver in Paris, instead of sounding a gong with his foot, works a pneumatic horn with that member, which utters a warning toot, like a nursery trumpet.

BUT now the London roar has become fainter, and now it is drowned by the peals of Westminster ringing out on the hazy air. The lights are dimly burning in the Square. The great towers loom up like massive sentinels. It is ten o'clock. The government offices have been closed long since. But, if we cross St. James Park, we shall find the sentinels pacing before Marlborough House and Piccadilly all aglare. But I am going to roost near the birds in Russell Square.

Brevities.

"Home again, home again, on a foreign shore!" was the popular and appropriate song at the Shayback camp in Canada about a week ago.

In his Chester speech Mr. Gladstone put the Armenian matter in a nutshell when he said that the Porte would listen to the word "must," but would not listen to the word "ought."

The city church bell is taking a vacation while the minister is trying to recover his tone. But bell and minister will both, we hope, ring out all the better when they are set swinging again.

The lectures delivered at the Plymouth School of Ethics have been faithfully reported in the Transcript, and thus sent far and wide over the country. What is more, there is abundant evidence that they have been read and appreciated.

At the "Shayback Camp" at Birch Bay, on Lake Memphremagog, Canada, the editor of the Christian Register conducted the morning service in the cabin on Sunday. At the evening service of song, which is held in the camp barge, on the lake, with a flotilla of boats from the Holbrook Camp, thirty-eight were present.

We protest against the people of the Sandwich Islands holding Boston responsible for Mr. Joseph Cook. Boston has done something for the education of Mr. Cook; but to hold it responsible for his Fourth of July orations when abroad is too much. It is quite as bad as it would be to make Boston responsible for Col. Ingersoll.

John Burroughs was reported at Plymouth last week as saying that, when his grapes are especially fine in flavor, but somewhat poor in appearance, he always sends them to Boston. If, however, they are fine in appearance, but not so good in flavor, he sends them to New York. Now, we want to know where he sends those that excel both in appearance and flavor?

The death of Baron Tauchnitz will remind many of their past indebtedness to the man who provided the best of English fiction for travellers and residents in Continental countries. The pale yellow covers of "a Tauchnitz edition" harmonize well with a red Baedeker; though many, too, are the foreigners who have appreciated the convenience and cheapness of these books.

We are indebted to Rev. W. C. Gannett for sending us the sermon which appears this week. It was preached some years ago at the ordination of Rev. Reuben Thomas of Brookline, and again when our own Mr. Dole was ordained to the orthodox ministry in Portland. It was received with censure by many of the conservative ministers who heard it; but it is still a good illustration of the emphasis which progressive Orthodoxy lays on the moral element in Christianity.

Miss Frances E. Willard, in an interesting article in the Independent on "The English Elections," says: "The election of Mr. Asquith, Home Secretary, is perhaps the most cheering indication of the campaign. He not only holds his seat, but has increased his majority; and yet he stood out manfully for the Newcastle programme, including the local control of the liquor traffic,—a triumph that is only to be explained by his hold on the wage-working class on account of the 'Parish Councils Bill,' the 'Factory Acts,' the work for prison reform, and many other admirable measures in the interest of the people, of which he has been the chief defender in the House of Commons." Mr. Asquith is a man of great ability, who could be ill spared from the House of Commons.

Pro and Con.

AN OPPORTUNITY.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Have any of our churches copies of "Hymn and Tune Book and Liturgy," or any hymn and responsive service-book, which they would be glad to give for the purpose of assisting a new movement at Rockville, Conn.? If so, please notify Rev. E. C. Headle, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, at earliest convenience. E. C. H.

THE ADVANTAGE OF THE FREE PEW METHOD.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

In the issue of the Register of August 1 an article upon "The Free Church System," by "Layman," does not correctly represent the significance of this plan, which was recommended at the annual meeting of the American Unitarian Association.

To have the pews in a church free does not imply any lack of business method in the support of the church. On the contrary, the plan of free pews should be associated with the most strictly business-like conduct of the affairs of the church. It is not reasonable for those who are connected with a church where the pews are free to suppose that they will not be called upon to contribute to the support of the church in some manner. But the especial feature of the free pew system is that the contributions are entirely independent of the sittings occupied. There should be a definite statement upon the part of all who are interested in the church, and who are able to make any pecuniary contribution, as to the amount that will be given. But, in determining upon this sum, there will be no consideration of any direct return in the way of a particular pew. A large contributor will not demand that he shall have an especially desirable pew in consequence of his large contribution. He is contributing toward the maintenance of a church in which he is interested, both for the sake of the moral and spiritual benefit to himself and to the community; but he will not desire any better pew than another has who pays much less. The man with small family, who requires but few seats, will not insist that he shall have assigned to him an entire pew simply because his payment is large; while the man with a large family, but possessed of small means, has to take an inferior pew or a few seats in a more desirable position.

Indeed, the person believing in the church will contribute to its support even though he may seldom or never be able to attend the services. But it is manifestly inappropriate that the contribution of such a person should be in the form of rental of a pew or of any portion of one. The thought of any quid pro quo in making payment toward the support of a church is a vicious element. It is not necessary to a thoroughly business-like management of the church's finances. If it is desired that there be a special assignment of pews, this can be made just as well where there is no fixed rental as when a particular price is set upon each pew. The assignment of pews should be kept entirely separate from the question of money contributed for the church. But any form of special assignment of pews is undesirable. Nothing is accomplished by it where the number of the congregation is smaller than the seating capacity of the church, since every one can take the seat which might be assigned to him. Common courtesy, together with a little tact and skill on the part of the ushers, can provide for the various tastes of different people.

But, where the congregation is larger than the seating capacity, the assignment of special seats increases the difficulty of accommodating the congregation present on any particular Sunday. It is uneconomical of space.

A great advantage of the free pew plan is that the distinctions among people on the ground of differences of financial condition are not introduced into the church. Here is one place where the poorest man can have as great privilege as the richest. And, while every one is expected to contribute according to his ability, those who are unable or unwilling to contribute are not on that account deprived of their opportunity to obtain benefit from the church. Those who do contribute to its support are not desirous that the person of small means, or even the person of ungenerous disposition, should be excluded from the church or be compelled to occupy an inferior place. Rather is it a part of their chivalry and of their noble or Christian spirit that those to whom, perhaps, the church privileges are especially precious or by whom they are especially needed, should have the opportunity to enjoy them. Surely, it is no objection to the free pew plan that the poor or the mean may be benefited by it.

It may be conceded by the advocates of this system that it involves more effort and more devotion on the part of those who really desire to support a church than does the method of renting or selling pews; but the system is certainly more in accord with the purposes of a true church, and, if faithfully upheld and coupled with a business-like administration of the church's financial affairs, it must promote the highest success. W. I. NICHOLS.

THE FREE CHURCH SYSTEM.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

There is perhaps no need to add to what your correspondent "W." has already well said in reply to "Layman." But I should like to call the attention of the latter, and of any persons who may sympathize with the mercantile idea of the church, to the very interesting chapter on "The Meeting-house" in Mr. Adams's "Three Episodes of Massachusetts History." Mr. Adams there explains the rise of the pew system, and goes on to say that "it is somewhat noticeable that equality in the worship of a common Creator has ever been as little observed in democratic New England as in any country classed as civilized, if, indeed, it has not been there less observed." I am bound, however, to be very patient toward "Layman's" position; for I fear that, before I had really thought about the subject, and had been made to see how ill the usual pew system serves to express our "humanitarian" religion, as Dr. Hedge liked to call it, I, too, might have been inclined to agree with "Layman." I do not think that he knows the actual working of the pew system on its "seamy side," as a minister comes to discover it. I am very sure that he has not yet taken the pains to inform himself as to what the "free" system is. I believe that he would be interested to know how large the number of churches is that are supported by the voluntary method. CHARLES F. DOLE.

South West Harbor, Me.

THE COMFORT OF THE STARS.

When I am overmatched by petty cares
And things of earth loom large, and look to be
Of moment, how it soothes and comforts me
To step into the night and feel the airs

Of heaven fan my cheek, and, best of all,
Gaze up into those all-uncharted seas
Where swim the stately planets! such as these
Make mortal fret seem slight and temporal.

I muse on what of Life may stir among Those spaces knowing naught of metes nor bars;
Undreamed of dramas played in outmost stars,
And lyrics by archangels grandly sung.

I grow familiar with the solar runes
And comprehend of worlds the mystic birth,— Ringed Saturn, Mars, whose fashion apes the earth,
And Jupiter, the giant, with his moons.

Then, dizzy with the unspeakable sights above,
Rebuked by vast on vast, my puny heart
Is greated for its transitory part,
My trouble merged in wonder and in love.

—Richard Burton, in the Congregationalist.

INTERNATIONAL PRISON CONGRESS.

BY SAMUEL J. BARROWS, SECRETARY OF THE AMERICAN DELEGATION.

I.

PREPARATION AND ORGANIZATION.

One reason why the International Prison Congress, which closed its sessions a few weeks ago at Paris, was a success, is because great pains were taken to make it successful. Such large gatherings are not successful by accident. Somebody has had to do a great deal of hard work to prepare for them and to conduct them to right issues. There may be a success which comes from spontaneity, when the flaming tongues of inspiration kindle such a Pentecostal gathering; but, for the most part, the success is the result not of electric flashes from the skies, but of those which come from wires which have been wisely laid, batteries carefully connected, or motors previously planted. So, looking back upon this conference, I should say that what was most valuable in it was not that which sprang from spontaneous discussion, but the more carefully elaborated papers which laid the foundation for such discussion and the winnowed contributions which will be gathered together in the Proceedings.

The great preparations made for this Congress run back for more than two years. It was not the preparation of private or volunteer activity alone: the French government threw all its resources of organization, labor, and money into the scale. The Fourth National Congress, held five years ago at St. Petersburg, had been a great success. The French government determined that that held at Paris should not be less successful. At the head, and representing the French government in the work of preparation, stood M. Leygues, the Minister of the Interior; but the working and organizing force and guiding brain was that of M. Duflos, director of penitentiary administration in France. A committee of organization embracing chiefs of other divisions was also formed; and, with this compact and official representation, backed up by the interest and encouragement of all interested in penal problems, the work of preparing for the conference went on. There is, of course, also a permanent Committee of the Congress, which holds over from one gathering to another, whose officers were in close alliance with the French committee.

More than a year before the Congress was to meet, the different governments of the world were asked to send official representatives. The application was formally made to our country through the French ambassador to the Department of State, and by it referred to the Bureau of Education, which invited the National Prison Congress to elect delegates to be officially commissioned by the Secretary of State. Other delegates were commissioned by the governors of the States. Our own government, however, makes no appropriation for the expenses of its delegates; nor does it pay anything toward the expenses of printing the Proceedings of the Congress, as do nearly all the other governments participating in it. It would seem that, if the expenses of the delegates are not paid, Congress should at least appropriate the $500, which might be its share of this small expense.

As soon as delegates were appointed, the names and addresses of those officially chosen were communicated through the usual diplomatic channels to the French government. Direct communication was then established between the French Bureau and the official delegates. A series of elaborate questions, carefully prepared by the committee of the Congress, embracing the most difficult problems in prison administration, and ranging over the whole ground of preventive, corrective, and reformatory work, were sent out to the delegates elect; and they were invited to write reports and essays upon the schemes presented, which were to serve as the basis of discussion for the Congress.

Thus it will be seen that the official programme was prepared a year or two ahead; and, instead of waiting to discuss these questions merely in the short time allowed by the Congress in the few hours of daily session, the carefully written essays, prepared in advance, were printed and bound up into three large volumes, and sent to all the delegates some three months in advance of the opening of the Congress.

In our own National Prison Congresses, or Conferences of Charity and Correction, it is the custom to map out a programme, and have prepared papers read at the sessions, with a discussion to follow. It would not be easy to adopt the plan referred to of having these essays printed in advance: it would involve too large an expense for printing, and there would not be time to do it in an annual gathering; but the International Prison Congress, meeting but once in five years, has time for elaborate preparation, and, with the support of different governments, it is able to make a large outlay for printing. Not only were the reports in answer to the programme questions bound up and circulated, but an outline of questions and blanks for statistics, as the skeleton of monographs on prison administration, was sent to the delegates in different countries. They were invited to prepare monographs after the manner described. The result was the preparation of some valuable monographs and a collection of a large array of statistics on the prison system of different nations. Some of these treatises covered five hundred or six hundred pages in print. They were all issued at the printing department of the great Central House of Penal Administration at Melun. The labor and cost of putting these volumes through the press were not slight. With others which were printed by private enterprise, and with the reports of societies interested in the prevention of crime, the reformation of children, or the assistance of discharged prisoners, they constituted a large library of material for each delegate.

So much for the work of preparation. The points I have mentioned give but a small idea of the extent of work involved.

COMPOSITION OF THE CONGRESS.

The response to the invitation to send delegates was very generous. I have before me the first bulletin of the Congress prepared for the opening day, giving a full list of all those who had been officially appointed, and who had signified their intention of being present. Not all those thus named appeared at Paris; but the bulletin gives a good idea of the extent to which participation was invited and accepted. Thus Germany named 16 delegates. England sent but 1 official delegate, Mr. Ruggles-Brise, one of the Prison Commissioners; but there were 14 other representatives credited to England. Austrian-Hungary nominated 21, though I doubt if more than half of them appeared; Belgium, 36; Chile, 2; Denmark, 10; Spain, 5; United States, 10; Greece, 3; Holland, 10; Italy, 32; Russia, 56; Switzerland, 14. There were also delegates from Sweden, Norway, Nicaragua, Roumania, Portugal, and Japan. As to France, the Congress showed what a great body of philanthropic men and women, interested in every phase and aspect of penology, could be brought together as its hosts and supporters. The list of French adherents and delegates officially enrolled numbered 537, and includes the names of prison directors, governors, wardens, chaplains, doctors of law and doctors of medicine, judges, librarians, senators, deputies, professors, advocates, councillors, directors of public instruction, prison inspectors, engineers, magistrates, army officers, architects, prefects of police, directors of prison societies and of organizations for discharged convicts, rabbis, priests, writers and experts on sociology, and correspondents of the Institute of Paris.

To me it was very inspiring to think that this large and representative body from all parts of the world had come together to consider questions relating to the development and redemption of humanity. Its religious complexion was as varied as that of nationality or language. There were Jews, Christians, and Buddhists, Catholics, Greeks, and Protestants, conservatives and liberals, joined in fraternal and peaceful discussion. At no time in the discussion did any question of sect or symbol or religious tradition interfere with the free, large, scientific consideration of penal problems.

SCOPE AND SPIRIT.

The broad basis on which the Congress was organized and conducted was set forth at the beginning in the opening speech of welcome by the President of the French republic; and it met a fit response in the address of Mr. Pols of Holland, which followed. President Faure said that science takes on more and more an international character. The perpetual exchange which is made through book and press does not alone suffice. Scientists themselves come together to divulge their discoveries, to search together, and to blend in a universal patrimony the fruits of their meditations and their labors. The work which they were to follow was one of the most noble and one of the most arduous. To strengthen repressive action, and at the same time introduce more humanity in the laws, to ask for indulgence rather than rigor, without abandoning any of the indispensable guarantees to social order, to awaken in the soul of the delinquent and of the criminal the notion of duty, of right, and of justice, was the end which they had proposed to themselves.

"It seemed at first," he continued, "that your ideal was placed too high, and you were reproached with attempting the impossible. Your generous conceptions were treated as chimeras. You were accused of sentimentalism and of feebleness. Nothing could shake your faith. You knew better than any one that there are incurable maladies, incorrigibles which must be put beyond a state of harm; but you said that all maladies are not incurable, and that there are means of salvation which ought to be attempted. Perversity has been in your eyes only an exception. You have affirmed that human nature is at bottom right, loyal, and generous. You never have despaired of that. You are right. In the darkest and the most ravaged heart there may survive, as in the ruins of a temple, a lamp forgotten by the last priest, which burns still for truth and goodness. Besides, the question is not of substituting for the severity of penal laws a sort of philosophical indifference which would compromise public security. It is the question of stimulating moral forces and of developing generous instincts which are able to prevent the offence or the crime, and, after the downfall, of raising and rehabilitating the guilty. No one maintains the irresponsibility of the being who has failed: that would be to affirm the inutility of chastisement or of recompense. It is true that physical constitution, education, heredity, and misery exercise a direct influence upon criminality. The legislator has taken account of these inevitable reactions in the appreciation of acts and the graduation of penalties. Upon this point the tradition has not changed. But you have made an innovation when breaking with ancient errors. You have said that intimidation and fear are not the only means of assuring the amendment of the culpable, and that education and hope are also sure means of obtaining it. . . . Chastisement, without possibility of pardon and forgetfulness, discourages and degrades. The hope of rehabilitation provokes to effort, and restores."

These noble sentiments were greeted by the Congress with loud applause. Continuing, the President said: "You have made this principle pass from theory into practice. But your ambition was not satisfied. To restore or to amend is well, but to prevent is better. You have sought to drain the source of evil. It is here that the International Prison Congresses have accomplished the most beautiful part of their work in revising legislation relative to abandoned and faulty children. To draw childhood from bad surroundings and from bad examples is to fulfil the first of civic duties. To extend to the wayward child a friendly hand, to console it in its distress, to forget and make it forget its faults, is to make a good citizen of one who might become useless and dangerous."

In responding to this broad and elevated address, M. Pols, the vice-president of the International Penitentiary Commission, and delegate from Holland, said, in part: "Who doubts now penitentiary work? It is not simply an affair of justice or of administration confided to the intelligent and active care of those in authority: it is, above all, a social interest of the first rank, which demands the combined action of all social forces and private action conjoined with the action of authority. We are happily very far from the time when it was thought that Justice was honored in being represented as cold and impassible, the sword and the scales in her hand, but her eyes bandaged. That symbol of the impartiality and the integrity of ideal justice, the bandage, symbolizes rather perhaps another quality of justice as formerly conceived; namely, that of not seeing clearly in weighing the crime, but of striking blindly and without discernment the criminal. Penitentiary science, whose triumphant advance marks the grand progress of humanity, has dethroned cold, impassible, and blind justice. Seeking to determine the causes and the movements of crime, it has been quick to perceive that responsibility is not to be attributed alone to the material author of the crime: it has recognized the complexity of human nature and of society, the necessity of a complete revolution in the means of attack and of defence, in the weapons of combat. In maintaining a horror of crime, it modifies considerably the sentiments concerning the criminal. If it has not discovered those two noble truths repeated since antiquity as beautiful sentences which one might admire while dispensing with their application; namely, that prevention is better than punishment, and that justice does not exclude charity,—that even there is no justice without charity, as there is no charity without justice,—it has made of these living and vivifying principles of reform, and has infused them into legislation and administration. But this movement, so powerful and so fruitful, is not due to official initiative, but to the awakening of the public conscience by private action."

M. Pols showed then that this new and exalted conception of justice, while it had exerted a salutary influence on legislation, was very far from attaining its full development. It could not be denied that it had multiplied questions, complicated the problems, extended the field of study and the difficulties to be resolved. The Congress itself furnished proofs of this; but it also showed that, the more extended the task, the greater was the number of workers. The horizon of penitentiary science has been enlarged, and the successive Congresses—of which that at Paris is the fifth—are obliged to follow the progress which is in part due to them. The march from St. Petersburg to Paris had marked new advance in the special solicitude shown for unfortunate and wayward children. It will be the special honor of this Congress that it has devoted so large a part of its activity to this subject. Upon the proposition of a Russian delegate in the International Commission, it decided to establish a section for discussing all the questions relating to youth.

The importance of securing the co-operation of women in this work was well set forth by M. Pols. "Belonging ourselves to that section of humanity which insensibly is led to accord perhaps too great a place to justice, we welcome, above all, the adhesion, more and more marked, and the co-operation, more and more warm, of that other section of humanity which interests itself first in the triumph of charity. If penitentiary science inclines more and more to accord to woman a distinct place, as it has already accorded it to childhood, it needs, above all, the moral support and the co-operation of woman in the study of the multiple questions relative to culpable and unfortunate women. The solution of these questions will not advance without the co-operation of women. The presence of so many distinguished women in our ranks are happy indications that the Congress of Paris will be a new milestone in the ascending march of prison reform."

It is thus seen on what broad lines, on what a liberal, scientific, undogmatic basis the Paris Congress was organized, and how wide and far-reaching were the themes which engaged its attention. In another article I must show how some of these problems were defined and discussed, and what basis of agreement was reached concerning them.

subject. The chaplain of Columbia College affirms: "There is a better religious outlook for the colleges of America than ever before. The students have clearer views of truth and intenser spiritual zeal than a generation ago." A prominent graduate of Harvard says: "The religious life of the colleges is more hopeful than ever. There is a marked improvement at Harvard. There is increased desire for correct life, for benevolent activity, and for religious service." A graduate of Yale bears similar witness: "The students of Yale have better manners, better morals, better religion, than ever before in the history of the college." Similar evidence might be adduced from many other sources, and from a wide examination of the social condition of young men of the time.

The Watchman makes this forecast of "The New Interpretation":—

Religious men everywhere are conscious that during the last twenty years a change, which the most inveterate conservative cannot ignore, has passed over the conceptions of truth as held by the churches. There is no Protestant denomination which has not been affected by this change, and the Roman Catholic Church has been more profoundly influenced by it than any one of them. To the superficial observer it seems as if the movement had been in the direction of a denial of supernatural Christianity. That, however, is hardly a just account of the matter; for, strenuous as the battle has been between the Naturalists and the Supernaturalists in the closing years of the century, the latter are victorious along almost the entire line, and some of their strongest opponents have become their allies. But the conflict within the ranks of those who hold to supernatural Christianity, though it has attracted less attention, has been hardly less significant. There the contest has been waged between a legal and a mechanical interpretation of the great Christian doctrines and a spiritual and vital one. The cause of Supernatural Christianity is winning a great triumph; but the ideas that are dominating the victorious party, and have the promise of the future, are those of the men who insist that the Bible is a book of principles and motives rather than of statutes, that the true analogies of spiritual truth are to be found in the processes of life rather than in the realm of mechanics, and that the adaptation of a doctrine to the needs of a spiritual life is a unique authentication of its truth. The modern study of biology, and the increasing attention paid to the phenomena of consciousness, have powerfully contributed to this tendency. It is probably quite within bounds to say that during the last decade few theological treatises or volumes of sermons have won a large recognition which have not enforced the conceptions or been wrought out in the temper of which we speak.

The Churchman discourses in this vein on "Clerical Poverty":—

In the June number of the Protestant Episcopal Review appears a remarkable article entitled "The Power of Poverty." A more accurate heading would be "Poverty as a Power," since that is what is intended to be shown. The general idea of the paper seems to be that the clergy, whom the writer considers to be greatly lacking in their hold upon the masses, would greatly gain in spiritual influence by taking up voluntary poverty. As is not infrequently the case in treating a large subject so as to deal with a smaller one, the author falls upon two or three conflicting issues. He starts with the example and teachings of our Lord to prove that poverty is both a duty and a blessing for the clergy. The trouble is that these, if taken, as the writer says they should be, absolutely and literally, prove too much. The words and the pattern of Christ are for all disciples, and not for the clergy alone. Taken as our author uses them, they must mean that wealth is a snare which Christians should shun. He sneers at the phrase "consecrated wealth," and evidently doubts that such a thing can be. If the kingdom of heaven is the heritage of the poor, it is that of the poor layman as well as the poor cleric. Here is the plain proposition: Christianity and wealth are incompatible. If this be so, then the whole matter is settled at the start.

We hardly need to discuss the citations of our author exegetically. It is clear to most educated Christian thinkers that words spoken with evident regard to the life of Judea in our Lord's time cannot be applied literally to succeeding ages and changed conditions. If a tramp were to meet the author of the Review article on the street and to seize his overcoat, he would hardly, we think, follow out the Lord's command, and bestow upon him his cassock, coat, and waistcoat, but would call the nearest policeman to arrest the robber. If the conversion of the world was to be to poverty, by poverty, then the Church of Christ went astray just in proportion as it outgrew the little community at Jerusalem. It is only necessary to show the example of the apostles, who may be presumed to understand the force of their Lord's words. Saint Paul shows clearly that the apostles were maintained by the Church in answering the charge that he supported himself by his own labors. The wandering career of our Lord and his disciples in the brief years of his ministry was possible only under the conditions of Oriental life at that day, and was called for only by the special needs of his work.

Literature.

"MEADOW GRASS TALES."*

To criticise a book and say no ill of it whatever is manifestly a gratuitous derogation from one's assumed prerogative; but, if we are going to speak ill of this book, it must be in the matter of externals. Item: the design of the cover is a piece of silly affectation, which might go well with some of the "erotic, neurotic, tommyrotic" poetry that is being published in England in these days at the sign of the Bodley Head, but is entirely out of place, with its gilt horse-pond and its arrangement of pollards, on the cover of a book in which compacted lie a baker's dozen of the homeliest possible transcriptions of New England life. Item: with a superabundance of outer margin, the inner margins of the book are narrow to a degree that adds nothing to its appearance, and makes it much more difficult to read.

And now, having satisfied the claims of critical impartiality, we will proceed to make the comparative remark upon the book which every reader will expect. It belongs to the same genus as the stories of Mary E. Wilkins, Sarah Orne Jewett, and Miss Fuller, the author of "Pratt Portraits" and other pleasant things. Its species is allied more closely to Miss Wilkins's than to Miss Jewett's. The dramatis personæ are a more peculiar people than Miss Jewett's. But the temper of the book is less gaunt and grim than that of Miss Wilkins's stories generally: its tone is less cheerless and depressing. Here, too, we have a "Mother's Revolt," though it is called "Heartsease." Indeed, three or four of the stories are stories of revolt in one way or another. But each in its turn is as unique in its conception as if Miss Brown had no such cousins-in-art as Misses Wilkins, Jewett, and Fuller. Not only is this so, but the style and manner of the book are all the writer's own, and wonderfully bright and good they are,—quiet, too, without a line of that small cackle of smartness and exaggeration which is the stock in trade of Kate Douglas Wiggin and some others. The first portion of this scripture, "Number Five," is not a story, but a murmurous stream of happy reminiscences, which, beginning at a district school-house, widens out into the tender history of many village folk of days long since. We could wish that every reader of this portion might have it illustrated, as was our own copy, by God's own hand, seeing that we read it not as we ran, but as we rode, and, flower for flower, matched those upon the page with those along the roadside's loveliness of tangled shrub and vine. Each of the twelve stories following this delightful prelude has its special charm. In one, "At Ludleigh Fair," we seem to hear a note of unreality that makes a discord for the mind. Some are more amusing than others, some more tender; but all have a sure artistic comprehension of the values of the social scenery of a New England village, still cherishing the simpler manners of the olden time. We have reserved the climax of our praise for the beautiful idyllic thing called "Bankrupt." One must go to the early love passages in "Richard Feverel" for anything so lyrical in its sweetness as the passage on pages 240-242. Thanks, Alice Brown, for the unstained delight and satisfaction we have had in your book; and we are sure that we have spoken "that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed."

ENGLISH SEAMEN IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY. Lectures delivered at Oxford, Easter Terms, 1893-94. By James Anthony Froude, late Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—Another book from Froude reads somewhat differ-ently in the shadow of his death than it would if he were still alive. One thing is sure,—that the book is extremely interesting: one more interesting never trickled from his pen. Its thesis is that the English navy is a product of the Spanish Inquisition, and his argument is remarkably impressive. Within a lifetime the English seamen changed their status from that of a set of harmless fishermen to that of rulers of the sea. And this came about through the reprisal of English pirates on the Spaniards for the Inquisition's treatment of Englishmen in Spanish ports. The story is alive with interest. It has terrible incidents,—"John Hawkins, and the African Slave Trade," "The Great Expedition to the West Indies," "The Attack on Cadiz." It has other incidents as compact of treachery as these of daring. Never was a bolder game than that which Hawkins played with Philip II., in which Philip lost a queen,—the Queen of Scots,—and she her head. Those who love the air of adventure will find it blowing merrily through the chapter on Drake's voyage round the world. In conclusion, we have a chapter on the sailing of the Armada, and another on its defeat. Nobody came off with less credit than Queen Elizabeth. It was in spite of her delays and feebleness that her navy and her "adventurers" prevailed against the splendid foe. Mr. Froude is throughout a laudator temporis acti. He has a cynical defence of the most horrible brutalities. One feels almost ashamed to be reading with enthusiasm things so much after Robert Louis Stevenson's own heart. But, certainly, the courage was magnificent,—the scorn of death. Very noticeable is the improvement in the style of the book as it goes on. At first it is very choppy: the sentences so short that, when we get one of two lines, we are made glad. As we go on, the longer sentences are more frequent, and the perpetual staccato less numbing to our apprehension. The book is certainly encouraging. Its motto might well be: "Say not that the former times were better than these. For thou dost not inquire wisely concerning these things."

THE TRIPLE TRADITION OF THE EXODUS. A Study of the Structure of the Later Pentateuchal Books, reproducing the Sources of the Narrative, and further illustrating the Presence of Bibles within the Bible. By Benjamin Wisner Bacon, A.M., D.D. Hartford: The Student Publishing Company. 8vo., pp. lxiii, 382.—In continuation of his "Genesis of Genesis" Dr. Bacon here gives a study of the story of Moses and the exodus, with the special purpose of distinguishing the two parts (J and E) of the prophetic narrative. He has already made a good name for himself as critic; and this work, by its carefulness and insight, will add to his reputation. It is encouraging that amid the cares of a pastoral charge (he is minister at Oswego, N.Y.) he finds time for such thorough investigation. The results of his examination are best seen in the second part, in which he gives a revised translation of the three documents separately. In the introduction he has an admirable characterization of the three authors (J, E, P). His work differs from that of Addis ("the oldest book of Hebrew history") in that it gives all three documents, confines itself to the Pentateuch, and goes more minutely into the investigation of the text. His reconstruction is supported by good critical considerations, and adds to the interest of the narrative. It may be heartily commended to all who are interested in the subject.

THAT EURASIAN. By Aleph Bey. Chicago and New York: F. Tennyson Neely.—The word "Eurasian" is compounded of "Eur" and "Asian," and is descriptive of an individual of mixed parentage, Hindu and English. There are many of such parentage in India, and the object of this book is to set forth the abuses to which they are subject as a class and to compel our sympathy for them. The field is one which has been little worked; and, if the author does not exaggerate the situation he depicts, he is to be commended for the earnestness of his purpose and the ability with which he has executed it. At the same time it may be fairly questioned whether the writer would not have made a more profound impression if he had abjured fiction altogether, and expressed himself in the directest manner possible. It is to be hoped that, moved by his endeavor and his partial failure, some other writer will "assume these unperformed duties." There is this, also, to be said,—that, having adopted a fictitious vehicle for his argument, the writer has burdened it with many other things that are quite irrelevant, among them his opinions on a variety of topics, those concerning religious matters being the most prominent. In these opinions there is a good deal of "horse sense," but, with much good information, some that has been picked up at random and without discrimination. The story, apart from its Handsome Pitchers.

The demand for odd pitchers has increased so that our foreign buyers have gleaned them from every source.

Wedgwood's old blue landscape decorations on the old Dutch shape.

Wedgwood's Jasper with Flaxman's designs in bas relief, old tankard shape and the old Dutch. All sizes.

Haviland's "St. Lazare" tall vase shape for flowers.

Haviland's "Cherbourg" for sideboards, faint fadey decorations.

Old blue Canton covered pitchers for ice water.

Cauldon China tea table pitchers.

Ridgway's real stone sage color bamboo pitchers.

Wedgwood's old blue Dutch shape, with Boston views underglaze, to be seen with our souvenir and motto china.

New England Pottery,—shapes and decorations, all sizes.

Doulton Lambeth leafage designs.

Minton, Royal Worcester, Ridgways, Limoges, Scotch, Nankin, Carlsbad, and Japanese. Glass Pitchers in great variety, pressed, etched, and deep cut Crystal, adapted to Claret Cups and Vase use.

More than five hundred kinds to choose from, from the lowest cost up to fifteen dollars each.

In the Art Pottery Rooms will be seen superb specimens of bric-à-brac, including Cloisonné, recently opened from our advance samples from Japan, and ceramics from the best potteries of England, France, Germany, China, Japan, and America, including the display of Antique Dutch Glass Beakers, Mugs, etc., reproductions of originals held in the museums of Breslau, Berlin, and Munich.

Never was our stock larger, more valuable and comprehensive than now, and never was fine pottery better or lower cost than now.

Visitors will find the

—Art Pottery Rooms, the —Dinner Set Hall, the —Glassware Department (in which the superb "Diamond Finish" Cut Glass is to be seen), the —Lamp Department, and the —Main Floor Display, which includes Plant Pots and Pedestals, French Faience, Chocolat Pots, Punch or Lemonade Bowls, and the Boston Souvenir Plates, Trays, Pitchers and Busts.

Extensive exhibits in all the above classes.
Wholesale and Retail.

Largest variety to choose from, and at best values in the market. We are not undersold if we know it.

Jones, McDuffee & Stratton,
China, Glass, and Lamp Merchants,
SEVEN FLOORS,
120 FRANKLIN, Cor. FEDERAL.

* MEADOW GRASS TALES: New England Life. By Alice Brown. Boston: Copeland & Day.

purpose, has much interest; but one of its most painful episodes might have been omitted as intrinsically improbable, while its reflection on the system of Indian mixed marriages is purely artificial.

CHRIST AND HIS FRIENDS. A Series of Revival Sermons. By Rev. Louis Albert Banks, D.D., pastor of Hanson Place Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, N.Y. New York: Funk & Wagnalls.—Here was a campaign planned in advance, and carried out in such a way that Dr. Banks, like Wordsworth's "happy warrior" could "see what he foresaw." All the texts and themes are taken from the Fourth Gospel. They were selected several months in advance of the delivery of the discourses, and much time was spent in gathering illustrative material. Evidently, the search took an extended range; for the anecdotes are by tens and hundreds. There are thirty-one sermons; and they were preached on the thirty-one days of January, 1895. After a few hours of special study, each was dictated to a stenographer in the morning, and then preached in the evening without manuscript or notes. The sermons are very different from the revival sermons of former times. They have in them no terrors of damnation and very little orthodox theology. The blood of the atonement is conspicuous by its absence. The sermon on "The Fountain of Living Water" is perhaps the most widely different in its method from an old-style revival sermon. "The Old Oaken Bucket" is quoted in full. So is Jean Ingelow's "Song of a Boat" and "Song of a Nest." The same sermon draws largely from "an article by Dr. Barrows in the Christian Register, entitled 'The Hoary Heart.'" Many of the illustrations are extremely happy, and it is easy to believe that many who listened to the whole course of sermons were made better men and women.

THE DISEASES OF PERSONALITY. By Th. Ribot, Professor of Comparative and Experimental Psychology in the Collège de France. Authorized Translation. Second Revised Edition. Chicago: The Open Court Publishing Company.—Prof. Ribot is no doubt well informed as to the subject of which he treats; but his talent for exposition is not remarkable. The contents of his mind are turned out in a disordered heap, and the reader is left very much to himself in drawing his conclusions as to what all this is about. Consciousness is treated throughout as a simple phenomenon superadded to the activity of the brain. Why it should be so treated is argued in the introduction. Organic diseases of personality—a much wider term than consciousness—are treated first, with many painful illustrations from the records of human monstrosity. Affective diseases are next considered. The sense of touch appears to be much more deeply implicated in a normal consciousness than any other. Disorders of the intellect are discussed in Chapter III., and the dissolution of personality in Chapter IV. In a concluding chapter the conclusion is reached that the ego is a co-ordination, and the further conclusion is unavoidable that it does not survive the shock of death. One cannot read such a book without feeling that for much of our criminal procedure the methods of the alienist should be substituted, and for much of our blame of individuals the tenderest pity. There is material here for many novels of morbid psychology, and we shudder to think that it may be discovered and economized.

THE MARTYRED FOOL. By David Christie Murray. New York: Harper's.—The two parts of this book are almost equally vigorous. The first is the sowing of the seed: the second is the reaping of the harvest. The first shows us how anarchists are made: the second shows the folly and injustice and wickedness of anarchism. The first tells of hardship in Australia: the second, of suffering in Paris. The first is pitiful with the struggles of a little, uncomprehending child against the cruel facts of life, shadowed by a fate for which he was not responsible: the second is pitiful with the struggles of a man who finds by slow degrees that life is a greater and more complex thing than he had supposed, and that there is no atonement possible for his own mistakes. Mr. Murray is a strong, sincere writer, possessed of much dramatic force. His aims are less to produce a means of amusement for the reading public than to represent life as it is,—a task not always agreeable.

SHIPS BY DAY. By Edwin A. Wyman, Ph.D., D.D. Boston: James H. Earle. $1.50.—About twenty years ago Dr. Wyman wrote a book entitled "Acquaintance with God," which "easy-going Christians might have thought austere," as we are told by a sympathetic evangelical critic. It is a curious circumstance that he should now produce a second book of such different character, this one being a romantic love-story. Still, this is written with the purpose of counteracting the harm that the writer fears from the influence of "Ships that Pass in the Night": and he desires to prove that immortality is something more than a guess. Thus the sentimental passages are interspersed with theological and speculative discussions. The book is very long, numbering over four hundred and fifty pages; and it offers colossal proof that a D.D. and a Ph.D. after a man's name are useless when he comes to write a novel.

MY LADY NOBODY. By Maarten Maartens. New York: Harper & Brothers.—One can see by this novel that Maarten Maartens is a powerful writer, although it must be ranked decidedly below "God's Fool" or "The Greater Glory" in the strength of its conceptions and the general fitness of its arrangement. It is crowded with unimportant incident, and stretched out to most unnecessary length. The plot, clear and effective in itself, is needlessly confused with uninteresting side issues. On the other hand, the characters are drawn with that clearness of outline which the writer well understands how to give, and the study of "Ursula" makes up for the faults of the book. It is better read in book form than when long-drawn out as a serial, though the frequent brilliancy of conversation or observations make even detached portions worth reading.

Miscellaneous.

"An Island Princess," by Theo Gift, is published in the "Hudson Library Series," with paper covers, for summer reading. It is a simple story of one "who loved and rode away," only in this case the lover did not ride, but went off in a man-of-war, leaving his island princess to wait and watch until the paper came that told of his marriage. It is a sad little story, that takes not long in the reading.

Macmillan & Co. have reprinted the once popular novel, "The Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan," written by James Morier in 1824. This edition is illustrated by H. R. Millar; and there is an introduction by Hon. George Curzon, M. P., which gives a brief account of Morier's life, and indicates the merits of this book. He thinks that, even though the Persians were to be blotted out as a nation, this would yet remain "as a portrait of unrivalled humor and accuracy of a people who, though now in their decadence, have played an immense, and still play a not wholly insignificant, part in the complex drama of Asiatic politics." The book shows them as light-hearted, nimble-witted, and volatile, but subtle, hypocritical, and insincere.

The Magazines.

The August number of the Forum contains an interesting and suggestive article about domestic service by Mrs. Hersey Goodwin of Cambridge.

The third number of the Philistine, the new monthly magazine, which emulates the success of the Chap Book and the Bibelot, contains brief articles from Ouida, Elbert Hubbard, William Morris, Stephen Crane, and others. It is published for $1 a year at East Aurora, N. Y.

Literary Notes.

"A Siren's Son," the novel by Susie Lee Bacon, is issued by Charles H. Kerr & Co. of Chicago, not only in cloth, but also in paper covers, for summer reading.

The Concordance to Browning's works, which has been edited by Miss Marie A. Molineux, A.M., Ph.D., will be published by Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. next autumn.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.
Stars of Liberty. Grand March. By Eduard Holst.
I'm Called Away. Song. Words by E. Matheson.
A Lassie's Love. Song and Chorus. Words and music by Wm. H. Friday.
Rock-a-bye, my Honey. Plantation Lullaby. Words by Al. B. Van Fleet. Music by Bertha Baker.
"Ole Mississip." Schottische. For Pianoforte. By Geo. L. Tracy.
Longing for Spring. For the Pianoforte.
The Wayside Cross. Song for Contralto. Words by Fred E. Weatherly. Music by Alfred Rawlings.
Trusting in Thee. Words by Wm. Henry Gardner.
Music by Robert Coverley.
The Convict's Little Child. Words by Geo. Cooper. Music by C. F. Shattuck.
Carnival Pranks. By Fred. L. Morey.
The Bay State. March. For Two Mandolins and Guitar.

Close Your Door

on the peddler, male or female, who says they have something "the same" or "just as good" as

SILVER
ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH

It's false. We never employ peddlers; we sell Electro-Silicon in boxes only, to regular dealers only.

Grocers sell it. Send for trial quantity and fac-simile of box.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh
ANCHOR, Cincinnati.
ATLANTIC, New York.
BEYMER-BAUMAN, Pittsburgh.
BRADLEY, New York.
BROOKLYN, New York.
COLLIER, St. Louis.
CORNELL, Buffalo.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS, Pittsburgh.
ECKSTEIN, Cincinnati.
FAHNESTOCK, Pittsburgh.
JEWETT, New York.
KENTUCKY, Louisville.
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS. CO. Philadelphia.
MORLEY, Cleveland.
MISSOURI, St. Louis.
RED SEAL, St. Louis.
SALEM, Salem, Mass.
SHIPMAN, Chicago.
SOUTHERN, New York and Chicago.
ULSTER, New York.
UNION, "

Good Judgment

is shown in buying genuine brands of Pure White Lead (see list) from responsible dealers, and in having your painting done by practical painters. Labor is three-fourths of the cost of painting, and satisfactory results can only be secured by properly applying the best materials—Pure White Lead and Pure Linseed Oil.

Any shade or color is easily made by using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead tinting colors, especially prepared for this purpose. For color-card and pamphlet—sent free—address

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,
1 Broadway, New York.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "A Year of a Miracle," "Blessed be Drudgery," etc. Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. (In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents; 10 copies for 30 cents.)

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition, on rich, tinted paper, silk-stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "tuck in with wedding-gifts."

[From The New Unity, May 2, 1895.]

The selection we give in another column from "The House Beautiful"—one of Mr. Gannett's uplifting studies which James H. West has just published—was not made because it was the most inspiring word the pamphlet contains. Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on "The dear Togetherness" is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. But this extract was selected simply because it was the shortest that could be made to stand by itself. By sending its publisher fifteen cents our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so.

*Sent postpaid on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

A College Town Pulpit.

MR. SUNDERLAND'S MONTHLY SERMONS.

50 Cents a Year. 5 Cents a Number. Reduced rates in quantities.

Series for 1894-95.

1. The Soul's Cry for God.
2. Jesus as Humanity's Ideal.
3. Sectarianism: Its Evils, Causes, and Cures.
4. The True Cross of Christ.
5. Was Jesus God? How he came to be worshipped.
6. Loyalty to Conviction.
7. Is Life a Blessing?
8. Robert Ingersoll's Treatment of the Bible.
9. A Religion for a Republic.
10. The Surest Way of Doing Good.

Order from Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND, And Arbor, Mich.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Poet-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Croswell Cressey, Ph.D.

CONTENTS: Preface; I. The Conditions of the Problem; II. The Nature of Man; III. The Persistence of Mind or Soul; IV. The Nature of the Universe; V. Personal Belief; VI. Conditional Immortality; VII. Conclusion.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

SOCIAL TOPICS.

Social Equilibrium, and Other Problems, Ethical and Religious. By Rev. GEORGE BATCHELOR. 286 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

The capacity for broad sight, the calmness of the judicial mind, the earnestness of the prophet, the sympathy of the humanitarian, ought certainly, when combined, to produce something of value in the way of the solution of tangled problems, whether social or religious. In this book we find manifested this broad sight, this calmness, this earnestness, and this sympathy; and in their product we are not disappointed, but inspired and helped.

SOME OF THE TOPICS:

Social Equilibrium; The Revolt of the Majority; The Future of the Minority; Religion its own Evidence; Righteousness its own Law; Free Thought; Heredity and Education; Heredity and Tradition in Morals; Ethics and Happiness; The Natural Meaning of the Word "Ought"; The Natural History of the Moral Ideal and the Law of Progress; Is it Religion vs. Righteousness?

Problems in American Society. By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER. [Some Social Studies.] 294 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

I. The Student in American Life; II. Scientific Charity; III. The Root of the Temperance Problem; IV. The Political Conscience; V. Moral and Religious Instruction in our Public Schools; VI. The Religious Destitution of Villages.

"Out of all the confusion of current theory, fanatical bitterness and shallow arrogance, comes now and then a calm and considerate work, treating burning questions with catholic liberality, really helpful to the seeker for wisdom, and giving hint of the survival we shall find when all this clamor and fermentation is over. Such a work is 'Problems in American Society.'—Detroit Free Press.

Social Problems. By M. J. SAVAGE. 189 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Preliminary: Religion for this World; The Social Dream; Social Beginnings; Social Achievement; Social Barriers; The Rise of the Individual; Socialism; Social Responsibility; What is at Present Possible? Common School Education; Poverty, Personal and National; The Diminution of Evils.

Man, Woman and Child. By M. J. SAVAGE. 200 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Man; The Woman; The Evolution of Marriage; Marriage To-day; The Child; The Home; Society; Celibacy; Divorce; Woman's Sphere; Careers for our Daughters; The Transfiguration of Humanity.

How we made a Nine-cent Dinner. Explained in Full, with some other Economies. By Mrs. E. S. TURNER, the New Century Cooking School of Philadelphia. Paper, 10 cts.

Coffee Houses and Coffee Palaces in England. Compiled by JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE from English pamphlets. Paper, 20 cts.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Home.

THE MESSENGER.

[For the Picture by G. F. Watts.]

Strong angel of the peace of God!
Not wholly undivided thy mien;
Along the weary path I trod
Thou hast been with me, though unseen.

My hopes have been a mad turmoil;
A clutch and conflict all my life;
The very craft I loved a toil;
And love itself a seed of strife.

But sometimes in a sudden hour
I have been great with godlike calm,
As if thy tranquil world of power
Flowed in about me like a psalm;

And peace has fallen on my face,
And stillness on my struggling breath,
And, living, I have known a space
The hush and mastery of Death.

Stretch out thy hand upon me, thou
Who comest as the still night comes!
I have not flinched at buffets: now
Let Strife go by, with all his drums!

—By Richard Hovey, in the Independent.

For the Christian Register.

PRINCESS LEGEND.

[From the German of Wilhelm Hauff. Translated by Mrs. C. A. Adams.]

In a fair kingdom far away, upon whose gardens of perpetual green the sun is always smiling, there has ruled from the beginning until now the good Queen Fantasia.

For many hundreds of years had her generous hand scattered blessings in abundance among her people, who loved and honored her in return. The queen's heart, however, was too great to allow any limit to her good deeds. So she herself, in all the royal splendor of her eternal youth and beauty, descended to the earth; for had she not heard that here lived those who in dismal privation passed their lives amid toil and hardship? To these Fantasia brought the most beautiful gifts in her kingdom, so that, after she had passed over the earth's fields, men went joyously to their work, and amid all their want and sorrow grew glad and cheerful. Moreover, the royal children, no less fair and lovely than their queenly mother, were sent that they might bring blessings to the human beings.

Once when Legend, the queen's eldest daughter, came back from the earth, her mother noticed that she was sad, and even thought she discerned traces of tears. "What is the matter, Legend, sweetheart?" said the queen. "Ever since your journey you've been so sad and downcast. Won't you confide to your mother your trouble?" "O mother dear," answered Legend, "I would certainly not have remained silent so long, if I hadn't known that my trouble is yours, too."

"Always speak, daughter mine," advised the beautiful queen; "for sorrow is a stone that drags down one alone, but which can easily be carried by two."

"You want my story," answered Legend, "so listen. You know how willingly I associate with human beings, how cheerfully I go to sit with the poorest before their cottages, to chat with them a bit after their work. They used to offer me their hands for greeting when I came, and look after me smiling and contented when I went away. Well, nowadays it isn't so any more."

"Poor Legend!" said the queen, and stroked the child's cheeks, which were wet with tears; "but perhaps you only imagine all this."

"Believe me, I feel it only too keenly," returned Legend. "They no longer love me. Moreover, when I approach, I am met with cold glances. Nowhere am I welcome. Even the children, who always loved me especially, laugh at me now, and knowingly turn their backs."

The queen leaned her forehead on her hand, and thought silently. "And how can it have happened, Legend," she asked at last, "that the people below there have changed so?"

"Look you, O Queen Fantasia, the human beings have constituted guards; and these, with sharp scrutiny, survey and examine everything coming from your kingdom. If any one comes who is not to their mind, they raise up a great cry, and either slay him or slander him so terribly among the human beings who believe their word that he finds no more love, not a spark of confidence. Ah! how fine it is for my brothers, the Dreams! Happy and light-hearted, they flit down to earth, and, without asking leave of those clever guards, seek the slumbering mortals, and weave and picture for them things that gladden the heart and delight the eye."

"Your brothers are light-footed," said the queen; "and you, my darling, have no cause to envy them. Besides, those border guards I know well: the mortals aren't unwise to post them there. Many a wily fellow goes there, pretending to come straight from my kingdom, when at the most he has merely looked at us from some mountain."

"But why do they let this count against me, your own daughter?" sobbed Legend. "Ah! if you only knew how they treated me! They called me an old maid, and threatened not to let me in at all next time."

"What! not let in my daughter!" cried the queen; and anger heightened the glow in her cheeks. "But I see already where this comes from: our wicked cousin has maligned us."

"Cousin Fashion? Impossible!" cried Legend. "She always used to seem so friendly."

"Oh, I know her, the false one!" answered the queen. "But try again, in spite of her, my daughter: he who wants to do good must never rest."

"O mother! What if they should send me back, or should slander me, so that the mortals wouldn't look at me, or would let me stand in the corner, alone and despised?"

"If the grown-up people, fooled by Fashion, set less value upon you, turn to the little ones. Truly, they are my darlings: it is to them that I send my loveliest pictures through your brothers, the Dreams. Yes, I myself have often floated down to them, have hugged them, kissed them, and played the most charming games with them. They know me well, too. Of course, they don't know my name; but I have often noticed how at night they smile up at my stars, and how in the morning, if my bright, fleecy clouds drift through the heavens, they clap their hands for joy. When they grow older, they still love me. Then I help lovely maidens twine their gay garlands, and wild boys grow more quiet when I seat myself opposite them on a high cliff, and from the cloud-world of the distant blue mountain cause lofty castles and gleaming places to rise, and from the glowing clouds of evening picture bold troops of horsemen and wonderful processions of pilgrims."

"Oh, the dear children!" exclaimed Legend, excitedly. "Be it so! I will try them once more."

"Yes, daughter dear," said the queen. "Go to them; but first let me dress you in such a way that you may please the children, and still not be repulsed by their elders. For, see, I will give you the costume of an almanac."

"Of an almanac, mother? I should be ashamed to vaunt myself before the people thus."

The queen beckoned, and the waiting-maids brought forward the elaborate garb of an almanac. It was all interwoven with gleaming colors and beautiful patterns.

The maids braided the long hair of the beautiful maiden, bound her golden sandals under her feet, and draped the costume about her.

The modest Legend dared not lift up her eyes; but her mother, regarding her with delight, clasped the child in her arms. "Go," said she to the little one; "and my blessing go with you. And, if they despise and scorn you, come back to me. Perhaps a later generation, more true to nature, will turn their hearts back to you."

Thus spoke Queen Fantasia, and Legend descended to the earth. With a beating heart she approached the spot where dwelled the clever watchmen. She bent her little head toward the ground, drew her gorgeous gown closer about her, and with hesitating steps drew near the gate.

"Halt!" shouted a deep, rough voice. "Turn out, guard! Here comes a new almanac!"

Legend trembled when she heard this. Several elderly men of dark aspect rushed out. They held in their fists pointed feathers with which they opposed her. One of this crowd strode up to her, and with a rude hand grasped her by the chin. "Now lift up your head, Sir Almanac," cried he, "so that anybody can see whether you are of any good or not."

Blushing, Legend threw up her little head in the air, and flashed open her dark eyes.

"It's Legend!" cried the watchmen, and laughed with all their might. "Legend! This one must have thought she was going to do wonders. Only how came you to wear this suit?"

"Mother dressed me in it," answered Legend.

"So? She will smuggle you in, will she? Not by a good deal! Get away with you! See that you get out!" cried the watchmen in a chorus, and stuck out their pointed feathers.

"But I only want to go to the children," pleaded Legend. "You surely can allow me to do that?"

"Aren't there enough such vagabonds running loose in our land?" cried one of the guards. "They only prattle to our children foolish nonsense."

"Let's see what she knows this time," said another.

"All right!" cried they. "Go on, tell what you know; but hurry up, for we haven't much time to waste on you."

Legend stretched her hand and described with her forefinger many signs in the air. Then one saw beautiful figures passing along,—caravans, splendid horses, gayly adorned riders, many tents on the sands of a desert, birds flying, and ships on a stormy sea, silent woods and crowded streets and commons, battles and peaceful nomads. They all floated by in living pictures, in a gay, busy throng.

Legend, in her interest in bringing forth the pictures, hadn't noticed how one by one the guards had all fallen asleep. She was just going to describe new signals, when a friendly man stepped up to her and seized her hand. "See there, good Legend," said he, as he pointed to the sleepers: "your gay pictures are nothing to these men. Slip quickly through the door. Then they won't suspect that you are in the land, and you can go your way free and unnoticed. I will take you to my children, and in my house you shall have a quiet and friendly corner. You can dwell there, and live by yourself. Then, when my children have learned their lessons, they may bring their playmates, and listen to you. Will you do it?"

"Oh, how gladly will I follow you to your dear children! How I will exert myself to give them once in a while a jolly hour!"

The good man beckoned to her kindly, and helped her over the feet of the sleeping guards. Laughing Legend glanced back when she had passed, and then slipped inside the gates.

JOHNNIE'S STRANGE ADVENTURE.

"I'm right tired of being a boy. It's 'Johnnie, run down cellar and bring up the wringer, or wash-tub, or the ice-cream freezer,' or 'Johnnie, just run upstairs and bring down a chair'; and it's sure to be the biggest and heaviest one they want. It's a wonder they don't tell me to run up to the moon and bring down an armful of mountains, or else run down to China and bring up a few dozen laundrymen. Then it's 'Johnnie, run and do this,' and 'Johnnie, run and do that,' till, I declare, I wonder they don't change my name to Johnnie Runn and be done with it."

Johnnie threw himself on the lounge by the side of Daggers, the cat, sleeping comfortably in a round fur ball.

"I'd much rather be a cat. He enjoys life, and has nothing to do but eat, sleep, and play. If he wants anything, all he has to do is to let out a howl, and everybody is ready to run and get whatever he wants."

Daggers, thinking himself addressed, rolled over like a caterpillar, yawned, stretched, and began picking affectionately at Johnnie's coat-sleeve, purring softly and sleepily.

"Then there's Mary Ann, always and forever asking me to fill up the wood-box. It's the meanest wood-box I ever saw. Gets empty forty times a day, seems so."

It was a hot day, and Johnnie was tired; and, just as he began to feel drowsy, Daggers rolled over, then sat up, and to his surprise began to speak.

"You think a cat has nothing to trouble him. How would you like to live among a lot of giants who picked you up by one leg or by the head, just as it happened?"

"Well," answered Johnnie, argumentatively, "that isn't as bad as being a Johnnie run boy."

"If you wish to change places with me for a time, I can arrange matters for you. I have often longed to have people know what some of our troubles really are, so that they would be more gentle with us. When they don't understand us, they call us uncanny. We like pleasant voices, and it frightens us and hurts our feelings when sharply spoken to. We distinguish our friends by the tones of their voices and their soothing treatment of us. Do you still wish to change places with me?"

"Yes, till I have had a real jolly, lazy time," said Johnnie, eagerly.

"Then close your eyes tight, and I'll go over to the rug by the chimney and signal for the witch-cat. She'll come through the fire-board in the grate, and then—you'll be I, and I'll be you."

"Well, now, this is comfortable, nothing to do but purr and sleep. I can hear Daggers filling up the wood-box this minute. He will have to run for the mail pretty soon. Wonder if he can unlock the post-office box—err-r purr-r-r."

"Oh, dear! how Ned startled me! Just as I was sleeping so sweetly too. I wouldn't mind his petting if it wasn't so heavy-handed. He acts as if he was petting an elephant. Such petting shocks my nervous system, besides making me cough. Oh! oh! the baby has grabbed both hands full of my fur, and it hurts cruelly. I just scratched back, and Ned boxed my ears. There, Eva has taken me on her lap. She treats me so kindly. It's a pleasure to purr for her. Her smoothing is restful. Pur-r-r! What's this! Eva went upstairs and left me on the floor, standing up half asleep. I'd like to know if I am ever to get my nap out. I don't like this. Guess I'll howl. There, they have put me out doors. Horrors! There is a big black dog. He's coming right for me! What a fearful red mouth! If I can only get to that tree,—ah! safe at last; but how my heart beats! I haven't had such a fright since I fell down cellar, when I was a boy. I'm more afraid of that dog than I used to be of the wild animals I read about. I wonder how long he is going to stand there and bark. There comes Eva: she drove the dog away, and is taking me into the house. She is rubbing her cheek on my head and calling me pretty names. I'll purr just as soon as I can calm myself. Purrr-r-r."

"There, she has dumped me on the lounge. Guess I'll go out in the kitchen. I think I smell fish. I never knew raw, fresh fish could smell so good. Yes, there is a fine pike on the table. I think I can reach it if I get up in a chair. There! Mary Ann just slapped me, and called me a sneak. And all I could answer back was me-ow-w. She put a big dab of grease on my nose, 'to keep me occupied,' she said, then stood and laughed to see me try to lick it off. How mean of her! It will take a good half-hour

COMPARE RESULTS. YOU KNOW THE OLD WAY—TRY THE NEW WAY THE SUNLIGHT WAY.

Sunlight Soap

WILL DO THE WORK IN HALF THE TIME, DO IT BETTER AND SAVE THE CLOTHES. IT MAKES LACES AS GOOD AS NEW AND DOES NOT SHRINK FLANNELS.

Lever Bros., Ltd, Hudson & Harrison Sts., New York.

Makes home brighter
Makes hearts lighter

to get my face properly washed. This is a hard world for cats, after all.

"There is a nice soft cushion in a chair in the parlor. I'll dodge in there, and see if I can find any peace for my life. Ah! but isn't this comfortable! This is the eider-down cushion Eva is so choice of. Wish I could lie awake, just to see how sweetly I sleep. Purr—r—r.

"Meow—w—w! I never yelled louder in my life. A lady caller came in, and innocently sat down upon me. I never knew that such a beautiful lady could sit down so heavy. What next! I ran out to the dining-room, and Ned accidentally stepped on my toe. He said I yelled louder than a mill whistle. I am bruised and sore all over. Ned is sorry, and gave me some scraps of meat on a newspaper in the woodshed. When I get used to it, I may like it; but the smell of printer's ink destroys my appetite. I thought cats had nothing to do but enjoy themselves. The pity of it is we cannot speak and tell people when we are in pain, and so we have to suffer on in silence. If they would try to put themselves in our places sometimes, and consider our feelings, our lives might be happier. Rough handling hurts us as cruelly as it does a human being. Some boys, and even girls, think it displays cleverness and noble qualities of character to abuse helpless creatures. Only the weak and cowardly wilfully persist in so doing. Many are cruel from thoughtlessness and ignorance or indifference. I never thought of this before. . . . Why! where am I?" and Johnnie sat up and rubbed his eyes. "Why, I thought I was a cat. But I'm glad I'm a boy. I guess that witch-cat must have been talking to me just before I woke up, and it was all quite true."

Johnnie looked at the clock.

"It's time to go for the mail, and the wood-box must be empty by this time. Filling up the wood-box isn't half so bad as being chased up a tree by a dog, or being sat on."

Johnnie went whistling about his tasks after this strange dream, not in the least objecting to being a Johnnie-run boy.—Caroline Mosher, in the Advance.

A CHAT ABOUT DOGS.

The first dog that impressed himself on my mind was a bull brindle named Tag. When I was just three years old, Tag celebrated my birthday by bounding up against me and knocking me down. He didn't mean to do so, for in spite of his breed he was very gentle. When I cried, he ran barking loudly to my father, who was sitting at some distance under a tree, and then, still barking, ran back to me, thus drawing my father's attention to the accident. This is the first thing in life that I remember. I have had many knock downs of various kinds since then, but none for which I have been so quickly compensated.

Tag was a remarkable dog in many ways. He looked so intelligent that a famous painter of animals several times made him sit for his portrait, and always very modestly declared that he couldn't do Tag justice. Tag had in a large degree what many dogs possess in little,—a keen sense of property. This did not relate alone to bones that belonged to himself, but to anything which he fancied was intrusted to his care.

For instance, whenever the stable man went away for a while, he would point to the barn door, and say, "Stay there, Tag, and mind the horses till I come back." This was a necessity at the time, for quite a gang of horse thieves lurked in the neighborhood. Tag generally planted himself in front of the barn on such occasions, and only my father's voice could entice or command him from his post. He recognized my father as commander-in-chief of the farm.

One day when Tag was watching the barn, my father, sitting at his library window, saw the wagon of the man who supplied us with oats, bran, and other stable necessities, drive up to the barn door, where Tag was lying in the sun, apparently fast asleep. The man carried in succession several bags of grain into the barn, and emptied them into the bins. After a while my father, glancing up from his book, noticed the wagon still standing at the door.

"That man takes rather a long time filling those bins," he thought, and then resumed his reading. Fifteen or twenty minutes later, glancing out again, my father was surprised at seeing the wagon still there. He at once inferred that something must have happened, and went out to investigate.

Arrived in the barn, he found the man, who was a new driver of the grain team, standing very pale beside a heap of grain sacks. Tag had hold of the man's trousers near the ankle where they were baggy.

"What's the matter, Tag?" said my father.

The dog let go, and with an accusing bark began to paw at the pile of grain bags. My father, taking the hint, examined, and found one of his best harnesses hidden in one of the empty sacks. Being a merciful man, he only gave the dog-convicted thief a lecture, and let him go.

Now, Tag had seen the grain men come and go dozens of times, but it seems he had kept a special eye on this one. In other words, he knew his man.

Another dog of my acquaintance who possessed rare intelligence was a water spaniel. Rock, as he was called, unquestionably understood human speech far better than we ever comprehend dog language. His master was a rather careless young man, nearly always in delicate health, whose mother naturally worried about him considerably.

One morning, after a heavy rain, this young man started to go out on the thick wet grass of the lawn in thin slippers. His mother remonstrated with him, and begged him to stop and put on his boots.

"You will catch your death a-cold," she cried, as he went out into the wet, unheeding her solicitude.

Now, this young man's boots and shoes were kept in a back entry on a shelf about four feet from the floor. What was his mother's amazement, a moment after, at seeing Rock, who had been listening to the conversation, sitting on his haunches, barking at the boots.

Presently, as they wouldn't come at his call, and as his mistress offered no help, the dog with his teeth dragged a chair up to the shelf, jumped on it, seized a boot, and ran out with it to his master on the lawn. Then he came back, seized the other, and carried that to the feet of the astonished biped, whose four-legged friend seemed thus to demonstrate that his master did not possess quite so good an understanding as himself.

The following anecdote is vouched for by a friend of mine, and will be readily believed by all close students of dogology. One day an orphan-looking puppy of pointer breed appeared at the door of a Canadian gentleman who had a fancy farm. The gentleman's daughter took compassion on the stray, who barked and fawned at her feet very prettily. He was instantly fed and adopted. Things went well for a while, and he grew into the affections of the whole family.

But one luckless day four half-grown chickens of a valuable breed were found dead in a little yard where they were kept; and the puppy, who had jumped into the yard from the top of a small dog-house standing by, was caught in the act of shaking the fourth dead chicken.

The gentleman, taking a whip, entered the yard, gave puppy a sound thrashing, and finally, in anger, drove him howling off the farm. Three days later, at early morn, the puppy reappeared at the door, barking vociferously and dancing about in an extravagant fashion that made the gentleman smile. As he advanced, the dog, still gambling, ran along in the direction of the chicken yard, stopping every few paces to turn back and bark.

The master followed him, and on coming to the place found four exceedingly forlorn but live chickens, about the size of those which puppy had destroyed, huddled in a corner of the little yard. These strange chickens bore the marks of the puppy's teeth, and it was clear that he had brought them one by one from a neighboring farm to replace the four he had been whipped for killing.

Here was surely a rudiment of moral sense in the dog, though, like a great many men who do similar things, he had been robbing Peter to pay Paul, as the saying is. Here also was a proof of the sense of number,—the ability to count correctly.

But that is a faculty quite marked in dogs, especially shepherd dogs.

It is needless to say that the young pointer was restored to favor, though the chickens also were restored to their owner with apologies for the puppy's grand larceny. In conclusion let me say, Beware of a man who doesn't like dogs. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred he is treacherous and cruel; and, however smooth and pleasant he may seem, he will bear watching by men,—and, of course, by dogs.—Henry Austin, in the Independent.

WHAT WAS THE REASON.

Belle lived in a big, old-fashioned house that stood in the midst of a big, old-fashioned garden. It was a large white house, and it peeped out between the horse-chestnuts and waving elm-trees to watch the crowds of people passing up and down the street and around the corner.

This house was a very nice place for little girls to live in, but for some reason or other kittens didn't like it one bit. Belle had had "just heaps of kittens" given her; but they all ran away, and, when they didn't run away, somebody took them.

And now another kitten had disappeared, which Mrs. Sheldon, the egg woman, had brought Belle the night before. It was the prettiest maltese kitten; and Belle had named her, tied a bright red ribbon around her neck, given her a great big supper, and kissed and hugged her "most fifty times," and then put her to bed in an old basket down in the cellar.

When Belle got up in the morning, no kitten was to be found. She had jumped out through the cellar window and run away, like all the rest of Belle's naughty pets.

"Oh, dear, dear, dear!" sighed Belle, sadly. "I 'most believe I'll buy a Kitten kennel just like Bruno's, and tie my next kitten with a big bouncing chain!"

Just then the gate slammed, and in walked Mrs. Sheldon with the runaway kitten tied securely in a willow market basket.

"She came home this morning, Miss Belle!" she explained; "and I put on my bonnet, and brought her right back again!"

"I'm very glad!" said Belle, mournfully; "but it's no use, 'cause she'll only run home again to-night! Oh, dear! I can't keep one single kitten at all!"

Mrs. Sheldon laughed at the solemn little face looking up into hers so sadly.

"Well, we'll see!" she replied. "When I was little, like you, Belle, my aunt told me as how a cat would never run away again if you buttered its toes and turned it round the table-leg three times, one right after the other; and we'll try it right now!"

"Oh, do!" exclaimed Belle, excitedly.

"Why, won't that be real fun, Mrs. Sheldon!"

So the bad, naughty kitten was taken out to the kitchen, and Mrs. Sheldon buttered its four soft little paws all over with butter, and then she put her on the floor, and pulled her around the table-leg, very slowly, three times.

The kitten didn't like it; but finally the journeys were safely accomplished, and she sat over in the corner, washing her greased paws as fast as she could.

"And now she can run about the yard?" inquired Belle, joyously.

"No: I wouldn't let her for a day or two," answered Mrs. Sheldon; "and I'd forget to tie a ribbon an' bell onto her neck for a spell," she continued, as she put her shawl around her shoulders.

And, do you know, that kitten never ran off again, and Belle has her now! She isn't a kitten any more, only a sober, sedate, old cat, with a big family of children and grandchildren around her.

Belle still thinks that it was greasing her toes and walking her around the table-leg three times that kept her from running away again, but mamma and I both think that Mrs. Sheldon's advice about forgetting the ribbon helped a great deal; but perhaps the most important reason was that papa mended the cellar window.

What do you think, little reader?—Margaret Dane, in the Youth's Companion.

THREE AMUSING STORIES.

An amusing story is told of an army officer in India, who at great trouble and expense procured some ice to be served at dinner. He probably gave the order in that fashion; for his cook rushed into the dining-room in great consternation, and told him he had boiled the ice, and it had all gone to water.

That story was capped by a good-natured Australian, who said: "I'll tell you what I did once. I had a large watermelon sent to me as a present. None of us had ever seen one before, and had no idea how it was to be served or eaten. So we cut it and scooped out all the inside, the seeds and the red part, and tried to eat the rind; but we did not care for it." When the laughter had subsided, the same story-teller went on: "But I must tell you about the green corn. We had heard about that being considered such a luxury in America, and we knew that it was to be boiled. So we put it on in salted water, and boiled it for an hour, testing it every few minutes, as we would have done potatoes; but it would not get soft. At last we decided to serve it; but we could not cut the cobs, so, after tasting a few of the water-soaked kernels, we decided that we had not missed much, for it was tasteless stuff anyhow."—Sacred Heart Review.

Nervous

* Prostration

yields to a perfectly nourished body. No nerve or brain trouble will attend a system where every organ acts properly, and the blood is enriched by

Bovinine

H. C. Chapin, editor St. Paul Pioneer Press, says of Bovinine, "By it I was brought up, with remarkable rapidity, from a long siege of nervous prostration."

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

'1847 Rogers Bros. XII' Silver Plate that Wears.

Especially suitable for gifts, as the quality is so well known. "1847" is the guarantee of original Rogers goods. "XII" means—three times the usual thickness of silver where most needed. Be sure of the right trade-mark.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO., Meriden, Conn., 208 Fifth Ave., New York.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

A LADY with a pleasant home near Boston, and having the care of a young girl of thirteen, desires to communicate with parents or guardians who may be seeking a temporary or permanent home for one or more children. References exchanged. Address GUARDIAN, care Christian Register.

MRS. H. M. BROWN, 49 Oxford Street, Cambridge, wishes to take charge of two or three little girls. Instruction at home or at school. References: Rev. C. R. ELIOT, Boston; Prof. C. J. CHILD, Cambridge; Mrs. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, Jamaica Plain.

"A TRAINING IN CLEANLINESS IS A FORTUNE." COMPLETE YOUR EDUCATION WITH

SAPOLIO

NEW DARK DAYS IN ARMENIA.

The centuries of bloodshed
Are past, those cruel years;
But there is still one country
Whose mountains drip with tears,
Whose river-banks are blood-stained,
Whose mourning loads the breeze,—
A land of dreary ruins,
Ashes and cypress-trees.

The bride's soft eyes are tearful
Behind her tresses' flow,
Lest the Koord's shout should interrupt
Love's whisper, sweet and low.
Red blood succeeds love's rosy flush,
Slain shall the bridegroom be,
And by the dastard Koords the bride
Be led to slavery.

The peasant sows, but never reaps.
He hungers evermore.
He eats his bread in bitterness,
And tastes of anguish sore.
Lo! tears and blood together
Drop from his pallid face;
And these are our own brothers,
Of our own blood and race!

—Alice Stone Blackwell, from the Armenian of Bedros Dorian.

MISS VICTORIA B. WILLIAMS.

The picture of Miss Victoria Williams in her invalid's room in Baltimore comes vividly into mind as we read the announcement of her death on the 6th inst.

Crippled and suffering in her early life, she bore her long decades of pain with such courage and cheerfulness, and became such an example of spiritual sweetness and power over the ills and burdens of life, that she seemed even while on the earth to be almost lifted into sainthood.

She would plead for the simplest words if any must be uttered over her grave. And yet the delicacy and charm of her personality, her bright intelligence, her eager interest in passing events, her love of her church, her loyalty to her Unitarian faith through more than half a century, and her pathetic limitations to the four walls of her room and her invalid's chair,—all these have had such an influence upon those who knew and loved her that the feeling of gratitude for her life must find words.

The windows of her soul were open always. She had the power to escape from the narrow room into the fair world without, to breathe its airs, to feel its freshness, to summon and to create spiritual companionships, and to blend her life and thought with the Eternal.

Her simple faith made all things radiant; and, when the morning dawned for her as she slept her life away on earth, it was not as a stranger that she entered in through the gates into the City.

W. H. R.

Personals.

On August 1 the University of Edinburgh conferred on Dr. S. Weir Mitchell of Philadelphia the degree of LL.D., characterizing him, in the university oration, as "the chief ornament to medical science in the New World."

Dr. Francis Walker, son of General Francis A. Walker of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has accepted his call to the Department of Political and Social Science in Colorado College. He pursued his post-graduate studies at Columbia College, where he took high rank, and goes with much promise of success to this rapidly growing institution.

The New York Evening Post says that Mademoiselle Pauline de Grandpré probably knows more of the prison life of French women than any one else in France. She lived in the St. Lazare prison as the house-keeper of her uncle, who was chaplain there during the empire. In the twenty-five years that have elapsed since he died she has devoted herself entirely to visiting female prisoners and obtaining situations for them when they have undergone their sentences.

The Katholikos of all the Armenians is a noble-looking old man of seventy-four, with handsome features and a fine gray beard. He speaks Armenian, Turkish, and a little French, but not a word of Russian. His scholarship is not very noteworthy; but he is the author of several works,—a commentary on the Psalms, and one or two smaller books of a devotional character. When at home among his own people, he wears a violet velvet skull-cap and a loose robe of light drab-colored stuff. When receiving visitors, he puts a black peaked hood of moiré silk over the skull-cap, and wears a gown of blue silk and a magnificent diamond cross. He is one of the most urbane of men, and the Western visitor to the monastery obtains easy access to his presence. He took part in the Berlin Conference; and, after his labors there were ended, he visited England, where Dean Stanley received him, and had him once pronounce the benediction in Westminster Abbey. The Katholikos is fond of alluding to his visit to England, and has been heard to regret that he is now too old to visit the great republic across the ocean.—Independent.

Temperance.

The hold which the liquor interest has on the English nation—a fact which has been demonstrated by the recent political overturn in that country—is very imperfectly understood among us. At the recent convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union in London one of the speakers, an Englishman, presented the share list of one brewery company, which, he said, contained the names of forty-seven ministers of the gospel.—The Congregationalist.

Every lover of temperance will sympathize with Lady Henry Somerset, and wonder at the law which forbids her to use her own discretion in refusing a liquor license on her estates. It appears that a certain hotel sought the renewal of its liquor license, which she refused. The proprietor appealed; and the Justice in Chancery has sustained the appeal on the ground that she is simply holding the estate as tenant for life, and that her personal opinions must not affect her fiduciary action. That is, if it is for the pecuniary interest of those who come into the estate after her death to ruin men body and soul by liquor, she has no right to stop it.—Independent.

Here and There.

It is said that Egypt, in proportion to population, has more railway mileage and better service than Austria, Hungary, Spain, or Portugal.

Cables will connect the Eiffel Tower with the turrets of the Trocadéro Palace during the 1900 exhibition, and upon them light passenger trains will be run by gravitation.

The thousand-franc prize of the Société des Artistes Français has been awarded this year to François Montholon, who has no hands, but paints with a wooden hand. In 1889 he received honorable mention, and in 1890 a medal.

The medals of honor at the Paris Salon have been awarded to M. Ernest Herbert, for his picture of the infant Jesus asleep in his mother's arms, and to M. Bartholdi, for his sculpture representing Switzerland succoring Alsace in 1870.

The only tea plantation on the continent where tea is successfully produced for the market is near Summerville, S.C. It is twenty acres in size, and contains several thousand trees, from which about one thousand pounds of black tea, retailing at from $1 to $1.40 per pound, will be obtained this year.

The military workshop of Puteaux, in France, is turning out leather tires for the army cycles in place of India rubber ones, which are difficult to repair when they break down. Leather tires can be sewn without much trouble by the cyclist or a neighboring shoemaker. Moreover, they are lighter than rubber ones, and less apt to slip on wet pavement or asphalt.

The Baldwin apple is to have a monument,—a granite shaft seven feet high, crowned with an apple,—erected near Woburn, Mass., the exact spot where the first Baldwin apple-tree was discovered, a hundred years ago, by a surveying party. The name came from Col. L. Baldwin, a distinguished engineer, who sent apples from the tree to friends; and they spoke of it as the Baldwin apple.

Modern industry has a foothold in the arctic regions. Mines are worked on a large scale, and a railroad regularly operated in such high latitudes. This is the case in Sweden, where the Lulea-Gellivare Railroad, built for the purpose of carrying iron ore from the Gellivare mines to the seaport of Lulea, extends fifty miles above the arctic circle, and enjoys the distinction of being the first railroad to open up the frigid zone.

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT is particularly valuable in the summer because it is always fresh and sweet.

It is unexcelled for the home, the camp, seaside or mountains.

Sold everywhere.
Merrell-Soule Co.,
Syracuse, N. Y.

PRATT INSTITUTE, Brooklyn, N.Y.

NORMAL, professional, and special training in the various branches of Applied Art, Literature, Science, and Mechanics, and carried on under the following departments: Fine Arts, Domestic Art, Domestic Science, Science and Technology, Kindergarten, Library, and Museum. The Manual Training High School offers a Four Years' Course for both sexes, in preparation for College or for the advanced work of the other departments.

FREDERIC B. PRATT, Secretary.

Scraps of Travel.

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Mozoomdar's
BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Consensus, The Spirit in Live, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Christ, The Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the acclimations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

IMPORTANT WORKS BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE

The Peak in Darien: With Some Other Inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and Body. An Octave of Essays. 266 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"Vigorous in thought and style. We have read the volume through from preface to 'the end,' and enjoyed it."—Watchman.

Darwinism in Morals, and Other Essays. 422 pages. Cloth, $2.00.

Some of the chapters: Darwinism in Morals; Hereditary Piety; The Religion of Childhood; Prehistoric Religion; The Religions of the World; The Religions of the East; The Religion and Literature of India; Unconscious Cerebration; Dreams; The Evolution of Morals and Religion.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"The profoundest, wisest, purest, noblest book in principle, aim, and tone yet written upon the true position of woman in society."

The Scientific Spirit of the Age, and Other Pleas and Discussions. 243 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Religious Duty. 311 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

A Faithless World. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

1. HERBERT SPENCER: His life and personal characteristics; his views on education; his religious opinions. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.
2. CHARLES ROBERT DARWIN: His ancestry, life, and personal characteristics. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
3. SOLAR AND PLANETARY EVOLUTION: How suns and worlds come into being. By GARRETT P. SERVISS.
4. EVOLUTION OF THE EARTH: The story of geology; how the world grew. By DR. LEWIS G. JAMES.
5. EVOLUTION OF VEGETAL LIFE: How does life begin? By WILLIAM POTTS.
6. EVOLUTION OF ANIMAL LIFE: The evidences from geology, geographical distribution, and comparative zoology. By ROSSIE W. RAYMOND, Ph.D.
7. THE DESCENT OF MAN: Man and the brute creation; his ancestral life; duration of human life on the planet. By E. D. COPE, Ph.D.
8. EVOLUTION OF MIND: The mind and the nervous system; the nature of mind. By ROBERT G. ECCLES, M.D.
9. EVOLUTION OF SOCIETY: Primitive man; growth of the family, city, and State; development of the domestic relations; is society an organism? By JAMES A. SKILTON, Esq.
10. EVOLUTION OF THEOLOGY: Origin of religious beliefs; ancestor-worship; nature-worship; the Absolute. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPTON.
11. EVOLUTION OF MORALS: How altruism grows out of egoism; the proper balance. By DR. LEWIS G. JAMES.
12. PROOFS OF EVOLUTION: From geology, morphology, embryology, metamorphosis, rudimentary organs, geographical distribution, etc. By NELSON C. PARSHALL.
13. EVOLUTION AS RELATED TO RELIGIOUS THOUGHT: The Unknowable; design; miracle. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
14. THE PHILOSOPHY OF EVOLUTION: Relation of the doctrine to prevailing philosophical systems. By STARR HOYT NICHOLS.
15. THE EFFECTS OF EVOLUTION ON THE COMING CIVILIZATION: Plans for social regeneration as tested by evolution. By REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE.
16. THE SCOPE AND PRINCIPLES OF THE EVOLUTION PHILOSOPHY: Agnosticism, materialism, idealism, practical problems. By DR. LEWIS G. JAMES.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Christian Registers
WANTED.

Copies of The Christian Register for Feb. 15 and March 29, 1894, are wanted to complete files. Any one having copies of the paper for above dates which they do not care to preserve will confer a favor by sending them to the office of the Christian Register, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

POPPY CULTIVATION IN INDIA.

As the cultivation of tobacco is prohibited in England except under a special license from the excise authorities, so the cultivation of the poppy in British India is forbidden unless a license has been taken out. When a cultivator takes out a license from the Opium Department to cultivate a certain area (usually two-thirds of an acre of his own land), he receives an advance in money to secure his allegiance; and he binds himself to deliver to the opium agent at a fixed price, ordinarily of 5s. a pound whatever opium may be produced on his land.

When official supervision is efficient, it is certainly very difficult for a man to cultivate poppy on a larger area than is covered by his license without detection. The cultivation cannot be concealed. It is a sort of garden cultivation, the poppy plants being grown in little squares or beds intersected by tiny water channels for irrigation, wherever this is possible. The growth of the plants is carefully tended; and at length the time comes when they burst out into flowers, and the fields look like a sheet of silver as the white petals of the flowers glisten in the morning dew.

These beautiful petals are the first produce of the crop; for the women and children of the cultivators' families come forth and pick them off one by one, and carefully dry them, so that they may serve afterward as the covering of the manufactured cakes of opium. Then the poppies, with their bare capsule heads, remain standing in the open field until it is considered that they are ripe for lancing. The cultivators then come forth in the evening; and, with an implement not unlike the knives of a cupping instrument, they scarify the capsule on its sides with deep incisions, so that the juice may exude. In the early morning the cultivators reappear with a scraping knife and their earthenware pots; and they scrape off the exuded juice, and collect it in their pots. And this is crude opium.—Blackwood's Magazine.

Charities and Reforms.

Some years ago in Birmingham, Eng., a few people interested in the work succeeded in introducing humane education in the public schools as an experiment; and it was found to be so valuable that it has been adopted by the authorities, and has become a part of the regular school work, with most gratifying results. In at least two of the United States the law requires humane teaching as a regular part of the school work.

The Chicago Woman's Club has made a beginning in practical philanthropy by taking unto itself sixteen other clubs and renting and fitting up a building near Hull House as a model lodging-house and workshop combined. The plan is to establish a sewing shop or laundry in connection with the lodging-house and to make both self-supporting. There is a significant suggestion in this movement to the great company of women's clubs throughout the country.—Altruist Interchange.

The substitution of home for institutional life has resulted in the placing in homes of 87,845 children since 1853. Many of these have grown up to occupy positions of credit and honor. Among them are numbered physicians, lawyers, ministers, and business men of ability, while one has become the governor of the State in which he lives. The secretary of the society says: "Our records show that eighty-five per cent. of those placed in homes have turned out well, and but two per cent. badly."—Altruist Interchange.

Education.

The British school at Athens has been promised an annual grant of £500 per annum for five years from the British government. At a recent meeting, presided over by the Prince of Wales, extensive subscriptions of sums varying from £100 down were made toward the fund by leading persons and institutions.

The entire income of the University of Chicago during the past year was $520,000. For the ensuing year it is expected to reach $603,000, and the disbursements are estimated at $582,000. The faculty numbers at present 157. The students in the graduate schools numbered last year 534, in the divinity schools 281, in the colleges 772, a grand total of 1,587.

New York City is to have a model school building, with a large playground on the roof for pleasant days and an indoor playground on the first floor. On the fifth floor will be a manual training school, with gymnasium and cooking school; and in the basement will be either a number of shower-baths or a large swimming-pool for the free use of the pupils.

The National Education Society has approved the general movement throughout the country for promoting education in the field of American citizenship, and has emphasized the importance of placing before the people of our country fuller history of what has been accomplished by arbitration to secure peace throughout the world. This is wise and timely action, which is being greatly promoted by the works of the younger historians who have appeared during the last decade.

The school should be brought into relation everywhere with the public library. The teacher should instruct the pupils what and how to read; and all should be taught, as they leave school, that the public library may become for all a permanent higher school. There is now hardly a town in Massachusetts without its public library. This is peculiarly the library age. To a hundred towns beautiful library buildings have been given by successful sons of the town, in grateful reverence for the place of their nativity. Other States are following the lead of Massachusetts in legislation which shall make library privileges universal. This notable library movement is a thing of our own time; and nothing is more potential with good for the country town, where often there are few books and slight intellectual stimulus.—New England Magazine.

Science.

The belief that the shallower parts of the bottom of the Eastern Atlantic are parts of a submerged continent once joined to the American mainland seems to be growing. A writer in the Westminster Review says that the scientific evidence in support of Plato's story of a lost Atlantis has recently multiplied a hundred-fold.—The American.

A Geneva clockmaker has just perfected and patented a speaking watch. It is an application of the phonograph to the old-fashioned repeater, whose springs and hammers have been replaced by a desk of vulcanized India rubber. As the point moves over the surface, it emits articulated sounds, indicating the hour, being an exact reproduction of those produced on a cylinder by the human voice, which can be heard in an adjoining room.

M. C. Bordineax, a lapidary of Paris, recently accomplished what had before been considered impracticable, if not impossible. He has succeeded in perforating and engraving diamonds. Among the specimens of his work is one in which the royal arms of Russia have been engraved on the plain surface of a large diamond. The father of this lapidary is said to have been the first to succeed in polishing diamonds on other than a flat surface.

Cans made of paper pulp are being introduced to take the place of tin cans for containing all kinds of preserved products. The occasional cases of poisoning from canned foods are due to the contents becoming tainted through the cans not being airtight. Many millions of tin cans are used annually by canned goods factories in this country, and such cases of injury from tainted goods are comparatively rare; but because it is possible, through slight defects in the solder or minute breaks in the cans, for such danger to result, the canners have been looking for a satisfactory substitute for tin. It is believed that this has at last been found in the paper-pulp cans. They are oilproof as well as waterproof.—The American.

The most important part of butter is salt. Leave it out entirely and see if it isn't. Get good salt—get the best—get Bradley's "Yorkshire" Salt

It is the only salt free from lime and dirt, and that will not harden. Next time you order salt say you want it—say so and stick to it. Send us your name on a postal for a sample bag free.

We make all kinds and grades of salt. Whatever price you pay, see that you get Bradley's—it will be the best salt made for the money.

BRADLEY SALT CO.,
49 Jay St., New York. 4 Commercial St., Boston.

The Only One

that's imitated, among all washing compounds, is Pearline. That is because it is the original, the most popular, and the best.

Peddlers and some grocers will tell you that this thing or that thing is "the same as" or "as good as" Pearline—what better recommendation do you want for Pearline? They tell you this because it pays them better to sell these "same as" stuffs. But how will it pay you to use them? Any saving that they can offer you, in prizes or prices, can be only nominal. The loss in ruined linens, flannels, muslins, etc., can be large.

ALWAYS send back imitations. 368 JAMES PYLE, New York

The MAGEE Boston Heater

FOR WARM AIR ONLY, and the MAGEE COMBINATION HEATER here shown (for warm air and Hot Water), each received THE HIGHEST AWARD at the World's Fair, Chicago.

They are honestly, carefully and intelligently made for USE, not merely to sell.

No one can afford to keep house without a Magee Range and Furnace, because the saving in fuel and food will pay many times their cost above any others on the market.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The name Magee carries our Guarantee of PERFECT SATISFACTION with proper use.

DESCRIPTIVE CIRCULARS FREE.

For Sale by Leading Dealers Everywhere.

Hot Water Combination.

MAGEE FURNACE COMPANY, 32, 34, 36 & 38 Union St., Boston.
242 Water Street, New York.
86 Lake Street, Chicago.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR AUGUST.

The Gift of a Day. Rev. Charles E. St. John.
Adaptation. Hattie Tyng Griswold.
Spencer's Ethics. Frederic W. Sanders.
A Confessional. II. Ursula Tannenforst.
Vanity and its Cure.
Along the Way. Rachel B. MacMullin.
Col. Ingersoll's Latest Views about the Bible. I. Howard MacQuary.
Causes of the Reformation. S. Fletcher Williams.
To G. L. C. W. I. L.
Intuition. G. B. Stebbins.
As Others see us.
A Suggested Doxology.
Congregational Installation.
Unitarianism in Transylvania. Joseph Ferencz.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; Guilds;
Temperance Work, C. R. Elliot; Literary Notes.

Children's Corner.
NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

TO LET. The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. Two furnished cottages, West Falmouth. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

Register Tract Series.

No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. O. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Pleasantries.

Caller: "Your office is as hot as an oven."
Merchant: "Well it might be! I make my daily bread here, you know."—Exchange.

A Scotch newspaper refers to Mrs. Lease of Kansas as "one of those strange men found frequently in America, who write under a feminine nom de plume!"—The American.

Clergyman (examining a Sunday-school class): "Now, can any one of you tell me what are the sins of omission?" Small Scholar: "Please, sir, they're sins you ought to have committed and haven't."—Sacred Heart Review.

Little Elsie (looking at the giraffe at the Zoo): "O mamma! They have made that poor thing stand in the sun, haven't they?" Mamma: "Why do you say that, my dear?" Little Elsie: "Look at all its freckles."—Philadelphia Record.

"This," groaned the wretched young father, shifting the wide-awake baby to the other arm and making the turn at the north-west corner of the room for the four hundred and fifty-seventh time, "is one of the hardships that pass in the night."—The Satchel.

Mamma: "I will give each of you one piece, and another a little smaller, of candy." Freddy: "But I don't think either of my pieces is smaller than the other." Polly, gravely: "No, mamma, and one of my pieces is even larger than the other!"—Youth's Companion.

"Mother," said a little Scotch lassie, "dae ye ken what a phenomenon is?" "Yes, dear, I can tell ye that. Dae ye see thon coo in the field? Weel, that's no phenomenon. Dae ye see thon tree?" "Ay, mother, I see the tree." "Weel, that's no phenomenon; but, when you see thon coo climbing up thon tree with its tail foreinst it, that'll be a phenomenon."—The American.

When Sir John Carr was in Glasgow in 1807, he was asked by the magistrates what inscription he recommended for the Nelson statue, then just erected. Sir John recommended a short one: "Glasgow to Nelson." "Juist so," said one of the bailies; "and, as the town o' Nelson's close at hand, might we not juist say, 'Glasgow to Nelson, sax miles,' an' so it might serve for a monument an' a milestone, too?"—San Francisco Argonaut.

An Englishman, new to American travel, was travelling through New Jersey. Approaching a city, he turned to the lady across the aisle, and asked hurriedly, "Is this Elizabeth?" Drawing herself up, she replied sternly, "What do you mean?" Without perceiving that he had offended her, he repeated his question; and she screamed out, "Sir, you are no gentleman." Just then the brakeman shouted "Elizabeth," and the stranger left the car.—Exchange.

There was once a boy named Parker, whose admiring relatives thought he ought to learn something about the alphabet. So one day at luncheon it was duly impressed on his mind that P stands for plates, and for prunes, and for Parker. He was letter-perfect; and the next day at luncheon was called on to show off. "What does P stand for?" asked his brother. "Oh, I know this time" was the quick reply: "it stands for," looking carefully over the table, "it stands for dishes,—and for sauce,—and for me."

A teacher set her pupils at work on the subject, "What should Little Boys not do in School?" and from one of them received the following effort:—

"Little boys when at school should not make faces at the teacher, and should not study too hard because it makes them near-sighted, and should not sit too long in one position 'cause it makes their backs crooked, and should not do long examples in arithmetic 'cause it uses up their pencils too fast."—Youth's Companion.

A DESERVED PUNISHMENT.

Robert Ganthony once asked Wedon Grossmith to read a play he had written. Mr. Grossmith took the comedy, but lost it on his way home. "Night after night," he said, "I would meet Ganthony, and he would ask me how I liked his play. It was awful! The perspiration used to come out on my forehead as I'd say I hadn't had time to look at it yet." Some months passed, and Ganthony still pursued without mercy. At last Mr. Grossmith searched his house once more before it occurred to him that he might have left the comedy in his cab, going home. He went down to Scotland Yard, and inquired. "Oh, yes," was the reply. "Play marked with Mr. Ganthony's name sent back to owner four months ago, as soon as found!"—New York Ledger.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder
ABSOLUTELY PURE

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement.

Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building,
BEACON STREET, BOSTON,

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

The merits of the Palmer Woven Patent Hammocks have never been equalled. Their superiority of material, construction, and design has made them the Standard since first introduced. While there is a continual effort by imitators and infringers to produce something similar, it has all been without success, and the "Palmer Patent Hammocks" still stand pre-eminently superior to any of the imitations. They are produced in larger quantities and infinitely more varieties than the combined production of all others.

Before purchasing, insist upon seeing the "Palmer Patent Hammocks." Remember, the name "Palmer" is a synonym for all that is best in Hammocks. If your dealer does not have them in stock, he can get them for you, but be sure that he does. I. E. Palmer, Middletown, Conn.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES
of Copper and Tin.
BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sell

CHURCH
CARPETS
at manufacturers' prices.

John H. Pray, Sons & Co.,
Wholesale and Retail CARPETS
and UPHOLSTERY,
658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston.
Correspondence Solicited.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S
STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

USE "DURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING"

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every Library and Reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,

50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

Mr. HALE'S SCHOOL 86 BEACON ST., BOSTON.

The 13th year will begin September 25. Preparation for Harvard College and the Institute of Technology. Full Classical and Scientific Courses. Primary department for young boys nine or ten years of age. Fine situation, directly opposite the Public Garden. Large, sunny, high-studded rooms, open fireplaces, gymnasium, extensive laboratories, covered fire-escape, lunch-room.

Teachers: ALBERT HALE (Harv.), E. D. MARSH (Harv.), E. K. STEVENS (Harv.), C. S. STREET, Amherst.

West Newton English and Classical School.
ALLEN BROTHERS.

Family School. Both Sexes. Unsectarian. Prepares for College, Scientific Schools, Business, and for a useful life. Forty-third year begins Wednesday, September 18. Catalogue of ALLEN BROTHERS, WEST NEWTON, MASS.

THE JACOTOT SCHOOL.

A French and English Boarding and Day School for Girls.

No 11 West 86 St., New York.
Adjacent to Central Park. Mlle. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals. Circulars on application.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL,
Framingham, Mass.

Entrance examinations WEDNESDAY, Sept. 11, 1895. For circulars address ELLEN HYDE, Principal.

Rev. and Mrs. John A. Bellows'

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS will begin its seventh year Sept. 18, 1895. Number of boarding pupils limited to eight. Address 91 DANFORTH STREET, PORTLAND, ME.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

THE MORGAN SCHOOL, PORTSMOUTH,

N.H. This Home and Day School for Girls will reopen September 25 for its second year under the new management. College, Preparatory, and Finishing Courses. Address for circular Miss GEORGINA S. WOODBURY, Principal.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.
SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL
SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE Springfield, Mass.
Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN McDUFFIE, PH.D.

MISS KIMBALL'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
Worcester, Mass.
Thorough preparation for College. Intermediate, Academic, and Special Courses. Send for Illustrated Circular.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS
in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

THE HIGHLAND MILITARY ACADEMY,
WORCESTER, MASS., begins 40th year September 11. Classical, Scientific, Business, Preparatory Departments. Gymnasium. Athletics encouraged. Careful training. Home influences.
JOSEPH ALDEN SHAW, A.M., Head Master.

Boston, 10 Ashburton Place.
BOSTON UNIVERSITY
Law School.
Fall term opens Wednesday, October 2. For circulars address EDMUND H. BENNETT, Dean.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION
for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods; large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. R. W., Christian Register.

GEO. H. ELLIS,
Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, AUGUST 29, 1895.

NUMBER 35.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; An Investment with Interest,	545
The Divine Breath; By the Sea,	546
MUSINGS,	546
BREVITIES,	547
PRO AND CON.
The Baptists and Persecution; Look beneath the Surface,	547
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Agnosticism Outgrown, by Rev. E. P. Powell; Concerning Genre in Art, by J. Leonard Corning, Sr.,	548
A Reminiscence of Divinity Hall; The Armenian Pandemonium, by Rev. George W. Cutter,	549
Missionary Work, by Rev. A. G. Jennings; American Unitarian Association; The Emphasis of Japan; Queer Money,	550
Ants at Play; Pet Pigeons,	551
A Letter of Elias Hicks,	553
At the Washington "Zoo,"	558
The Queen's Donkey; A Conscientious Dog,	559
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	551
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	551
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	551
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	551
THE PULPIT.
Lessons from my Hearth, by Rev. John M. Scott,	552
LITERATURE.
Book Notices,	554
Literary Notes; Books Received,	555
THE HOME.
A Day without Mamma, by Elizabeth M. Chapin,	556
The Black Satin Fan; A Brave Mouse; He trusted the Boy; A Monkey's Caprices,	557
POETRY.
Our Years, by Edwin E. Woodman,	548
Hymn, by Rev. Augustus M. Lord,	552
Sonnet,	553
Man in Nature,	556
EDUCATION,	558
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	558
HERE AND THERE,	559
SCIENCE,	559
PLEASANTRIES,	560

Editorial.

THE manufacture of India-rubber has had an interesting influence upon theology. It has introduced an element of elasticity into the meaning of words. Creeds which were once hard and rigid have now become extremely flexible. They can be stretched to cover a larger meaning. A cast-iron creed is not malleable enough. It is liable to breakage. The only thing to do is to melt it up, and pour it into a new mould. But the application of vulcanized India-rubber to creedal tissues is a great improvement. A sentence which was supposed to have a fixed meaning may be stretched into something larger. Certainly, many of these words need stretching badly enough.

THERE is an advantage, at any rate, in having words grow out of littleness and meanness into something large and generous. There are words that have dwindled and shrivelled up. There are those with an astringent quality which pucker the mouth; and there are words which have become richer, sweeter, juicier. Some of them are dear household words, indigenous, they cannot be easily grafted on another tongue. Some of them, too, are blooming and fruiting out in the churchyard, and hang their fruit over the wall which is supposed to divide the church from the world. We like to see this blossoming and ripening. The persimmon is not agreeable eating until it is just ready to decay. It is too astringent, liable to purse the mouth, like the strings of a miser's money-bag when he is asked for contribution. Its sweetness comes rather late. But better than if it did not come at all. Our Puritan fathers seemed to delight in sour apples, and some of their faces look as though they had eaten a good many. The Puritan theology is a little too tart for modern teeth. Very liberal doses of sugar are now needed to make it palatable, but we need to look out that we do not add too much. It is better to sweeten the tree than to sweeten the sour fruit in the kitchen.

THE best way to ripen a green, gnarled sour old word is to infuse in it sunshine and sweetness by the natural ripening processes of growth. To bring this about means the expansion of larger ideas and richer sentiments. There are words which mean a great deal more to-day than they did fifty years ago. They take no larger place in the dictionary, but they weigh more and measure more. The United States was once a small pair of words, but to-day they have a large significance in the vocabulary of nations. Christianity is a word of varying shapes and meanings. It has expanded and contracted from time to time; but to-day it means more than it ever did, and it ought to mean more than it does. Liberty means more than it once did, but still it needs to grow. We shall enlarge it not by making a Fourth of July noise, by spending money for powder and fire-crackers and blowing off our fingers and setting fire to our houses, but by infusing the spirit of liberty into our laws and institutions. There are many other words we should like to see enlarged. We should like to see Unitarianism mean not only the unity of God, but the unity of man. We should like to see baptism mean not only baptism by water, but baptism by fire. We should like to see the apostolic succession mean not the formal authentication of the priest, but the descent of the Holy Spirit. But, when one turns over the dictionary, he meets everywhere words that are in the bud, and must watch patiently for them to blossom and fruit.

A CORRESPONDENT criticises with reason the exclusive features of the Young Men's Christian Association and of the Society for Christian Endeavor. We have always had a deep interest in the work of these organizations, and wish them God-speed in every effort for the diffusion of righteousness, love, and the application of practical Christianity. But we regret that they insist upon creedal tests for membership. There is, indeed, a system of associate membership, through which these organizations are able to add to their revenues and in some degree to their influence. But it is practically the maintenance of the hypothetical and artificial line between saints and sinners which has obscured the view of Protestantism, and interfered with its success. The Young Men's Christian Association simply follows the example of the churches. In doing so, it follows a very bad precedent. The creedal test of membership has not succeeded in establishing a holy corporation or a holy spirit in the Church. It has created division, multiplied sects, and been a constant barrier to the diffusion of love, which is one of the first objects of the Church to promote. These organizations for practical work have nothing to lose, but everything to gain, by taking a larger view of Christian life and character, and making their conditions of membership as broad as their Christian aim and purpose. As a matter of fact, there are few Protestant churches to-day broad enough to admit to membership the mixture of saints and sinners which made up the primitive Church.

If the fence which the Church has built around itself were as large as the bounds of Christianity, there would be less to complain of; for Christianity with the largest and freest interpretation is hospitable enough for saints and sinners, Jews or Gentiles. Unfortunately, the creedal bounds established by the Church have been so narrow and exclusive that they would no more hold the great body of Christians than Noah's ark would hold the animals it was built to save. Like the legendary builder of the ark, the Christian Church has acted on the assumption that only a few of the human race could be saved anyway; and it has been its main business to get these few into the ark. The Church has therefore failed to be the sufficient exponent of Christian sentiment; and it cannot be said that it has succeeded in establishing any line between itself and the world which is not arbitrary and artificial. We have never been able to say that ecclesiastical morals are any better than non-ecclesiastical morals. The theological test of membership has kept some saints out, but it has let a good many sinners in. Happily now, there are churches which are boldly announcing that they do not assume to be a close corporation of saints or theologians, but that they exist to bring in the kingdom of God. Their membership is not conditioned on dogmatic tests. They welcome not only those who are saved, but also those who need salvation,—the only salvation which is worthy of the name, that of sound, wholesome, character.

WE are sometimes tempted to ask, What has become of the ideal of American liberty? It looks as if we were about to drive it, like Hagar and Ishmael, into the wilderness. There is a narrow, fanatical cry of "America for Americans." It means that there shall be enough liberty here for Americans, but not for anybody else. And so we enacted laws against the admission of the Chinese, laws against the importation of foreign labor, and in New York State the legislature was guilty of passing an act making it unlawful for a contractor to employ any persons except citizens of the United States in the construction of public works. A Buffalo contractor who employed an Italian on a contract for paving in a portion of that city was recently arrested and convicted of a violation of the law. But, fortunately, the general term of the superior court reversed the conviction, and pronounced the statute unconstitutional. The Nation, in commenting upon this incident, says: "If the several States have power to enact such laws as this, it is evident that the general government will soon have trouble with foreign countries. Our treaty with Italy provides that Italians residing in the United States shall enjoy the same rights and privileges in respect to their persons and property as are secured to our own citizens, and similar provisions are generally inserted in treaties. While Congress has power to override treaties, the State legislatures have not; and upon this ground alone, as Judge White says, the statute could be held unconstitutional."

THE spirit of antagonism to foreigners in China, breaking out in deeds of violence, may furnish a mirror in which we may be able to see ourselves. It is but another manifestation of race prejudice. When we see it in China, it looks very ugly to us; and, when American citizens are injured or endangered, they are very prompt about talking of protection and reprisal. This manifestation of Chinese prejudice is indeed bad enough; but it is not any worse than the hatred of the Chinese which may be found in this country, and that has shown itself from time to time in acts of violence, in which innocent Chinese have been the victims. The spirit of race prejudice which flames up in China is the same wicked spirit which leads whites in the West to commit outrages upon unoffending Indians, to lynch Negroes in the South, to slaughter Italians by mob violence, and to put Jews under a ban of social persecution. We must beware, then, of a hypocritical assumption of virtue when we inform the Chinese government, through our minister, of our displeasure at such intolerance. Perhaps the Chinese will reply that, if Americans would stay at home, they would not be in danger of their lives in China, and that it proposes to adopt the American plan, and pass a law forbidding them to dwell in that country.

AN INVESTMENT WITH INTEREST.

THERE are investments which pay no interest, and there are those which do. There are investments which are safe, and there are those which are dangerous. The investment we speak of is safe, and it will yield a good dividend. Franklin is credited with the saying that it is as safe for a man to put his money into his brain as into his pocket. If it is safe for one to cultivate his own mind and heart, it is as safe to cultivate those of his children. During the summer several weeklies have thought it worth while to give their readers an educational number, in which the merits of various institutions have been well advertised. It is a good investment of space. In the interest of the same cause of education, we wish to call attention to an organization and to certain instrumentalities with which all of our readers ought to be familiar, and which offers them a good investment for time and money.

Among the great mass of exchanges that come to our office every week, there is one which we would like to see in every family in the country. That may be a large wish. That journal is not prepared for a circulation of fifteen million. If we moderate this wish, and say, "We would like to see it in every Unitarian Sunday-school and in every Unitarian family," our wish for its prosperity would be altogether too small; but its fulfilment would insure to it a large increase of circulation. The fact must not be concealed that Unitarians do not support as they should the papers and periodicals which are prepared not exclusively for, but with reference to a Unitarian constituency. If all Unitarians who could take the Christian Register or the Unitarian were to send their subscriptions, there would be a large increase of the mailing-list of these papers. But we are speaking now of Every Other Sunday, the bright, clean, sparkling, wholesome bi-weekly edited by Rev. E. A. Horton and published by the Unitarian Sunday School Society. This paper marks a wide departure from the Sunday-school papers of earlier days. The old-fashioned papers were often more senile than juvenile. Every Other Sunday is youthful in spirit, but wholesome, earnest, and manly in tone. The reaction from the straight-laced, pietistic tone of the old-fashioned Sunday-school literature has driven some writers for young people into gross violations of good taste. But in Every Other Sunday one may find instruction, entertainment, animation, combined with refinement and good taste. The pains that are taken by the able editor to make this journal what it ought to be should meet with prompt recognition and support.

It is timely, too, to speak not only of Every Other Sunday, but of the society which publishes it. In about a month—that is, by the 1st of October—the books of the society will close for the current year. They ought not to close without bearing upon their pages the name of every Sunday-school or church in the Unitarian fellowship, as well as a host of parents and individuals, as partners and stockholders. The Sunday School Society is not only a book concern which furnishes a long catalogue of valuable literature for Sunday-school teachers and scholars, but it is an organization which directly invites the partnership, co-operation, and fellowship of churches, Sunday-schools, and parents. A Sunday-school or church making any contribution to the treasury of the society before the 1st of October of the current year is entitled to three delegate members to the annual meeting, with full powers. Life membership is only $10.00. Life members can be made from donations of churches and Sunday-schools when they are sufficiently large. This year the annual meeting of the association will be held at Providence. There is every prospect of a large attendance. The Sunday School Society is in anything but a moribund condition. We are not asking for money to buy its shroud and give it a decent burial. It is fully alive, active and working. The interest in it was never greater. It is just because it is doing so much that we should like to put it in a condition to do more. It has had an honorable and worthy history. Unitarianism did not begin in the nursery, but in the study and the pulpit. Its early controversies were exegetical and philosophical, and the literature which grew out of it was adapted rather to mature or ripening minds. It was only later discovered that Unitarian Sunday-schools were nearly devoid of literature and text-books, presenting with simplicity the results of modern Biblical study, the principles of ethics, the science of good government, as well as studies in biography, philanthropy, and practical morality. The society has secured the co-operation of some of the most eminent Unitarian scholars and writers in supplying this great need. It is now able to offer one of the most valuable outfits of text-book for Sunday-school instruction, as well as hymnals and devotional literature. Much has been done: there is still more to do. This is an investment which is sure to yield a good return. To educate our children is to lay the foundation of individual and social prosperity.

Let our churches, Sunday-schools, and parents tell the Unitarian Sunday School Society that they are pleased with its work, and that they want it to do more. And the most graceful and effective way to convey this compliment and this desire will be to send as promptly as possible a generous collection to the treasurer.

THE DIVINE BREATH.

In all religions the hidden life of the soul is compared to breath, a principle of existence inhaled, made effective by contact with the receptive nature. Spiritual growth is an act of receptivity. This is the one condition. The sustaining element is found everywhere; but, as in a close room the air is impure, and fetid, so in the closed soul there is no invigorating intercourse with the spiritual springs by which we are fed.

The believers in the divine breath are called mystics, and such they are; for only those who have lived on this fine air can affirm, and those who affirm cannot prove save by shining beauty of life and exaltation of being. Large numbers of people have no belief in the mystical union of the soul with God. They will not allow that such a thing is possible. They have not felt the need or the longing for such an experience. The people who affirm the possibility are to them visionaries. They conclude that such states are due to nerves, or to an unbalanced mental condition. A scientific and investigating age is sceptical of these things. It forces such as believe in them to hide them deep in the heart. The profoundest religious testimony is not heard in the experience meeting or on the mourner's bench. There are hours that transcend analysis. They belong to the realm of pure being, where words are not, and realities present themselves undisguised.

Shy as we are of the expression of these things, all religious forms and exercises are based on the presumption of their truth. It is the preacher's office to rise in the pulpit and tell his hearers what he has learned directly from God, at first hand, and not from books and the lips of theological professors. If he has not received a personal message, and felt the divine breath of the spirit, his ministrations have no religious significance. Unless he has taken his inspiration from the springhead, and not from the artificial conduit, how can he lead men to peace and hope? How can he deepen the spiritual channels in the place where he lives? The fact that he stands in the pulpit as teacher and guide indicates that he believes, or some time has believed, in the divine breath, in a fellowship with and personal relation to God that transcends definition,—the mystical union of the soul with its Maker. He is to open to others, if he can, the door to this supreme experience.

Our holiest hours are incommunicable, too personal, too profoundly felt to be shared save by indirect radiation. Men may live moral lives without the divine breath. They may dispense with churches and ordinances, with fasting and prayer, and still be just and true and upright in their relations; but religion predicates a something that passes these excellences and attains to the beauty of holiness,—an ideal more spontaneous, sweeter, purer than the moral standard that measures out its mint, anise, and cumin with absolute precision. It lives by the vision on the Mount. Such hours may be few in number, even in a long life. We are not told that Moses went to the top of Sinai every day, or even more than twice or thrice. His experience is a symbol of the religious life of man. It is only for an hour, perhaps, that the divine breath breathes upon us; but it changes our relation to time and to eternity.

Nothing earthly can supply those needs that spring up in the depths of the soul. It must enter the invisible sphere. It must find rest in the thought, the presence, of God. But seeking alone will not satisfy. It must find response. Its longings and hungerings must be met. How God satisfies the soul in these states transcends definition. Some way the word of peace is spoken, the blessing is bestowed. After long wandering in worldly ways, we return, parched and athirst, to the living waters. The unspeakable loneliness of life drives the being back to its last resource. If it has no home in God, there comes despair.

All joy, all love, all receptivity, at last are seen to be only portions and fragments and sparkles of the completeness that is in him, and in him alone. Mysticism must have been greatly abused to be so disturbed; for, in truth, we are all mystics, as at moments we are all poets. Prayer could never have come into the world without a profound instinctive conviction in man of the divine breath. The act of getting upon the knees, of falling upon the face in devotion,—what is it but the attitude in which it is felt that God will come, and his breath may breathe upon the spirit? Scepticism has sought to take the vitality out of prayer; but the inventors of prayer tests are more shallow than those who put up gross petitions for personal gifts and favors. Men must pray: otherwise madness would be more common than it is. The conditions of this tragic life press them to the dust, where they lie dumbly waiting for the visitation of the divine breath, the silent soothing and healing of the Spirit. There are places in every life where hard common sense and reason fail, where the soul can only cry out to the Eternal, and wait for a sign that it is heard. That the need of prayer is universal shows that the divine breath of consolation is a reality. Without the instinctive belief of the race in its efficacy, there would be no religion. The dullest soul that puts up a formless petition to God is a mystic, though he may scorn the term. Still he believes there is a Fount of Love, a soothing, helpful, supporting Power in the universe.

Those who affirm that there is a divine Breath which sustains the soul as the natural atmosphere sustains the body have the testimony of a great analogy. It will submit to no chemical test: it will not yield to the cunning of the retort and blowpipe. It yields no visible reaction, but it is the sustaining spiritual force of the world. Who can tell his neighbor how God and his religion help him to bear the ills of life? If he tries to tell, he may stammer, may fall into platitudes, or repeat trite and outworn texts; but the reality of God's help is in his consciousness. He may see a leer on the faces of those who doubt all but the manifestations of gross matter; but they, too, live by the mystic Breath. Instinctively, they believe more than they profess to believe in the Power that rules us all. Their very profanity bears rude testimony to their faith.

The dislike of religion and mysticism, however, is real. Its roots run deep. Not that every one who laughs at piety and dislikes the strait-lacing of conscience is not at times secretly religious. Religion is so universal, the commonest loss or sorrow brings it welling into the heart. With a sense of dependence God comes in. He follows where grief has left the door open. But, somehow, the religionists have often failed to make the outward manifestation of religion lovely. The tradition of its crabbed sourness and sharp angularity has prejudiced those who wish to be happy in their own way. God is not a ritualist or a Puritan. His spirit is a free gift. The divine Breath is like the wind that bloweth where it listeth. The churches have a share of his spirit; but the wide universe is his holy temple, in which he dwells forever.

BY THE SEA.

Nothing between us and Spain! Nothing, that is, but miles upon miles of this wonderful, billowy, shimmering ocean and the life-giving air above it; "and though thy soul sail leagues and leagues beyond, still leagues beyond those leagues there is more sea," and these shining stretches of beauty quiet the inner unrest and smooth out the mental wrinkles of anxious thought. There is no room for personal, commonplace worries in the presence of these eternal whisperings. We take the word of Keats to heart, and let our vexed and tired eyes rest on the wideness of the sea, and our ears "dinned with uproar rude" accustom themselves to the ocean harmonies, until we forget the jar and fret over little things that intrude too much on our daily moods.

These great rocks seem inhospitable and threatening at first to the unaccustomed visitor; but how quickly they change when once met on their own terms, and how graciously they offer up their choicest secrets for our delight! The tide is going out, and we climb trustfully over the great boulders which each high tide cuts off from the mainland, until we reach the highest point and find a resting-place where mermaids might gather to dry their hair in the sunshine, just for the pleasure of dipping it again in the water. On a great rock before us, round which the waves are scrambling and splashing, we can see this very minute a sea-god's fingers clinging to the upper edge as he lets himself down, startled by our coming, into the water below.

A few moments more, and we make our zigzag way downward, seeking the very rocks where shortly before the waves were dashing. Here the crimson dulse reminds us that the edge of the sea holds treasures no middle depths can reveal, and we search for the marvellous life hidden in the tiny pools left in the cracks and hollows. Most of the anemones are closed, finding, perhaps, the light too strong for such delicate operations as they carry on; but here, in the shadow of a rock, a few of these flower-like types of marine life are blooming with the apparent innocence of their terrestrial counterparts. No hint is here of the zoöphyte's invisible shafts of protection, nor the voracity that enjoys even a fat scallop on occasion. In this deep fissure, with its cavernous recesses, we find the most brilliant starfish, pink, red, and even an unusual green. Surely, the United States Commission that is planning a star-fish crusade in the interest of the oysters (or perhaps the oyster-eaters) need not disturb this secluded aquarium of nature. Here is a sea-urchin,—who would remember the name Echinus, when the more graphic word is equally available?—seeming lifeless except that it draws together its tiny spines as it lies turned over on the palm of the hand. We take it to a convenient pool and watch it wake to sudden activity, and stretch out its delicate violet tentacles through the water, seeking the sea food that seems actually willing to be caught, so promptly does it appear. No matter with how swift a movement we snatch the tiny creature from the water, instantly all the tentacles have disappeared, and it is again the bristling inanimate lump.

What hungry little things all these creatures are! Even the barnacles, wedged close together on the sides of the rocks, wave their fan-like petals to and fro, seeking something to eat, always something to eat. Each one is just a stomach and a hand, and the one exists only to serve the other. Sometimes the curly plume will wave about for several seconds, finding nothing; and then comes by apparently a whole shoal of the little crabs, invisible to our coarser sight, and the tiny hand draws in again and again, making the most of its opportunity. But, no matter how busily it works, it can never satisfy its greedy master, the stomach.

Tired at last of lying flat on the rocks, we make ourselves comfortable once more as close as we can get to the water's edge; and we watch the swirl of the current between two boulders where the water is sucked in and again thrown back with almost sentient force. The white-breasted sea-larks flutter near us with a joyousness of motion that makes them seem akin to the spray thrown up over the smaller rocks. Here by the sea one learns, for the time at least, a supreme indifference to many of the little matters that insistently fill up our lives; and the thoughts are drawn inevitably to the ancient questionings and the eternal answers. A great joy or a great sorrow may hold the soul with a domination stronger than that of all the outside universe, and then the sea can only gradually assert its power; but in any mood less compelling such days by the sea, while in one sense lifting us out of ourselves, are yet curiously interwoven always with a strange, unspeakable desire for fuller, completer life. Always alluring our questioning, always denying our desires, yet changing imperceptibly under our very eyes, and suggesting the answers it never lets us fully grasp, the sea holds us to visions of something beyond and outside of our daily experiences. This note of unappeasable longing is in all the ocean harmonies. Rossetti called it "the echo of the whole sea's speech." To Lowell it seemed "forever seeking something it cannot find," and to Emerson it made open confession of its mystic power:—

"I, too, have arts and sorceries;
Illusion dwells forever with the wave.
I know what spells are laid. Leave me to deal

With credulous and imaginative man;
For, though he scoop my water in his palm,
A few rods off he deems it gems and clouds.
Planting strange fruits and sunshine on the shore,
I make some coast alluring, some lone isle,
To distant men, who must go there, or die."

Musings.

ONCE more my desk has a keel. It has also a smoke-stack; and, while I muse, the fire burns. I pity the poor stokers. Perhaps they pity me. My desk has a rolling top and also a rolling bottom. The mast is writing the figure 8 on the sky. Whenever the mast indulges in this sort of arithmetic, it always disturbs my own calculations. It conflicts with the sound of the dinner-bell. I have dragged myself resolutely from my berth and gone to every meal. Nevertheless, I feel like the German friend who once sent me an essay for correction which contained the following sentence, "Man without religion will always find something lacking in his interior." There is something lacking in my interior. Somehow, the Sunday service, conducted by an Episcopalian chaplain in full regimentals, has not filled the void. My convictions, however, have become more settled. I could not swallow the Athanasian creed without getting seasick, but a plainer and less rancid dietary is more grateful.

This floating desk is named the "Marpesa." A comfortable, well-fitted, and well-manned steamer it is, of the Dominion Line. If only the mast were less intoxicated! But it is not the fault of the craft, but of the swelling bosom of the sea. We are running steady now. If you want to know what a jolly tar means, you should sail with Capt. Cave and his little white bull-dog, "Nell." There is a theory that a captain must shut himself up in his cabin and confine himself to his chart. Capt. Cave not only studied his charts, but managed to visit all his sea-sick passengers every morning, and to cheer them up with the magnetism of his personal presence, which was worth more than a dose of medicine. He could calculate as closely the position of a disk in shuffle-board as he could make an observation of the sun's disk at noon. And I have seen the young ladies piloting him through the rocks and shoals of "Sir Roger de Coverley" or the "Virginia Reel," if you know it better by that name; while the first officer played delightfully on his violin, and the doctor accompanied with a banjo. I like this northern route for summer travel. One reason is that you have more land in proportion to the amount of sea than on any other route on the Atlantic. There were only four days on which land was not visible. After we had left Liverpool, we had next day the north of Ireland. There were no oranges growing there. It looked green enough to satisfy the most ardent Fenian. Then came four days of watery waste, and on the fifth we sighted Belle-Isle. The name is very suggestive and sweet to me. It seemed like a greeting from the queen of my own household. We passed the northern shores of Newfoundland, up the Straits of Belle-Isle, with Labrador lying low on the north. This is a favorite coasting-ground for icebergs; and we saw a great regatta, thirty of them under full sail. How they gleamed and sparkled in the sun, and what various shapes they took! Then we passed the island of Anticosti, and at last entered the St. Lawrence River at Father Point. There the pilot brought us a batch of letters. It is delightful to be able to get welcoming letters from friends twelve hours before reaching Quebec.

QUEBEC always impresses me with its commanding situation. It would stand a hot fire from an enemy; and I have felt the sun so hot there that it seemed as if the stone walls of the citadel ought to melt, and run in lava down to the river. The march of improvement is seen to some extent in this historic spot, and fire, as well as progress, has removed some of the picturesque features of the old town; but there is enough left to make it still interesting to the American, especially if he sees it before he goes to Europe instead of when he comes back. There is a noble view from the citadel. I should have been more interested in seeing the old town again if a great circus had not appeared as we were driving about. I can never quite resist the fascination of elephants, horses, of ponies and golden chariots and camels and lions and tigers, if the latter are properly caged. It is a survival of an early interest in Noah's ark. But floating now in my memory is a beautiful picture of Quebec by moonlight, as seen from the steamer. Then, after lying all day at dark in the stream, the anchor is lifted, and we steam up the St. Lawrence by moonlight, threading our way through the buoys until midnight, when the gong sounds rest to the engine, and we lie to four hours for more water and more light. It is curious this transformation of an ocean liner into a river steamer. The pathway between the buoys seems narrow enough, and a skilled pilot is needed; and at times one can almost toss a biscuit on the shore, which is flat and marshy, but delightfully green, and dotted here and there with villages. The trip up the St. Lawrence forms a pleasant close to a pleasant voyage.

I AM still on foreign soil; but I am at home,—at home on the beautiful waters of Memphremagog, at home among hills and mountains and forests, rocks and shores, yet more at home in the presence of familiar and beloved faces. I am still in a country where British pennies will buy stamps at the post-office, and where the British flag floats above the American on the tall flag-staff. But, after spending some portion of every summer for eighteen years on these familiar shores, it is hard to feel that I am "abroad," and, diplomatically considered, just as much in a foreign land as if I were in Switzerland. When the full history of the Shayback camp at Birch Bay is written, it will furnish some interesting material for the evolutionist. It is an object-lesson in the development of social and industrial institutions. What I am most afraid of is that the development will go on too rapidly, and that before long camp will lose every trace of savagery. The telegram I sent from Father Point twelve hours before we reached Quebec ("Prophetic ice-cream-burgs, six people, twelve appetites, a thousand hearts") had borne its fruit. The dinner was ample, and the ice-cream delightful; but it had been frozen in an automatic freezer. The happy days when one used to stand on the freezer while another turned the crank are gone. No more licking of the dasher to reward the labor at the crank. You simply pour in the cream and the pickle, avoiding, if possible, putting them in the same vessel; and in a few minutes the thing is done. It used to be a delightful task to go up to the spring for ice-cold water; but now it flows through logs into a rustic spring-house near the camp kitchen. Once we had to row to the village for ice: now a convenient little ice-house set in the woods holds a store cut from the icy roof of the lake every winter. And so the demon of improvement marches on, and threatens to turn the Shayback camp into a fashionable watering-place. But, with nineteen tents and a log cabin, there is still a good deal of circus left; and among all my travels I have found no place where I get just the life and find just the rest I get here.

WELL, it has been a rather long trip from Boston to the Shayback camp by the route I have taken,—Boston to New York, New York to Liverpool, a zigzag, round-about trip through England, then London, Salisbury, Weymouth, the Channel Islands, Normandy, Paris, Switzerland, London, and Liverpool, Quebec, Montreal, Magog, and the camp at Birch Bay. There was a decided contrast between the mighty "Lucania," six hundred feet long, in which we left New York, and the little thirty-five-foot steam launch that brought us on the lake from Magog to Birch Bay. But the welcome we received at the wharf at Birch Bay was as enthusiastic as the send-off at New York. The little wharf was almost as much crowded, in proportion to its size, as the great pier when the ocean liner sailed. And now a more stately craft is bearing us toward American waters. It is the "Lady of the Lake." I like her because she is always perfectly sober. Her mast never writes the figure 8, or a figure 5 made from the bottom upward, as I used to write it when a boy. She has been fitted up anew. She sails along as steadily as a swan. She is freighted with a Sunday-school excursion. "Pilot," I said, "blow the whistle, please, when you cross the line." We are nearing Province Island. The United States is coming into view. Newport is getting into focus. On the west shore there is a large rock bearing a distinct mark. "There it is,"—the boundary line between the United States and Canada. There is a puff of steam, and then the sharp whistle. We have crossed the American line. The stars and stripes from the flag-staff seem to be reflected in the water. Once more at home from a foreign shore! The custom-house officer is waiting to greet us; and, with patriotic emotion, we shall open our trunks and meal-bags, and show him the old clothes we have brought from camp.

Brevities.

The Knights Templar have captured Boston this week. There are enough Masons here to build anew the temple of Solomon. They are all free, and, from the reception they have received, may be considered to be accepted.

A minister was spoken of as "a seedy preacher." If it were meant that there is seed in his sermons, and that he knows how to sow them, the reproach may be a compliment. But perhaps the seed does not all fall on good ground.

Prof. E. L. Richards contributes an article to the current number of the Popular Science Monthly, in which he shows how much the mind gains by the proper exercise of the body. The brain and nervous system are supplied with more and better blood, the repair of waste is more complete, and, since there is a necessary putting forth of will in all use of the voluntary muscles, the mind is exercised while the body works.

The New York Witness says, "A high-kicking skirt-dancer from New York was one of the attractions at an entertainment given in behalf of a church out in Michigan recently." We are not told of what denomination this church was, and whether the dancer was a man or a woman. But it is worth noting that, through the progress of ritualism, skirts in motion are just now very popular in the Episcopal Church.

The new treasurer of the American Unitarian Association, in his bright notes written at headquarters, complains of being lonely. We suspect that a gentle shower of contributions, large and small, to the American Unitarian Association treasury would make him feel quite at home, and remove any sense of solitariness. Checks can be sent by telegraph as well as by mail.

During the last three months the editor, though away from his desk, has seldom been separated from his readers; and the last Register contained some twelve columns from his pen. He has not succeeded in circulating as widely as the paper, but he has covered several thousand miles. During six weeks of his absence the managing editor was Mrs. Isabel C. Barrows, for six weeks Rev. S. W. Bush, and the last number was ably put to press by Mrs. E. E. Marean, who, with Mr. Bush, has rendered constant and valuable service. The ripened judgment of Rev. Howard N. Brown, Rev. Charles G. Ames, and Rev. George Batchelor have been felt in the spirit and the administration of the paper. Contributions of Miss Augusta Larned have enriched the editorial page.

Pro and Con.

THE BAPTISTS AND PERSECUTION.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

In the recently published biography of John G. Whittier is a letter written by him relative to the persecution of Quakers by the Puritans of New England, which contains the following statement:—

"With the single exception of the Friends, every sect in Christendom believed in the right of the magistrate to punish heresy."

As a personal friend of Mr. Whittier through more than half the period of his life, I do not hesitate to assert that no man could surpass him in an earnest desire to be just. Therefore, such a statement from him is startling. Every student of ecclesiastical history knows that the Baptist Church not only denied such right of a magistrate, but has always been a zealous advocate of religious liberty for each individual soul.

When Roger Williams left Massachusetts and founded a church and colony in Rhode Island, this was among its fundamental principles; and the persecuted Quakers had perfect liberty to dwell there in peace, and preach their doctrines. And from that day to this the Baptist Church has been a sturdy opponent of the union of Church and State.

It is difficult to understand how Mr. Whittier fell into such an error, unless his Quaker training and tastes repelled the study of church histories. However that may have been, I know that he would have hastened to correct his mistake if he had been aware of it, and to do justice to a Church to which we all owe so much.

A UNITARIAN.

LOOK BENEATH THE SURFACE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The recent large and enthusiastic meetings in Boston of the Societies of Christian Endeavor have called forth much eulogistic comment from the periodical press, secular as well as religious. One important peculiarity, however, of the organization and method of this association seems to have received no notice; and yet this feature of the Endeavorers' policy is so remarkable and significant that, without recognition of it, much of the character and influence of the association will fail to be understood.

Dr. O. W. Holmes has somewhere described a class of men which he calls "the Brahmin caste of New England." He meant by that phrase persons who, sprung from a refined and intelligent ancestry, have inherited and continued to cultivate intelligence and refinement. The characterization is just, as well as expressive; but there is now existing and flourishing among us a class of persons to whom the phrase "the Brahmin caste of New England" much more appropriately belongs.

The cultured, refined, literary class which

Dr. Holmes had in mind do not claim to be, and are not, in fact, better men than the average of their fellow-citizens. They have even special faults of their own; and a considerable portion of the superiority generally conceded to them is a superiority of surface, like veneering, which may perhaps conceal serious defects. Moreover, they are not an organized body. They are, and prefer to be, individuals. They rarely act in concert, and take no measures of proselytism to increase their number. They very rarely speak or act as a class, and they make no pretensions as a class. The New England men whom I have in mind as bearing a much stronger resemblance than these to the Brahmin caste of India are two organized bodies constituting two societies for active practical work. The central idea of their founders was that, since they were better and wiser than the mass of the community around them, this superiority in wisdom and goodness imposed upon them certain obligations. Recognizing the duty of the strong to help the weak, of the wise to enlighten the ignorant, and of the good to seek the reformation of the evil, they assumed that their voluntary undertaking of measures so useful and important entitled them to claim and exercise the authority of teachers over pupils. They determined to establish a paternal government, to rule for the purpose of doing good. Their view was wide-reaching in its comprehensiveness. Their field was the world. So they made a beginning with the community around them, inviting all to partake of their beneficence on condition of submitting to their authority. These societies, entitled the Young Men's Christian Association and the Society of Christian Endeavor, consist of active members and associate members. The associates, or low-caste members, can neither vote nor hold office. They enter the society to be governed, while the active members enter it to govern.

The rulers in both these societies have a genuine desire to benefit the community around them; but the consideration demanded from those who accept their benefits is distinct acknowledgment, practical as well as theoretical, of the superiority of the Brahmin caste. These rulers are, and have determined to continue to be, the governing class, the "upper crust"; and each "associate" who joins them must silently submit to be ruled at the pleasure of this class.

The Indian Brahmins claim superiority on the ground that they are holy. The New England Brahmins make the same claim on the ground that they are pious. But to this point of resemblance between the two succeeds a material point of difference. The Indian Brahmins wish to monopolize holiness for themselves, and have no desire to diffuse it, or to allow its benefits to be shared by the inferior castes. The New England Brahmins, on the contrary, associate themselves expressly for the purpose of extending to others the advantages of that piety which they claim to possess and to find precious. While, therefore, the Indian Brahmin makes his holiness a ground for selfish isolation, and even for contempt of his inferiors, the New England Brahmin is moved by his piety to seek intimacy with others, that he may benefit them.

Thus the opportunity of promotion is offered to all the "associate," or inferior, caste. Whoever of them shall be certified by competent "evangelical" authority to be pious (since the testimony of Unitarians or Universalists will not avail), may become a Brahmin, and thus entitled to various rights and privileges beyond those of common men.

History tells us that, among the Plymouth Pilgrims, only church members were allowed to vote in civil affairs or to be chosen town officers. Piety, certified by evangelical church membership, was the indispensable qualification for the exercise of civil rights. The State of Massachusetts and the United States of America long ago gave up this ground as untenable. Time will show how much further the two societies above mentioned will be able to carry the system of caste thus established. The main purpose of them both is to support and enlarge the churches of the various denominations classed as orthodox or evangelical; but is not their policy, organized and insisted on as above described, closely akin to that system of caste in India which American missionaries are trying to break down?

CHARLES K. WHIPPLE.

For the Christian Register.
OUR YEARS.

BY EDWIN E. WOODMAN.

They come and go. As waves upon a beach
Now lap our feet and now elude our reach,
The rolling years, in quick succession tossed,
Spring in the future, sparkle here, are lost.
We have but heard the nesting cat-bird's groom,
We scarce have counted half the summer's bloom,
Ere autumn maples by a fiery shower
Fright every lyric wing, dull every flower.
Winter succeeds, with killing winds that blow
Cerements upon the frozen world in snow.
Then, while we mourn so surely dead a thing,
Dogwoods break white, we circle into spring!
Thus life and death are linked in endless chain.
So after death come life and youth again.

AGNOSTICISM OUTGROWN.

BY REV. E. P. POWELL.

There are temporary passages of history, when people are too tired from some great intellectual struggle to take interest in problems equally important or, possibly, greater. Agnosticism, covering the whole subject of eschatology, or the science of the future life, became a necessity about the time that evolution began to develop the riches of this world and this life. To classify the data of the world we live in under the single law of unity and progress overworked the brains of investigators. A circular letter sent by the Register to men of science, asking what science taught on the question of immortality, brought a preponderating response that science concerned itself with this life. Mr. Darwin to inquirers answered that he sometimes believed in the doctrines of God and immortality, and sometimes doubted the same. But to the public he said he assumed the current views of religion to be correct, but had in no way concerned himself with them. Evolution, as taught by him, was the doctrine of life on this globe. Where it came from or what became of it he did not undertake to discuss. So it was that Mr. Darwin was a real agnostic.

That there is a great reaction in favor of positive faith is seen in every department of literature. The Church is slowest of all to yield faith: it is slowest of all to recover positive belief. It seems probable that for some time yet we shall see the anomaly of a church teaching less than social and political, or even physical, science. The curious picture is now quite world-wide of scientists and politicians laying down more positive theological beliefs than the theologians. The latter have reduced essential articles to the least possible number, while the former are squaring data to a creed long enough to please the Council of Trent. Dr. Momerie says in a recent symposium that we may insist only on the doctrines of God and immortality: "Faith in God and immortality seems to me the only rational basis for morality. If there be no immortality, the universe is rotten to the core, and therefore devotion to goodness is the crowning folly of the race." This sort of logic is likely to wreck what little belief the Church has left. The really moral man never places his character and selection of rightness on the fact that there is another life to make right payable. To do the right thing is common sense and good policy, and the faith of the whole world rests on the assurance that right will win. This is ingrained in the plodder's proverb and the sage's apothegms. It is doubtful if the mere belief in immortality has ever been of any great value morally or intellectually. It is accepted not as a first choice; for, by all odds, the first choice of most people is never to die. It is associated with such extravagance of unseen terrors or unwholesome joys that it has had a tendency to weaken the simpler and purer loves involved in the Golden Rule.

Without, however, carrying on a discussion with Mr. Momerie, whose creed has such a diminuendo tendency, we turn to Mr. Balfour, as representative of a class that has escaped from the pathetic undoing of Calvinism, and feels free to look out for a large basis for extended belief. It is a curious fact that no claim to political preference in England is stronger than a manifested power to step outside of pure politics, and synthesize the facts of life for other ends than matters of State. Mr. Gladstone is a better theologian than any existing bishop of England, and Mr. Balfour has more than doubled his political strength by publishing "The Foundations of Belief." It would be delightful if we could say he had been able to do anything permanent to allay the restlessness of scepticism or arouse men from agnostic stupor. How much may be expected from his book may be discovered in this vital passage: "We must not forget that it is Authority rather than Reason to which in the main we owe not religion only, but ethics and politics, that it is Authority which supplies us with essential elements in the premises of science, that it is Authority rather than Reason which lays deep the foundations of social life, that it is Authority rather than Reason which cements its superstructure." This he is not content with, absurd as we shall see it to be; but he adds, "Though it seems to savor of paradox, it is yet no exaggeration to say that, if we would find the quality in which we most notably excel the brute creation, we shall look for it, not so much in our faculty of convincing and being convinced by the exercise of reasoning as in our capacity for influencing and being influenced through the action of Authority." It is difficult to say in which these sentences exceed, whether in the helplessness of the logic or the incorrectness of definitions. Following, however, Mr. Kidd and other recent English authors, Mr. Balfour has relied largely on sweeping paradoxes. It seems enough to this class of authors to simply reverse an accepted theory, turn it squarely on its head, and then call it a new discovery in sociology or theology,—something overlooked by all the generations before us. Is there a shadow of ground for the assertion that the brute is more marked by its logic, and man by his capacity for blind obedience to authority? We certainly have larger instincts (hereditary powers) than animals; but we also live in a field of inquiry so limitless, and we persistently investigate so eagerly, that our lives out of the shadow of eternity and infinity are as one to ninety-nine.

In fact, we owe not one thing in religion, ethics, or politics to authority, but to that investigation, in part of others, in part our own, in whose correctness we have confidence. It is the ulterior investigation (positive knowledge) which we trust, and not the mere authority (diction) of any one. It is a very cheap assertion to make that we do not all expect always to investigate individually every topic or fact or set of facts. But because we trust others to do part of this for us does not indicate that we owe our religion to authority any more than we owe a coal of fire to the tongs or the purity of sugar to the bowl or the barrel. Authority is nothing of this sort. In religion the Protestant orthodox invariably speaks of authority as in the Bible as a revealed book: the Catholic speaks of authority, meaning the inspired Church, capable of receiving from God information or wisdom which, authoritatively, it reveals to the common people. Hold fast by either of these, and you have legitimate authority. But, clearly, Mr. Balfour means a very different something by his authority. He means that we get our science, our sociology, and ethics from great minds, whom we credit. He does not complete his logic, for these authorities reach back to ultimate reason. His elemental paragraph should therefore read, "We must not forget that it is authority based on reason, the authority of investigators, and not always our own individual reasoning, to which we owe our religious views, our ethics, and our politics." This feeble assertion of self-evident platitude is hardly worth the trouble of making, and so in all verity Mr. Balfour's book is hardly worth the writing. It has a breezy frankness that makes one on first opening it expect excellent things.

To help us out of agnosticism by leading us back to authority is hopeless. Reason has at last such a hold on us, and the duty of investigation is now so generally accepted that we may say that in any foundations of belief reason must be the cornerstone. Our real escape from agnosticism is here: that science—and I do not mean merely physical science—has enlarged its sphere. It has been able to get together, to group and classify, the enormous data that lay mountain high before Darwin; and it has been able to draw general conclusions in every department of life,—in theology, ethics, sociology, politics, history. In fact, Spencer began almost at the same time as Darwin began his analytic work to do this great synthetic work. But so astounded were we with the analysis of the latter that we were slow to feel the synthesis of the former. But, if the Register were to-day to send out a series of questions to the physicists of most note in the United States, the responses would not show a prevalent agnosticism as to God and immortality. There is no indifference as to the sphere of eschatology. No one can be found to urge that science has a sphere by itself, is not concerned with religion. On the contrary, religion is recognized as a science, the conclusion of all sciences, the science of sciences. It is not held to be possible to confine our researches to life facts pertaining to this globe's career. Evolution has widened out to consider the Cause, or Source, of Life on this globe.

The outlook is full of faith, no longer a blind credence, but a reasonable and reasoned confidence,—a belief that carries us substantially where all reason has carried us, to the spiritual basis of the universe, to him in whom we live and move and have our being. Between him and us there stands, however, no constituted "authority," no infallible interpreter. Our reasons face toward the Eternal Reason, as our love rests in the infinite Love. God from this standpoint is a scientific fact; and immortality is not a credence given to future rewards and punishments, but confidence in the continuity of that free soul that gladly enters into sonship with God. Science is unveiling the glory of that great truth, "Now are we the sons of God."

CONCERNING GENRE IN ART.

BY J. LEONARD CORNING, SR.

What we moderns call genre, for lack of a better name, has been known and cultivated in art from the earliest historic ages. We find it, as to substance, albeit with technique the most rudimental, in the paintings of the ancient Egyptians, on the slabs of Assyrian sculpture, and, with distinct signs of betterment, on the painted walls of Roman palaces and villas. Just what these old-time artists called it we do not know, and it is of no great consequence. Enough to say that the delineation of human life, as distinguished from inanimate nature, has been a very prominent aim of art as far back as history can take us with its records, whether written, carved, or painted, of the doings of man. And it would be no wonder if one of these days some future Lubbock or Mortillet should uncover a world of genre antedating by millenniums the pyramids of Egypt and the palaces of Nineveh, and opening an entirely new volume of prehistoric art.

Two facts seem to be beyond dispute: first, that American picture-buyers have as yet but slight acquaintance with the rich resources of genre; and, second, that they are gradually waking up to a new sense of their opportunities in this relation. My old teacher, Prof. Lübke, recently deceased, used to define genre to be any delineation of human life in art, the domain of the historical only excluded. Accepting this definition as the best that can be given in a single sentence, it will at once be seen that a world of motif absolutely exhaustless is opened to us. If the supply ever shows signs of decadence, it will be due to the infirm faculty of explorers, and not to any poverty of resource. With this little preliminary word, I will come directly to the purpose of this paper, which is to offer a few hints which, I hope, may be helpful to buyers of genre, as they have been helpful to me.

In this, as in all departments of art, there is a graded scale of merit, determined by the lesson taught and the quality of its appeal. A picture of human life is always interesting; and so genre, whether of low or high grade, if decently done as to technique, always finds ready buyers. Probably the genre element in Sir Edwin Landseer's paintings had more than anything else to do with their great popularity. This great artist, as is well known, introduced a human element into many of his animal groups, which held a mirror up to our daily life, giving us, if I may so express myself, the visible forms of quadrupeds with the mentality of bipeds. In this Landseer was the supreme artist of the animal kingdom for all time, and is not likely very soon to have a rival who can boast even of a show of success. Let us wander for a few moments through the halls and cabinets of a great picture-gallery, and test the worth of its genres by the standard which I have suggested,—the quality of the lesson contained and the quality of its appeal to the mind of the observer.

Here, for example, are square yards of the paintings of Teniers and Van Ostade, the great genre painters of the seventeenth century. Any of them would bring a great price if thrown on the markets of London or New York, chiefly, however, because of the fascination of age. Put them a century back, and add a little more of the smoke and grime of antiquity, and they would appreciate as railroad stocks and bonds do in a Wall Street revival of irreligion. But, after all, they belong, every one of them, to one of the lower grades of genre, as to moral substance, which is the most precious and abiding consideration. They picture, almost ad nauseam, the doings of beer-gardens and wine-shops and rustic dance-halls. All this is interesting enough in its way; but I can think of themes, and a good many of them, which tend more to edification by reason of their appeal to the better or the best part of our nature.

Leaping over the years, and coming down to our own times, we will individualize a few representative names. Of German painters of genre to-day, perhaps Defregger and Grützner may be classed among the most prominent; and their fame long since travelled over ocean and continent to the confines of civilization. Both are residents of the Bavarian capital, and of both their compatriots are justly proud. Defregger's themes, for the greater part, are drawn from the peasant life of the Tyrol, of which he is a native, the city of his adoption, however, being Munich. Some of his paintings have crossed the Atlantic, and are in American homes. Perhaps the most valuable of this little group is "The Horse Fair," owned by the late Marshall O. Roberts of New York. But nearly all of Defregger's pictures, whether in Europe or in America, are chiefly prized for their wonderful delineation of the lower grades of life among Tyrolean peasants. Once in a while, though rarely, the moral element comes in, as, for example, in his "Tischgebet," in which we see a rustic household gathered around a huge bowl of soup, out of which all are helping themselves, soup-plates being an unknown luxury. One of the children is standing in the act of asking the divine blessing on the simple repast, while every head is bowed in reverence, and the great family dog gazes upward in silent wonderment. This time the great painter has conducted us into the higher realms of genre, and I have often asked myself the question why he does not do it oftener. Perhaps, if we could persuade him that the moral element in a picture really adds to its mercantile value, he might take the problem into serious consideration.

Edward Grützner, as is well known, is Germany's great painter of fat and bibulous monks in wine and beer cellars. He often adds culinary solaces as accessories; but, with this little occasional digression, he almost never ventures outside of his specialty, in which he is confessedly without a superior, one might almost say without an equal. As is well known, the monasteries of Bavaria have long been suppressed by royal edict. But a few of the lost sheep may occasionally be seen in cowl and cassock on the streets of Munich; and there is a little group who keep themselves sleek and fat for Grützner's especial benefit, all considerations of personal solace being, of course, excluded. These carnal monks, in all possible situations and attitudes, have become nearly as stereotyped as chromos in Grützner's studio,—a factory which transmutes paint into pelf with astonishing rapidity and skill. People of full purses and bibulous tastes like to hang Grützner's fleshy and fleshy monks in their dining-rooms, as inspirational examples of gastric possibilities, I suppose. But nobody pretends that there is a morsel of moral inspiration in paintings like these. Interesting and amusing conceits they certainly are, besides being admirably wrought satires on the ecclesiasticism of a hundred years gone. But their mission ends here, and they must take their place among the genres of subordinate grade in the moral scale of valuation. Ludwig Knaus, formerly of Düsseldorf, but lately of Berlin, is a master in the art of combining amusement with moral appeal in genre. In his famous "Golden Wedding," we have a merry, rollicking crowd of dancers in a beer-garden in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of wedded love and loyalty in the lives of the aged couple who are dancing in the foreground. A wonderful sermon on the benediction of domestic fidelity is here; and on a canvas congregated with merry-makers the moral appeal is, after all, the most prominent feature.

In the great glass palace at Munich there is held, as is well known, an annual exposition of the art of all nations; and hither come some of the finest paintings of our time, and multitudes of visitors from all parts of the world to enjoy and be educated by them. In this great fragile hospice will always be found genres of every grade. Of the painters of them I will specify two, who to my thought occupy the higher levels of moral appeal. One of these is Blume-Siebert, and the other is George Jakobides. A picture of Blume-Siebert's which attracted the notice of the Bavarian prince-regent some years ago, and which I am informed his royal highness tried too late to purchase, was "The First Shoes." A peasant mother has brought her baby to the old cobbler of the village to get the first pair of shoes fitted to its tiny feet. She is a proud mamma, with the baby sitting there on her lap, half terrified and half defiant. The wrinkled face of the old cobbler is full of benignity as he holds the little foot tenderly in his withered hands. He shares the mother's pride and joy; and one would think, to look at his beaming eyes, that this was his first experience of such touching character, albeit it is likely that he has shod all the babies of the village for half a century. When I first saw that picture, I said to myself, "There is painted music for every mother's heart"; and, having a carte blanche for a goodly number of dollars from a rich relative on the Hudson, I closed a bargain straightway, and this beautiful appeal to the heart some time since crossed the Atlantic. George Jakobides is a Greek by birth, though Munich has long been his adopted home. He is the great painter of old age and childhood; and a painting of his showing a peasant grandfather tending baby, some years since exhibited in the glass palace of Munich, has haunted my memory ever since. It always had a group of gazers before it; and, in wandering through the vast halls and corridors, I continually found myself coming back to this masterpiece of domestic genre. Getting subsequently another carte blanche from an American picture-buyer, I found in the atelier of this gifted Greek the dearest old grandmother with a plump baby on her lap that I ever saw on canvas. The baby was as pulpy as German babies commonly are, with no intellectuality in its fat, round face to speak of. But the dear, old, wrinkled crone, bending over it with her tender eyes, sees great possibilities in that tiny form; and, if the baby realizes grandma's hopes, he will one of these days be a Bismarck or a Goethe. The artist called his picture, "Bei der Grossmutter"; but I told him to call it "Spring in the Lap of Winter," the name with which it was christened when it started on its long pilgrimage over the sea to brighten a home in the city of New York.

Of Jakobides I may say that he almost never omits to put a high moral element into his genres. He paints from the heart to the heart; and I wish that more of the great and tender appeals which he puts into visible form might go to American homes with their ministry of benediction.

Faulenbach bei Füssen, Bavaria.

A REMINISCENCE OF DIVINITY HALL.

BY A SCIENTIFIC STUDENT.

Reminiscences seem to imply a long lapse of time and venerable age in the relater, but this is a relative matter. If history undergoes a forced growth, and events accumulate rapidly, an antiquity is acquired by a decade as real as that which gradually mosses over the slow accretions of a century less active. It is really only twenty years ago since the writer went to Cambridge, fresh out of the West, with an ardent desire to pursue certain special studies at Harvard; and that ambition was about all he possessed. How he managed to live next to nowhere and upon next to nothing for a time, at first, does not matter to this tale; but at last he found himself (and little else) the occupant of a small front room on the ground floor of Divinity Hall. By dint of gifts and loans and rough carpentry, he managed to get the barest necessities of furniture, and settled himself to stay as long as he could, and meanwhile to squeeze every possible drop of juice out of the lemon of learning he was struggling to keep his grip upon.

As he sat down the other day upon the worn stone step where he used to lounge after tea, and peered at the window of his old room, and through a recollection somewhat blurred, like its wrinkled old panes, looked back to those days which seem so long ago, he could not recall that he suffered very much under the affliction of his circumstances, even though he knows that he was often hungry and sometimes cold, nor that he was greatly disturbed by anxiety. Why should he be? Fighting for his way was nothing new; nor, for that matter, has it ever grown old. He had nothing to lose except opportunity to study, and experience (or, perhaps, inexperience) led him to think that there were more ways than one of arriving at his object.

No massive buildings then filled the verdant square that lay in front of the old-fashioned theological school-house, and in those delicious October days the place was an ideal one in which to work or to loaf. The swaying elm-tops were great plumes of russet and yellow, shadowing thinly a natural greensward, where the asters were thickly sown and the golden-rod nodded in every out-of-the-way corner. The long avenue down to Kirkland Street was a blaze of scarlet, and carpeted with the shed glory of the maples; and beyond and behind were the dark and rustling pines of Norton's Woods, their bases masked by thickets of flaming barberry and birch and other shrubbery brilliant with the bravery of the New England autumn. One could look straight away westward to Oxford Street, and beyond its growing trees, across Jarvis Field, even to North Avenue, and doubtless could catch sight of the rounded dome of the "Washington Elm." Beyond there lived Lowell and Longfellow; and there was Revolutionary ground, and plenty of other things to stir a prairie-bred imagination. It must sometimes have been clouded and rainy; but the remembrance is only of skies doubly blue, and of all-pervading sunshine and cool, quiet air. Somehow the perfect serenity of the Sunday afternoons lingers most prominent in the picture,—peaceful hours when the robin and woodthrush were calling melodiously to one another from unseen perches as the sunset light streamed level through the branches, and the contented treble of the vireo mingled with vesper chimes, drifting warningly to our ears, as we listened and dreamed.

But these sweet recollections would never have been stored away in memory, had not a piece of great luck happened to him. Various unmanageable obligations to the university had been got rid of, and the plan of fighting a waiting campaign had succeeded up to the point of paying rent for this same little room. The sum was not large, but it was as far out of reach as if it had been ten times as great; and at last no postponement nor squirming nor immovability would longer suffice. The year's rent must be paid in advance, or the tenant must leave "to-morrow." Consoling himself with the only consolation in sight,—that the authorities had not said "to-day,"—and utterly blank as to what next, the said campaigner came into the hall a trifle late for dinner, which all the theologists were eagerly attending in the Commons Building in the rear. As he entered, he smelled a smell, and followed his nose down cellar, just furnished with stores of winter coal. Each room owned a binful of its own, and, beyond, guarded by a heavy gate with an old-fashioned lock a foot square, was the great store for the furnaces. Through this gate poured wisps of smoke and puffs of gas. The college coal was on fire!

The mischief had just become manifest, and every moment was of value to the historic old building and its precious library. No one, so far as known, was at home; and the nearest fire-alarm box was a quarter of a mile distant. A broken iron bar lay near, and, seizing it with a strength altogether beyond his power in less excited moments, the writer succeeded after a time in smashing the ancient and massive lock and bolts. The sound of the tremendous blows brought another late student to the scene just as the gate fell; and, while he ran for a water-bucket, the writer seized a shovel, and, in the midst of a frightful smudge, began dragging and throwing the coal away from the ignited part, near a badly made flue. Then together we two toiled, shovelling and pouring on pailfuls of water, working as only men can work under such circumstances, and in twenty minutes got the fire under control. By that time the danger had somehow become known, and a crowd came flocking into the cellar, with the venerable dean of the faculty at their head. The reader can perhaps imagine how we looked,—pouring with sweat, nearly stifled and blinded by steam and coal-gas, and utterly black with smoke and dust. We had to tell our names in order to be recognized; and next day the writer was informed that he could have his room rent free as long as he required it.

So that last obstacle was disposed of, and studies proceeded without interruption. The other fireman was a brilliant fellow, who has made his mark since in social economy and as a lecturer at the university. Other faces and names come to mind. One was a blind man,—long since dead,—who had the sunniest of natures and liveliest of intellects, curiously, but not bitterly affected by his absence of sight. Another was a deep student, but unworldly, and often a dreadful bore in company; and he and the blind man were ever at wordy war,—lunge and parry of joke and repartee.

Another bore—call him John Doe, as the lawyers do—was a bore for reasons not unconnected with being a congenital fool. He got into the unwelcome habit of coming to our room,—I say ours because it was largely shared with me in waking hours by another student, a cool, learned, aristocratic, but moody young man of the world, who was taking the course just out of curiosity, so to speak. One winter evening Doe came in, and was more than usually exasperating. A revolver happened to be lying upon the table, which Doe made the text of certain facetious observations. Chum was sitting close to the open coal-grate smoking a cob-pipe in silence, and waiting with such patience as he could for the visitor to depart. Hoping to hasten this event, the writer lifted the revolver, and without an instant's hesitation fired a ball into the glowing grate. Chum never stirred except to brush the flying coals off his knees; and Doe darted out of the room, and stayed out thereafter.

That pistol figured in another incident, without any special reason that can be recalled. One Sunday afternoon a student who taught a class in the Sunday-school of Dr. James Freeman Clarke in Boston announced that he could not go, and wondered where he could find a substitute. He was a portly, cherubic, innocent-minded fellow, at whom everybody poked a little good-natured fun; and the writer at once offered himself. To his amazement and amusement the proposition was accepted; and he rushed off, discovering, as he took his seat in the horse-car, that his hip-pocket was loaded down with that pistol,—something altogether unusual. He knew that the church was down in the Back Bay region somewhere, and, going thither, made haste to approach the only man he could see upon the streets to ask more particular direction. This was such a countrified, slouch-hatted, strange-looking old gentleman that no information was expected; but his reply was: "Oh, yes, I can tell you. I am James Freeman Clarke myself."

The class proved to be a group of bright young girls; and it is doubtful whether their lesson was very profitable, for, apart from other considerations, the teacher was incessantly in terror lest that pesky six-shooter might fall out of his pocket,—something likely to make a sensation in a Boston Sunday-school!

And so these recollections might spin on, thread wound with thread. But the men have gone, and the scene has largely changed. The old hall still stands, but the charm of its environment has been vastly diminished. The two great Museums of Zoölogy and Archæology spoil the landscape, and intercept the view with their vast and ugly extensions. Where one could formerly look out upon green commons or a lovely waste of weeds and thickets are now groups of Queen Anne (or, perhaps, Mary Ann) houses, in very unhappy contrast to the dignified old homes of the historian Palfrey, and of Benjamin Peirce and Agassiz and C. P. Cranch, and many another not far away. The dusky and balsamic deeps of Norton's Woods have been cut down and thinned out; and there is no longer an academic, needled-paved path through the pines, where men pace up and down, book in hand. The springy little pond where the boys fished with pin-hooks, and the students at the museum gathered hydroids, and watched the development of frog-life, and chronicled the blooming and seeding of plants and the coming and going of the birds, and studied the ways of the wild mice, and eke a weasel now and then,—this has been filled up; and its green, weed-hidden outlet and the rough, thickety field beyond are all a ball-ground for the theological "nine."

Has the same sort of change gone on inside the venerable old brick walls that we rescued from the flames? Do the young fellows, writing and preaching practice-sermons to the school once a week, still make tangled, flowery essays of them, as pleasing (and as obscure) as Norton's Woods, as broad (and as much other person's property) as the old view out of the west windows,—and as green? Or have they modernized those beautiful essay-sermons into something succinct, practical, and scientific, ringing with the electric gong of to-day, as the campus about the dear old hall has been made useful and prosaic?

THE ARMENIAN PANDEMONIUM.

BY REV. GEORGE W. CUTTER.

Mr. Gladstone's terrible indictment of the Turkish government, summed up "in the four awful words 'plunder,' 'murder,' 'rape,' and 'torture'" inflicted upon the unhappy Armenians, has been established beyond question not only by explicit consular reports and special correspondents of the newspapers, but by the clear and convincing account given in the current number of the Contemporary by Dr. E. J. Dillon, the special commissioner of the London Daily Telegraph to Armenia. Although the Porte has taken the most rigorous means of suppressing the facts and preventing the truth becoming known, there is positive evidence that the worst accounts of the massacre in Sassoun were not exaggerated, and that since then cruelties and atrocities have continued to be perpetrated upon a smaller scale, though not less publicly. Among the great powers, England is morally responsible for the recurrence of these barbarities. By the Anglo-Turkish Convention of 1880 she pledged herself to maintain the integrity of Asiatic Turkey against Russia. She also assumed the right and accepted the duty of seeing that effectual reforms were carried out in behalf of the Christian subjects. To-day she seems unwilling to fulfil her obligations to Armenia, and, rather than suffer the Russians to cross the frontier in aid of that unhappy people, is content merely to express sympathy with the wretched victims, and to trust that the mutual antagonisms of race and religion will gradually subside. As Mr. Gladstone urged, "the powers should not fear the word 'coercion.'" That word alone has any effect upon the Porte, whereas general expression of sympathy, or even monster meetings held in England to protest against the monstrous wrongs, so far from restraining the Turk or pacifying the Kurds, seem rather to intensify their hatred of the Armenians, and incite them to vent their rage upon the Christians in their own peculiar and devilish ways. The Sacred Law of every Mohammedan State precludes all justice being done to a Christian in a lawsuit against a Mussulman. The Christian's oath is worthless: the Christian's evidence is not admissible. To-day the Christian who has suffered in property, limb, or life at the hands of Mohammedans has absolutely no redress. The Kurds, who, with the authority of the Turkish government, have been guilty of robbing wealthy Armenians, raiding their villages, looting their houses, burning their crops, lifting their cattle, and committing rape and murder, cannot be brought to justice. It is illegal for the Armenians even to complain of these doings. To remonstrate against such atrocities, to appeal to the authorities for aid or redress, or to petition the sultan, are acts which incriminate the man already insulted and injured. He himself is accused of sedition or murder, arrested upon trumped up charges, and consigned to miserable prisons, reeking with filth, stench, vermin, and disease, and described by those who have visited them as veritable hells upon earth. The majority who are thus incarcerated, if unable to pay their keepers the extortionate sums that are demanded, languish and perish of hunger, pain, torment, and madness. In many cases rich Armenians have been tortured to confess that they are guilty of crimes falsely charged, or their friends are burned and racked, until in sheer desperation they swear that they have witnessed the deed of which innocent persons stand accused. New and diabolical methods of punishment are there in vogue, unknown to our Western civilization and too shocking and outrageous to be described. Overcome by anguish and despair, after being subjected to the standing-box, red-hot ramrods, and the sheitantly, the wretched Armenians are ready to swear to anything to be relieved from their persecutors. From this horrible situation there is no way of escape: there is no power to intervene. There is no court of appeal, since the constituted authorities themselves, either directly or indirectly, are parties to the villainies.

The reign of terror not only prevails throughout Turkish Armenia, but also extends to native Armenians in Europe and America. Even in a land of civil and religious liberty, they scarcely dare raise their voices against the sultan; for his spies and emissaries are everywhere, and the names of protesting Armenians in London are forwarded to the secret police at Constantinople, and the friends or relatives of these suspected persons abroad are arrested for sedition. Three intelligent Armenians in this country declined to attend a public meeting for fear of jeopardizing their brothers and sisters at home. Even a naturalized American citizen dare not return to his beloved Armenia if it is there known that he has said aught in defence of his unhappy people. He may be the bearer of a passport, and imagine himself safe in the land of the Turks; but, if the slightest suspicion rests upon him, his passport will be taken from him, he will be liable to arrest, and, once imprisoned, may never be heard of again. Since the United States has no naturalization treaty with Turkey, and since it is the declared policy of the Porte to expel all American Armenians from its dominions, they cannot enter the interior without peril to life and property. There is at present no security in Turkey for American missionaries, merchants, travellers, or correspondents.

Will the United States venture to speak or act against this condition of things in the East, which has been fairly described as "organized brigandage, legalized murder, and meritorious immorality"? Are the political interests of England in Egypt and India more potent than the intelligent, civilized, and humane instincts of her people at home? Shall the holders of Eastern securities in London dictate the policy of the new ministry? If England should delay and allow herself to be duped by Turkish promises of reform, it is still less likely that France or Russia will adopt any active measures of intervention. At a banquet given in honor of Hon. James Bryce to consider the case of the Armenians, M. Iskender, a special delegate from Paris, said, "It is almost impossible for us to attempt any real movement in favor of this cause, since it is the distinct policy of the French government to remain friendly with the Turks." Russia has certainly shown herself willing to join England in any reasonable efforts to ameliorate the lot of the Armenians. Already she welcomes these miserable refugees across her border; and, if she at once sent troops into Armenia to put a stop to the horrors and terrors which there prevail, England would not dare oppose her, while the civilized world would approve and applaud her action. As Canon MacColl has truly said, "Russia should have the credit of having done more for the Christian subjects of the Porte than all the other powers of Europe together."

But, whatever protest be made and whatever people espouse the cause of humanity, there is no time for hesitation or delay. The latest advices from Armenia bring the dread tidings that to robbery and murder has succeeded famine, and that those who survived the massacre and the prisons are now being swept away by starvation. A letter from an Armenian gentleman lies before me, which says: "I believe there are no people on the face of the earth so wretchedly situated as the Christians of Armenia. They are not only subjected to the most atrocious cruelties and abuses, but the poverty and hunger of to-day are beyond description; and I sometimes feel discouraged and in despair that God can allow such things to exist among a peace-loving people whose only crime is that they are Christian."

Another Armenian friend writes: "What are civilized Europe and America going to do after reading these terrible revelations? What has become of the sons and daughters of the Revolutionary heroes and the anti-slavery philanthropists?" Let us trust that our people will bravely and generously and promptly do their part.

MISSIONARY WORK.

BY REV. A. G. JENNINGS.

May I say just a word about our missionary work in the Central West? Of course, if we are to survive as a denomination, we must do missionary work. If we are to get money to support our denomination, we must show some results for money already contributed. If we could, with our $50,000 already contributed for missionary work, actually show an increase of, say, ten new, well-organized, well-equipped societies every year,—that is, ten new churches, with church buildings, in ten representative cities (places large enough to support Unitarian churches); if, in the Central West, where last year we spent over $18,000, we could show an actual increase of, say, two or three representative, self-supporting churches,—it would certainly be an incentive to try to raise money for our missionary activities.

But, when we show so few results, is it any wonder that our churches fail to become very enthusiastic over our missionary enterprises? I know it will be said we cannot measure the results of our work. We say it is mostly seed-sowing, and we must wait for the harvest. Heretofore we have congratulated ourselves largely on this phase of our work. "We have distributed so many tracts." "We have printed so many books." "We have had so many services in school-houses and out-of-the-way places." "We have attended so many conferences." "We have written so many letters in our Post-office Missions." "Thus we have been the leaven to quicken and change the whole lump."

All this has been helpful, let us admit. But now comes the question, Is it not time for us to begin to organize churches? It seems to me our great work now is to organize and build. The seed is sown: it has been sown not by Unitarians alone, but by every agency under heaven,—by our newspapers, by every magazine which is published, by every book which is read. Unitarianism is in the very air we breathe. I find almost every intelligent person I meet has outgrown the old Orthodoxy: every church in our land, even our Catholic churches, are honeycombed with liberalism. I met a prominent Catholic only the other day who was having trouble with his priest. He said to me, "I am coming to your church." The seed, I say, is sown. The harvest is ripe. Now, our work is to gather it in. Organize liberal churches. Any liberal organization now, anywhere, will be sure to gather the people. We should go forth, therefore, and plant churches. My way would be to plant them only in important centres at first: here they will soon be self-supporting. Plant a few such churches every year, and we shall soon gain a mastery over the situation; and Unitarianism will thus become the religion of the future. And now one word as to how to do it. The best way would be for the American Unitarian Association to appoint and support for a time ministers-at-large, who should make a specialty of missionary work. These men should go from city to city organizing and establishing Unitarian churches. They should select important centres, not wait to be sent for, but go into new fields and establish churches. The materials for establishing such churches will come from the most unexpected sources and in the most unexpected ways. The people who will support a church will not show themselves at first. But, after they are found, they will not desert the cause.

The great argument in favor of this plan is, it would give us missionary specialists. Missionary work is a distinct profession. We should have trained missionaries. Men should make this their life-work. After a man has established a few churches, he learns how to do it. Every new enterprise then becomes easier than the one which preceded it. A man learns just how much he can rely upon promises. He learns how to meet and overcome discouragements. If it comes to church building, he has had experience, and can recommend plans. In short, he is prepared for emergencies, and cannot fail in his results.

The great objection to this plan will be the expense. $18,000, we say, is already being spent in one of our missionary districts. But would it not be wisdom to devote, say, $2,000 of this to a plan which would certainly yield two well-organized, self-supporting churches each year?—a result which is not accomplished now by the entire expenditure of the $18,000. The time has come when we should do missionary work in a systematic and business-like way. Let the American Unitarian Association send out its reapers, and I know the harvest will justify its pains.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

Everything is very quiet at 25 Beacon Street. Vacation makes the rooms almost lonely. New books are not coming in very freely; but orders by mail for our well-known books continue to come in, showing that somebody is reading, even if it is vacation. Among the books on our shelves that ought to receive attention I have selected the following for notice this week:—

"Messages of Faith, Hope, and Love" contains selections from the writings of James Freeman Clarke, D.D., one for each day in the year. The selections were made by Dr. Clarke's daughter. They are inspiring and helpful. The book is admirably adapted to family use for daily readings. Price 75 cents. "Daily Strength for Daily Needs" is a book of the same character as the one just referred to, for family use. This book bears a high reputation, and is widely used. The selections were made by Mrs. Tileston, the accomplished sister of Rev. Henry W. Foote of blessed memory. Price 75 cents. "Home Prayers," by Dr. Martineau, is a collection of prayer with two services for public worship. Price 75 cents. "Prayers," by Theodore Parker, new edition, with preface by Louisa M. Alcott, is a book of 200 pages. Price 75 cents. "A Historical Sketch of the Unitarian Movement since the Reformation," by Dr. Joseph Henry Allen, is a valuable book, giving a thorough and reliable history that ought to interest every Unitarian. 246 pages. Price $1.13. "A Short History of Unitarianism since the Reformation," by Frederic B. Mott, is a condensed history. 80 pages. Price 50 cents. We also have: "Books of Consolation," by several authors; "Leaves of Healing," by Katherine Paine Sutton, 228 pages, price 75 cents; "Light on the Cloud," by Minot J. Savage, 176 pages, price 94 cents; "Christian Consolation," by A. P. Peabody, D.D., 438 pages, price 75 cents; "Sursum Corda," a compilation of hymns by Mrs. Tileston, 291 pages, price 94 cents.

A number of smaller books that are called for constantly deserve even a wider reading than they now have, for example: "The Year of Miracle," by W. C. Gannett, 106 pages, price 38 cents; "The Faith that makes Faithful," by W. C. Gannett and Jenkin Lloyd Jones, 228 pages, price in paper 25 cents, in cloth 75 cents; "The Thought of God," second series, F. L. Hosmer and W. C. Gannett, 119 pages, paper 38 cents, cloth 75 cents.

AFTER VACATION.

The work for this year begins very soon. The officers have been busy during this month with plans and estimates for the field work this fall and winter. I wish every Unitarian in the United States could see the chance we have to do good "right now," as they say down South. If the Unitarian gospel is a real gospel, and we know it is, we have the chance to spread it now faster than we ever have been able to do it before. A very few years will tell the story whether we are to march into the promised land or whether we shall sit by the roadside and watch the liberal orthodox brethren march past us. We shall be a great deal worse than the one-talent man in the parable if we don't look out; for we are in danger of hiding ten talents in our napkins. It will be no excuse to say that we cannot do the necessary work, nor that we do not know what we are expected to do. Unitarians know what they ought to do; and they know how to do it, and they can do it, and they know that they can do it. The only uncertain element in the case is the will.

The task will be stated before long in dollars and cents. Then we shall see. Meantime, it will be well to brush up the church conscience and get it ready for use.

NOT FOUND.

There seems to be an impression abroad in the land that this Association has a private gold mine somewhere in or near Boston that can be relied on to make up any deficits caused by the torpidity of the corporate consciences of the churches. The new treasurer has been unable to locate any such mine; and he begs to assure the churches that they will need to cure their own ailments by heated applications of consecrated energy, or we shall miss the glorious opportunity that is now in sight.

THE CHURCHES, NOT THE ASSOCIATION.

This Association is simply the organization through which the churches do their work. The work belongs to the churches: this Association simply executes their commands. The extent of its usefulness is governed entirely by the churches. Unitarians contribute liberally to other good causes: it is to be hoped that they will give more attention to the needs of their own work in the immediate future.

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer.

THE EMPRESS OF JAPAN.

"Almost like a song," says Rev. William Elliot Griffis, "has been the life of Haruko, the Empress of Japan. With health, beauty, sweet feminine attractiveness, of immemorial noble lineage, beloved by her lords and people, awarded personal honors by her husband unknown to former empresses, she has lived to see Japan made a new nation, and the sun-banner borne victoriously into mighty China. In the national regeneration and the hearty adoption of Western civilization she has borne a leading part. Her heart has been ever warmly sympathetic with all that means joy or sorrow to her people. Now she feels for the hundreds of her female subjects who, having married Chinese dwelling in Japan, are now rent from husband, and often from children, especially sons, and whose whole domestic life is wrecked by the war. The storm came to most of the people in China, Corea, and Japan as a fire-bolt out of a clear sky. The empress's sympathy, too, is with her gallant lads, who beyond seas uphold the nation's honor under the rising-sun flag. Already her warm heart is felt like a nation's pulse. At this moment, because of her encouragement, the Japanese camps in Manchuria are well supplied with both comforts and dainties above and beyond the regulations and the rations. Her gracious influence soothes many an hour of pain and anguish, when brave lads lie wounded in the hospital, or when households at home mourn because the bamboo streamers flutter in the wind over new-made graves in a foreign soil."

QUEER MONEY.

Here is an amusing account of a traveller who went many years ago to Mexico, and found the natives using a strange kind of currency. Says he:—

"In one of the small towns I bought some limes, and gave the girl one dollar in payment. By way of change, she returned me forty-nine pieces of soap the size of a small biscuit. I looked at her in astonishment, and she returned my look with equal surprise, when a police officer, who had witnessed the incident, hastened to inform me that for small sums soap was legal tender in many portions of the country.

"I examined my change, and found that each cake was stamped with the name of a town and of a manufacture authorized by the government. The cakes of soap were worth three farthings each. Afterwards, in my travel, I frequently received similar change. Many of the cakes showed signs of having been in the wash-tub; but that I discovered was not at all uncommon. Provided the stamp was not obliterated, the soap did not lose any value as currency. Occasionally a man would borrow a cake of a friend, wash his hands, and return it with thanks. I made use of my pieces more than once in my bath, and subsequently spent them."—Harper's Round Table.

ANTS AT PLAY.

The old story of ants indulging in games and play was for a long time thought to be a fable, but grave scientific gentlemen of our day have seen it; and we shall have to believe it now, queer as it seems. The old story was told by Huber, who "saw these ants on a fine day assembled on the surface of their nest, and behaving in a way that he could only explain as simulating festival sports or other games. They raised themselves on their hind legs, embraced each other with their fore legs, seized each other by the antennæ, feet, or mandibles, and wrestled, but all in friendliest fashion. They then let go, ran after each other, and played hide-and-seek. When one was victorious, it seized all the others in the ring and tumbled them over like ninepins."

So much for the old writer: now says the new: "The players caught each other by the feet or jaws, rolled over each other on the ground like boys playing, pulled each other inside the entrance of their nest, only to come out again, and so on. All this was done without bad temper or any spurting of poison, and it was clear that all the rivalry was friendly."—Olive Thorne Miller.

PET PIGEONS.

Among the many interesting sights of London may now be numbered "the pet pigeons of St. Paul's Cathedral." The pigeons of Cairo, St. Mark's, Venice, and Rochester Castle are matters of history; and ere-long the pigeons of St. Paul's will find a place among the sights of the world. In the trim and well-ordered gardens that surround the great sanctuary, these pigeons find a home; and beside the noble fountain, and in the branches in the rich foliage of the trees, they afford an interesting picture of rural bird life in one of the busiest highways of London city. It is a charming sight, during this fine hot summer, to witness the docility of these interesting birds in their intercourse with many admiring and sympathetic friends. Groups of people, young and old, may be seen daily feeding these proud and pretty birds.—The Churchman.

Spirit of the Press.

The Jewish Messenger shows the part that Jewish women have taken in practical charity:—

We are grateful for the kindly words of our Unitarian contemporary, the Christian Register, in reference to the National Council of Jewish Women and their field of activity; but it may be interesting for it to learn that, while it is true that the Jewess has had no voice in the organization of the synagogue, she has not waited for 1895 to plan and form charitable and educational societies. She was always a pioneer in such movements. An American Jewess, Miss Rebecca Gratz, founded the first Sabbath-school a century ago. Ladies' benevolent societies were attached to synagogues at an early date. If at formal worship the sexes were separated in Oriental vogue, the Jewess was always foremost in practical charity; and some of our best-known institutions are indebted to her for their success. The new movement, however, is noteworthy, not as indicating that the Jewess of to-day is more zealous than her mother or grandmother, but because its aim is national, banding together existing agencies, and promoting new organizations along special lines. There is no conflict in this field between the traditionalist and the anti-traditionalist. All are inspired by the same spirit of devotion to Judaism and humanity.

The London Inquirer, in a leader on "A Right Method and a Wrong One," refers to the proceedings of the late Christian Endeavor Convention. He hits the nail on the head when he emphasizes the need of taking a positive attitude and of working on the lines of construction:—

The society has gained ground simply because its work was needed, and because it entered upon the needed work in an earnest and practical spirit. What would have happened, had it taken a merely negative attitude? It might easily have done so. It might have pointed to the fact that at present the children and young people generally are not trained as they should be, either in the knowledge of Christian doctrine or the practice of Christian virtue. It might have pointed to the thousands of cases where young people who have passed through the Sunday-schools of their particular church have passed through them never to return, either as teachers or workers in any kind or degree; that the Sunday-school has too often been the preliminary of a life unblest with the comforts of a religious faith, and undistinguished by any of the graces and virtues, the seeds of which it was the especial work of the Sunday-school to implant. Hence it might have conceived that its first duty was to smash the Sunday-schools, if not the evangelical churches. Had it been as audacious as a certain political organization of our own day, it might have assayed to save young people's souls by destroying the churches and burning the New Testaments. But it had the sense to know that it must work with such instruments as Heaven had given to it; that it must take the world as it is, and make use of the organizations that have been a blessing in times past, to assist it in its efforts to ameliorate the present. Hence it aimed not to destroy, but to build, not to supersede the churches, but to make use of them and to live in them. And, as far as appears, no Church regards it as an enemy. None finds any cause for jealousy. In regard to the Salvation Army, which at first claimed to work with the churches, and not in rivalry with them, it was soon evident that a new and most formidable sect had arisen, and one not particularly scrupulous in respecting the rights of its neighbors. The evangelical churches are therefore obliged to watch its doings somewhat narrowly, even while approving its aims, if not imitating its methods. No such fear seems to have arisen with regard to the younger movement of Christian Endeavor; and it may be hoped that occasion for any such anxiety may not be given. One of the speakers at the convention said that he had learned long ago that the secret of working with others was to care only for the good of the cause, and to put away all care for recognition and the honor of leadership. It is a lesson which the leaders of other organizations would be the better for learning. These people will do more good than they know or intend. For one thing they will find out for themselves which are the helpful and practical parts of Christianity and which are mere impedimenta. Moreover, while working within certain prescribed limits,—for in America, at least, the movement seems entirely orthodox,—they will furnish valuable hints to those who might not be able to join them in their special work.

Spiritual Life.

This is the permanent and essential condition of the moral life, that each must make decisions for himself.—Philip Stafford Moxom.

Somehow, if you have patience imbedded in your heart, there comes a sort of cheer along with it; and, before you know what is going to happen, your whole experience is irradiated as with sunshine. I think the patient life is the successful one, after all.—Rev. Louise S. Baker.

To apologize for ill-doing or harsh speech is not ignoble. It is the offended isolation, it is the selfish sulkiness, which is unworthy of man or woman. The apology may be difficult at first, but difficulties of this kind we are bound to overcome if we seek to rise with Christ.—S. A. Brooke.

It is sweet to know in time of sorrow that God's love changes not. It is the same in the brightness and when the brightness changes into gloom. It is the same in joy and when the joy turns to grief. It is the same when blessings are given and when they are recalled.—Sacred Heart Review.

He who has many treasures has many duties, and he who has many duties has many treasures; and, if our duties drive us and are more than we can do, it is that our hands are over full of treasures, and we must let some slip. So we are blessed even in the work exacted of us.—Letters from an Unknown Friend.

Go on in all simplicity. Do not be so anxious to win a quiet mind, and it will be all the quieter. Do not examine so closely into the progress of your own soul. Do not crave so much to be perfect, but let your spiritual life be formed by your duties and by the actions which are called forth by circumstances.—Francis de Sales.

The crown of saintliness was never won by those who bid for it with some great display of their own importance or goodness or some loud profession of their own service; but it came all unlooked for to some humble soul that was, perhaps, still wrestling with its own shortcomings, toiling on while it deplored its weaknesses and sins.—John Learned.

There is so much to be set right in the world, there are so many to be led and helped and comforted, that we must continually come in contact with such in our daily life. Let us only take care that, by the glance being turned inward or strained onward or lost in vacant reverie, we do not miss our turn of service, and pass by those to whom we might have been sent on an errand straight from God.—Elizabeth Charles.

Through love to light! O wonderful the way
That leads from darkness to the perfect day!
From darkness and from sorrow of the night
To morning that comes surging o'er the sea.
Through love to light! Through light, O God, to thee,
Who art the love of love, the eternal light of light.
—R. W. Gilder.

The Sunday School.

Last year's course, "Scenes in the Life of Jesus," is now ready in manual form. Each one (Intermediate and Advanced) sells for 20 cents a single copy or $1.80 a dozen.

The first three lessons in the current one-topic graded course on "Teaching of Jesus" will be ready for distribution September 1. They are intended to cover the dates of the last three Sundays in September (the 15th, 22d, and the 29th.) These are issued in three grades, as heretofore; and the illustrated "Primary" will be sent out to the schools in the parcels with the Intermediate and Advanced. The three subjects are "The Kingdom of Heaven," "The Pearl of Great Price," and "The House on the Rock." The Advanced are written by Rev. Thomas R. Slicer, the Intermediate by Rev. Edward A. Horton, and the Primary by Mrs. J. C. Jaynes. Price 50 cents a hundred leaflets. The Intermediate and Advanced are printed together in a four-page leaflet. The Primary is a four-page leaflet, with half-tone picture.

The Pilgrim Teacher for September contains the following sensible comments: "It is a bad thing for a teacher to have fits,—fits of punctuality, fits of absence, fits of study, fits of visiting, etc. If he has them, the scholars will be sure to have fits, also,—principally, fits of staying away. The only fitting thing a fitful teacher can do is to resign." "Do not allow the scholars to go out after the close of the Sunday-school in a boisterous, helter-skelter way. They should not act like sheep just let out of pen. Keep the school well in hand to the very last. Dismiss deliberately, class by class, if necessary, or, at least, section by section. Allow no pushing and jostling. Insist upon decorum in God's house. All the good impressions of the most earnest teaching may be dissipated by the irreverent rush which, on adjournment, is to be seen in many schools."

Religious Intelligence.

(Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.)

REV. RUSH R. SHIPPEN will preach next Sunday in the First Parish Church, Dorchester, and not E. R. Shippen, as a published notice says.

BOSTON COMMON.—The usual large attendance was on hand last Sunday at the big tree, to listen to Rev. James De Normandie and Dr. George L. Perin (Universalist). Both speakers talked effectively on matters which are in the mind of the public. A gentleman who has watched these meetings quite closely believes so thoroughly in the good they are doing that he has sent in a cheque for $100 toward defraying the expenses. Such a token as this is a substantial recognition of the excellent work which this summer movement represents. The Benevolent Fraternity of Churches, which has this open-air preaching in hand, considers this, of course, only one part of its many enterprises, all of which seek to reach the people at large in various ways. The financial part of such extended operations is very great, entailing large expense. It is to be hoped that the public, seeing such good efforts being put forth in all directions, will respond by supporting the treasury of the fraternity. The various churches of this organization have been kept open during the summer, and all demands upon the ministers have been promptly met. The service on the Common occurs again next Sunday at 5 P.M., near the band stand.

ATHOL, MASS.—Second Church: The Athol "Country Week," a branch of the Boston Young Men's Christian Union "Country Week," is one of the most deserving institutions of our town. It is now in its third season, and we take pride in the fact that it was started by our Guild of the Good Shepherd in the summer of 1893. The first season the guild gave fourteen children from Boston an outing of four weeks. Last year the Guild of the Good Shepherd enlisted the active sympathy not only of our church and Sunday-school, but also of others, and so was enabled to make fifty-eight little children happy by a visit in the country. This year so many in the town have taken a hearty interest in this good work that it was thought best by the committee (Miss Grace Pitts and Mrs. E. V. Wilson, both earnest workers in the Second Church) to fix upon a name that would indicate this general interest, and so called it "The Athol Country Week." This season one hundred and twenty-eight children were given an outing. The Athol Transcript, the best of our weekly papers, devotes a column every week to Second Unitarian Church news. Besides a picture of the church and the time of services, it gives items of local and general denominational interest, and welcomes to its fellowship, irrespective of creed, color, or nationality, all who, "in the love of the truth and the spirit of Jesus Christ, wish to unite for the worship of God and the service of man." This department is conducted by our pastor.

BATH, N.H.—The ladies of the Lend a Hand Club of All Souls' Church held their annual fair on August 22. The sale was quite a success, and netted them $175. They desire to return most heartfelt thanks to those who sent them donations of fancy articles and money. Rev. Samuel B. Craft of Boston sent his check for $50, Miss Downing of Concord sent $5, Rev. E. J. Wright of Montpelier $1; and fancy articles were received from A. Plainfield, N.J., from Springfield, Cambridge, Salem, Harrison Square, Dorchester, Fall River, New Bedford, Mass., Franklin Falls, and Nashua, N.H., and Augusta and Bangor, Me.

CHELSEA, MASS.—On September 1, after a vacation of two months, services at the First Unitarian Church will be resumed under charge of Rev. A. P. Reccord, a graduate of the Harvard Divinity School of Cambridge, who has received and accepted a call as pastor to this church. Sunday-school, under the superintendence of Miss Margaret B. Barnard, will also convene for its first session on this date. Five lectures are announced for Monday evenings at the church in October and November, under the auspices of the Chelsea Branch of the Women's National Alliance, to be delivered on October 14 by Rev. M. J. Savage, October 28 by Rev. Thomas Van Ness, November 4 by Miss Margaret B. Barnard, November 11 by Rev. S. M. Crothers, and November 18 by Rev. Charles G. Ames.

ROSLINDALE, MASS.—The ordination and installation of Richard W. Boynton, a graduate of Meadville, Pa., as pastor of the Roslindale Unitarian Church, will take place on Wednesday evening, September 4, at 7.45 o'clock. Mrs. Boynton, who is also a graduate of Meadville, will be ordained to the work of the ministry at the same service.

Business Notices.

From London.—Every woman who is anxious to improve the appearance of her parlor should take the trouble to see one of the new London divans which have come suddenly into fashion this season. They are going to be very much in evidence in the next few years in polite society. Perhaps the best place in Boston to see such a divan is at the Paine furniture warehouses on Canal Street. They are not at all expensive.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder
Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

In Boston, 24th inst., by Rev. Geo. A. Thayer, E. Florence Hathaway, of Assonet, and Joshua F. Crowell, of West Yarmouth.

Deaths.

In Plainfield, N.J., 22d inst., Rose, the only daughter of Edgar Huidekoper and Rose Skeel Mumford and grand-daughter of Thomas James Mumford, late editor of this paper, aged 1 yr. 2 mos. and 10 days.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

A LADY with a pleasant home near Boston, and having the care of a young girl of thirteen, desires to communicate with parents or guardians who may be seeking a temporary or permanent home for one or more children. References exchanged. Address GUARDIAN, care Christian Register.

MRS. H. M. BROWN, 49 Oxford Street, Cambridge, wishes to take charge of two or three little girls. Instruction at home or at school. References: Rev. C. R. Eliot, Boston; Prof. C. J. Child, Cambridge; Mrs. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, Jamaica Plain.

TO LET. The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury, 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. Two furnished cottages, West Falmouth. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

HYMN.

BY REV. AUGUSTUS M. LORD.

[Sung at the 250th Anniversary of the Roxbury Latin School.]

Our fathers sought to serve thee, Lord,
Not in rich temples built with hands:
In living deeds they kept thy word,
And counted justice more than lands.

Their first gift to the coming days
Was given toward firmer thought and will,—
The gift of wisdom's ampler ways
That broaden round their children still.

The comradeships, the memories,
That make this spot a holy place,
We owe to them, the bravely wise,
The patriot scholars of our race.

We pledge our manhood as our youth
To use that glorious gift aright,
To seek one freedom, that of truth,
One fellowship, that of the light!

The Pulpit.

LESSONS FROM MY HEARTH.

BY REV. JOHN M. SCOTT.

"While I was musing, the fire burned."—Ps. xxxix. 3.

Nothing is so pleasant as fire upon the open hearth. The winter winds, making their weird music in the gable and among the trees,—not just a frozen music, as the fable tells that the bugle held for so long before it awoke its echo on the winds, but yet a freezing music if one were to stand in the midst of its breath blowing these pipes to its wild, fierce will,—this wintry music without but adds to the joy and the beauty of the hearth flames. It is not merely the physical comforts, the glow of the warmth on the body, the dance of the flame in the eye, but the responsive kindling of emotion and thought, the world-dreaming, the wondering about all the meanings of nature and of ourselves, the dear, delightful threnody and glee of many musings,—even upon the vanity of life and its worth, of God and my escape into him for some forgiveness and new creation, as the Psalmist far away through the centuries did when he said, "While I was musing, the fire burned." He meant the fire of "that light that never was on sea or land,"—the hot heart within him that broke into flame, as the brushwood of troubled thinking and experience drove him into thoughts of God and the speaking out of his thought in prayer and praise. I mean the outer fire made out of the troubling of timbers by which my house was built. "While I was musing, the fire burned"; and yet the fire without had answer from the fire within,—the psalmist and I much at one in heart, though separated by the shadow of the centuries, only I think my inward hearth burns brighter and purer flames than his, because I am farther in the noonday of the world's life, and have upon me the sun of the humanizing Christian centuries and that splendid and appalling outlook upon the making of a man which is the nineteenth century's chief contribution to world-life and world-thought.

Perhaps I had better at this point share with you that lesson of my hearth-fires, which thinks about the outward fire and the inward fire,—the fire on the hearth and the fire in the heart. There is an outward and an inward fire of life. Creation lies without us, burning its countless flames of life, that thereby we may be warmed and blessed. Creation lies within us, and burns its fire of life there, breaking into many flames of emotion and thought, of aspiration and duty and willing to do. In the blending of the fires without and the fires within us is the making of the man. The fire without, that gently flames into the grains and fruits, becomes the fire within, through the sacrament of our daily bread,—the fire within us whereby our loves and thoughts and selves are warmed into the life we are living. The lily burning a white or a scarlet flame in the fields awakens within us its answering flame, even the passion and joy of beauty. The oriole, burning its flame of gold among the trees, which flame breaks out into a music which the crackling of the fire upon the hearth can never hope to tune with, awakens within us its answering flame of a gladness that sings out, making our natures musical. The sunset fires on the hills awaken within us their answering conflagration of our life's clouds until they glow with a divineness revealing the beauty of God. The horse, burning the homely fires of its every-day faithfulness to man, awakens within us its answering flame of life needing to live out its greatness by the patient toiling that does the humbler, necessary tasks. The fires of everything without, as each is true to its nature, fulfilling the old Genesis fact that each thing brings forth after its kind, awaken within us their answering fires, by which we have our moral and intellectual natures, knowing that in emotion and thought and character there is no confusion of grape bringing forth thistle, or thistle bringing forth grape. Even the granite burns within us an idea of patient endurance and steadfastness, of life hardened and fixed in character. We are told, indeed, that everything without was once molten, a mass of fire, cooling and definitizing itself into all these wonders of creation which we see without us, from the hard granite to the baby's soft cheek and the tenderness of love that throbs in a mother's heart. So these molten emotions within us, these flames of thought and being, are that we may cool and definitize them into a world of order and beauty, into a character that shall be like an earth with strength and tenderness, and multiplying an endless creation of truth and love.

The flame on the hearth passes away, dies out into ashes, and so the life flames of these things in the creation; but the answering fires that they awaken within us, as diversified and complex character, burn on as long as we shall be ourselves. The lily that Jesus saw burned into ashes centuries ago; but the thought of God's care for us which it awoke in Jesus burns on in his gospel, blessing still his countless disciples. The seed that he saw scattered by the hand of the sower, and growing into its harvests, burned soon to its ashes; but the answering fire which it awoke in Jesus, teaching him how truth and a man grows, burns on in his gospel, making wise his countless disciples. Life, therefore, does not so much consist in things which must perish in the using, but in thoughts which those things bring to us, the character they bring as we use them meanly or nobly, getting out of them an immortality measured by that use. Life consists not in the abundance of things we have, but in the bountifulness of what we are of truth and goodness; and that greatness we call Christian. In the pathos of the earlier and later psalmists, threnodying about the vanity of life and the passing away of everything into silence and pathetic dust, life does not ring true. It is made out of the base metal which judges of the appearance only, and therefore cannot judge righteous judgment, or which has not thought large enough and thorough enough to beat out the gold of thought with which to stamp in the image and likeness of speech. There is this outward passing and perishing, and it is pathetic as the mournful wind passing through the withered reed; but, if we see that what passes away outwardly has had a soul, that which has been saved in the heavens of our character abiding within us and doing a deathless work of helping God to fashion us, then we have the reedful music, as when the shepherd has fashioned it into a pipe, and blows through it the sweet, true music of his pastoral love for sheep, for maiden, wife, and home, into a greatness of peace enchanting the soul. What life I have experienced in the world, the passing world of show and change, is immortal in me as character; and often it is that these inward graces of things are finer and diviner in man than they were in any realization in the world without.

"As the fire burned, I mused"; and this was my musing,—that what outwardly perishes is inwardly renewed and abides within man as his character, his nature; that the end of the world without man is that it may be creative of a world within man, perishing things becoming imperishable thoughts, passing events becoming abiding character.

"Least village boasts its blacksmith,
Whose anvil's even din
Stands symbol for the finer forge
That, soundless, tugs within,

"Refining these impatient ores
With hammer and with blaze,
Until the designated light
Repudiates the forge."

With a single stick of wood you cannot make a blaze. When the smaller sticks are ablaze, the big one burns with them; but, when they are in ashes, the big one smoulders and dies out of its fire, not able alone to keep you or itself from freezing. And so, as my fire burned, I mused, thinking so it is with the fires of life. Everything in nature must touch up against other things, mingling their natures and services together, in order that each and all may be enriched into fuller life.

A tree, attempting to fulfil itself in one only blossom, would issue in failure, no fruit, no endless generation of other trees. Indeed, it would not grow and enlarge and make the finest use of sun and soil and air, distilling them through the graces of itself into the satisfying glories of its life. Unless the fires of its growth were kindled by the countless blossoms it sends forth to greet the burning heart of the summer, it could not be, it could not become, a full glory of itself. For a fire on your hearth you may blend many things together,—coal and wood and paper, and anything that can break forth into a flame. Let us think that so the blossoms come to burn their beauty in the summer air. Soil and sunshine and rain blend themselves together and burn up into the living tree and its fruit. Soil cannot burn into a single blossom without these others. Rain, without the soil and the sun, cannot green into a single leaf. Sun, without what the soil and the rain give, cannot put forth one of the green and growing wonders of the orchards. But all together, meeting and mingling themselves into a flame, they can warm the winds of the summer into the red apple or the peach of gold. This is true of every living thing. Many things have come together, and, mingling themselves into the fires of life, have become what walks the earth, swims the sea, or flies the air. Then, by setting the solitary in families, the Master of life has made some of his finest handiwork, whether going by feet or fins or wings. By socialism on the soil there is produced the finest animals, themselves so the best protected, the best helped to live out their natures unto a greatest fullness. By socialism in the sea the best fishes come to be, so best protected and enabled to live out themselves unto a greater fullness of their natures. By socialism in the air the birds become of a worth and fineness they could not in solitariness attain unto, so protected, so helped to live out their natures into a greater fullness. And, when we come to man, we see him, as is the custom of anthropologists to tell us, emerging from savagery accompanied by his faithful dog and cow, coming up, indeed, in groups of his kind into that fullness of social life we call our civilization. Take out of these fires of our lives what has come into them from the flames of other lives, and we would become but charred and flameless sticks. "Other men have labored, and we are entered into their labors." Other men have lived, and we have entered into their lives. Other men are living, and we are entering into their lives: rather, their lives are entering into us, and making our lives richer and fuller of human worth. That others are living over again in us, though unconscious of having entered into us, a grace of life, a gain of character, is the truth of ourselves,—a fact from which is no escape.

"None can avoid this purple,
None evade this crown."

And this is the obligation of altruism. Even as our hearts are hallowed by the countless services of those who have experienced death, and who are yet in this present joy of life with us, so we find duty freighted holiest when it asks of us the service of others, the making of the earth a sweeter place for these who are coming after, to enter into our labors, to enter into our lives and live them on in the new days and the new experiences. Not obligation, but highest joy, this living out the common destiny of all in blending ourselves together to make a flame of fuller life for others about us and these to come after us.

Life is motion. It is diligence of journey and doing. It is not repression, but expression. Every living particle of our bodies is in rapid motion, as ceaseless as the tides of the sea; and this is life. We are breaking into flame more subtle and volatile than the swift, running fires of a conflagration; and this is life. Emotion moves on in its cycles, as the earth through its seasons; and, although there is no rattle of chariot wheels on the road, no puff and noise of an engine on the track, yet it is just by moving without pause that we love, and that is life. Thought is always busy, the brain never stilled, pausing no more than the streams always seeking their level; and this is life. The whole nature of man is in ceaseless activity and growth, and that is life. Fossilize any part of these volatile activities, and death reigns. We must be ceaselessly active, ceaselessly expressing ourselves, in order to live. Everything alive just so inherits and reigns in the kingdom of its life. And it is expression in and toward and for others. Anything that lives in and toward and for itself soon ceases to live. What begins in and ends upon ourselves makes for that freezing of the heart which we have in trembling named death. It is by unfolding itself into the air that the tree lives. Expressing itself in the leaves, giving itself forth in them, it lives and grows. It gives that it may receive, and so we all. The givers are the receivers. Life grows large in unselfishness. We can break into a fuller flame of joy by putting ourselves with others into the diligent service of all whom we may in any way enrich. Everything grows together by ministering unto each other. There is no joy like the altruistic joy. It has no regrets, no inward, troubling compunctions, no empty horrors like those into which we sink when at the unsatisfying service of ourselves. And this joy is just as the bird's joy comes. Not by keeping within itself, and seeking to make a song that no one else can hear, is the bobolink's glory of gladness sung, but just by flying itself out in gift to the winds do the winds give themselves up to its pipe, that so its inmost soul may sing to the nesting mate in the June meadows. So, as we give ourselves up to the service of others, these others become in us the medium for our highest and sweetest self-expression. And, as old violins mellow into deeper and tenderer richness of tone in every bow that lengthens in fond dalliance across their throbbing bosom, so does every expression of ourselves in the service of others deepen and sweeten our capacity for joy, our capacity for the fuller life of which the selfish are so scant. Colors come in companies. Burning together, they come in the white sunbeam to be life and glory for the garden and the field; and they are never apart in any divorcement whatever. They come united to the rose, and make it live and show its inmost soul in its glowing blossom; and that we see red is just that these sunbeams, in their dear socialism of making flowers, repress themselves into the red, that it may have the honor of being the rose's glory. When in primrose, this dear socialism represses, that so the yellow may be the glory there. When in the violet, this dear socialism represses, that so the blue may be the glory there. Yet, always together, each helping the other to the fullness of manifesting itself, and so in turn helped to the manifestation of its glory,—all of them together in the heart of every flower, as upon every cloud in their dear, visible fellowship of the rainbow. One color could do nothing. Unless it dies, it abideth alone, doing

The Duchesse Glove

Thousands of ladies to-day wear only the DUCHESSE GLOVE, and no glove is so well adapted for general use by our best New England family trade.

PRICE LIST.

Four Large Buttons, Dressed Kid, Colors.....	$1.50
Four Large Buttons, Dressed Kid, Black.....	1.50
Five Medium Buttons, Dressed Kid, Colors.....	1.75
Five Medium Buttons, Dressed Kid, Black.....	1.75
Four Large Buttons, Undressed Kid, Colors and Black.....	1.65
Four Medium Buttons, Undressed Kid, Colors and Black.....	1.50
Seven Hook, Dressed Kid, Colors and Black...	1.75
Seven Hook, Undressed Kid, Colors and Black	1.75
Mousquetaire, Undressed Kid, Colors and Black.....	2.00
Mousquetaire, Dressed Kid, Colors and Black	2.25
16-Button, Undressed Mousquetaire.....	3.00
20-Button, Undressed Mousquetaire.....	3.50
24-Button, Undressed Mousquetaire.....	4.00
Men's Two Button.....	1.50
Men's Two Clasp.....	1.50
Men's Two Clasp Prex Seam Kangaroo.....	1.75
Men's Two Clasp Plain Black.....	1.75

The DUCHESSE GLOVE always represents the latest fashion—always fits perfectly—always wears well.

OUR GUARANTEE GOES WITH EVERY PAIR.

CHANDLER & CO..
Winter St., Boston.

no tasks of making the flowers that can show its hidden splendors forth; but, dying into this fellowship of color warming to color, then it brings forth fruit, can journey the leagues of air, and come to the earth and live over again in all the flowers that dream it in their heart of green, to awaken it in their blossoms blessing the summer winds.

“And, even when it dies, to pass
In odors so divine
As lowly spices gone to sleep,
Or amulets of pine.”

“As the fire burned, I mused” that life is not a solitude, but a companionship, not a selfishness, but a service; that our flame of life can burn in purest, strongest fervor when it mingles with others, and these allow themselves to be consumed to make warmth and brightness in the world.

My fire was made of fragments left over after building my house. I was Scriptural in that I gathered up the fragments that nothing be lost, even as I believe the good God is always doing in all the wonder ways of his making worlds and men. And these fragments it was that made the fire on my hearth. And I mused this lesson that nothing be lost,—not as a duty-determination of my life, but as a duty-determination of God’s life. When he determined upon creating, then he saw the loss, the fragments, that must fall apart from the glory into which their fellows have gone; and he determined that nothing should be lost, that they should somewhere and somehow come to their glory, also, and cherishing every fragment of himself that is his creation that so it may serve some of his lovely thoughts ever creeping up into their blossom. Nothing is lost, they tell us,—not the matter that to our vision dissipates and passes away, not the force that to our searching of it out passes away, and not life which vanishes before our eager eyes, and not personality which dissipates in what we call death, and yet up into which all creation aspires and climbs. We have seen how that, with the outward passing of things, not their fragments, but their very souls, their inmost meanings may be gathered up into us, immortal with our immortality. But in other ways some dear orderliness of our Father’s perfect thought haunts with an everlasting glory all the wastes and destructions of his creation. If this cannot go up with its fellows into that immediate honor, then it may burn up in this glory: it may pass away to appear in lovelier forms, in sweeter life, in greater glory.

“As the fire burned, I mused,” that in making there is always this selection,—some vessels, as the old Scripture has it, chosen unto honor, and some unto dishonor, some bits of maple cut away as worthless that the glory of the violin may appear; but this musing made no hopeless hells of despair in my thought, no shadows of eternal death on my hope, for I am certain that God said to himself, in that deep and holy self-communion wherein he determined to make us and such a world as ours, “Gather up the fragments, that nothing be lost,” even as sometimes we have charged ourselves unto kindness and justice in some great, severe task unto which we set ourselves. And I am sure that God is true to that obligation, that he is gathering up the fragments that nothing be lost. We are seeing that he is. Our vision will grow clearer; and we shall see that this great loss of death we shrink and fear is but a gain, not even a gathering up of the fragments that nothing be lost, but a moving-on in the centre of the purpose of the creative Love. And we will find that, just as the night veils the face of the day, through which by and by that face breaks smiling, so life shall show a dawn of everlasting glory through the lifting veils of our deaths,—every loss issuing into a gain, every death dawning into a life, every going down unto some going up, as so the seeds descend that the harvest may ascend. What I have lost from one joy shall burn up in another, even as what has not entered into my house goes up to again find the sunshine, and down to again find the soil unto life, as it burns its brief glory upon my hearth. So mused I “as my fire burned.”

Can I make plain this next musing, which was really the first one that came into some philosophizing of life? The wood there going up in flame was a fact,—a fact not simply in my house, but in the universe, not simply in my life, but in God’s life. It was one point of glory in the history of the wood, in the history of the world. But what a patient working and waiting in the life of God that this glory so brief might appear on my hearth! If what is came out of what was, then the ages conspired and toiled unto the making of that wood, unto the bringing of it and my life together in the brief, bright blaze. Together we blossomed out in our little joy, and then separated to go on into our destinies, which may or may never meet again. Why should it regret the little companionship with me, though it can never be again? Why should I regret its dear flame, though it can never again burn in my happy eyes? We have met and companioned and parted. Let the memory of it be with me, not saddened with any regrets, but just at joy’s full, because it has been so a happy part of my life. Indeed, we could not be at that dear fellowship in its flame but for the fact that we are passing always, and change is an essential part of our natures. Every bit of the wood has been on a pilgrimage from the time it left the heart of God to become a part of his creation. And what a journey if we could have it told us,—a romance our novelists have not yet dreamed, our scientists but dimly guessing, as riding in the chariot of the sunbeams, sailing from the clouds in the crystal shallops of the rain-drops, a mermaid of merriness laughing in the waves of the summer sea; a death in the soil, the darkness of graves experienced; then resurrection, as it became a part of the chestnut-tree, slowly and patiently travelling toward the sun, visited by birds, currents of life flowing in it and building its nature; tragedy again, the axe destroying, saws and planes cutting, sundering the dear companionships that grew up together in the tree,—the part entering into my house to abide the years, the other part coming on my hearth to go up in the flame for my gladness, journeying a very essential part of its becoming anything, and hurrying feet of hail and farewell making the music that sung in the tongues of flame, the brightness of the fire? Could it have paused on my hearth, it could not have been fire. The hurry of its hail and farewell was what made it fire. Down into ashes, some of it, to again some time climb into grasses and trees, to liquefy into dew and be kissed into glory by the beams of the sun, others of it lifting straight toward the sun in the chariot of fire, as of old they say Elijah went. And my journey how great unto the brief trysting-place where this wood and I held pleasant comradeship, and were like ships in the night speaking each other in passing! From God’s heart to my hearthstone what a journey! Could its story be written, God’s secrets were said, and day would dawn out of our troubling ignorance. But who can know? Who say what of these journeys in which my consciousness took its part? What we know is that it was journey, and must be, with many a happy hail and sorrowing farewell eyes, in as brief glory of love as that with which I and the flame on my hearth met, and then hurrying each our own ways, what we call death taking some of the beauty, that blessedness after which I so sorely hunger. Yet why regret the passing away, the change by which we must be and continue? It was a happy, holy hour. To shadow it by my regrets and tears is not to do it the truest honor. I will rather be glad that it was, that it is, in my memory, a thing of beauty and a joy forever, and honor it by giving myself up to the joy of the present, burning my dear life’s flame at the best for the happiness of who now is sharing it. Just now it is sacred time of fellowship. Let us be at our best, that God in this moment he patiently planned may be at his best. And that we change and pass we will not be sorrowful; for it is this that makes the joy of the moment, makes us partaker of the glory of the life that is, and is because of its great and generous journeys. To pause just now, the rose would petrify into marble, and were not itself, no more than the effigies of our dead are themselves. Indeed, that pause of the rose were death. Because it hurries, it is its dear charm. We do pause in the photograph, but it has unreplying lips. The flame, if it could have paused on my hearth, would have become a thing of death, a painted show, no reality of its blessed self there at all, just the pathos of what we call death. So, if, when dear eyes looked love into mine, in the dawn when dreams were true and life was holy time, no change in us at all, no passing and journeying on at our growth,— why, it would just have been death, and not even the love’s sweet memory, as on old tombs they carve some Romeo and Juliet in each other’s arms, lip, perhaps, to lip, and eye glazing at eye,—ah! such were not love, it were not life. Better the dear, passionate kiss, and then the sword of a Capulet or a Montague, than to have life that knows no shaping of passionate, pure lips. Better the rapture of Friar Laurence’s cell, and then the dagger, than never to have answered pure love with pure love.

“ ’Tis better to have loved and lost
Than never to have loved at all.”

In order to love, we must lose, as the most constant tune which swelled and filled the winds with sweetness was at the very moment of its fulfilling passing away: one note fulfilled itself and died, that another might take its place and the tune continue to the end.

“Change and decay on all around I see.
O Thou who changeth not, abide with me!”

The One who changeth not cannot abide but for this change and decay which the poet lamented. How could the changeless love by which nature continues to be abide an endless glory of all the summers unless it were true that “Leaf by leaf the roses fall,

Drop by drop the spring runs dry,
One by one beyond recall
Summer flowers droop and die?”

Just that in the change and passing of all he is able to tarry and make the new summers glorious with his presence. What is it I see in the beauty of the rose? Endless pilgrimage, that made its beauty. What is it I hear in the rush of the stream? Pilgrimage, that makes the grace of the rivers. What is it I hear in the gladness of the oriole’s singing? Pilgrimage, that makes its hymn enchanting my heart to praise with it. Everything that is becomes, because its nature is worked out through change and decay. That there are no endless pauses on some present sweet note makes the music of all this wonderful life we experience in nature, makes that marvellous hymn of man which we are, and through the changes rung are becoming sweeter and holier tune of the Divine Heart.

Instead of lamenting this as an evil, instead of thinking that in this fact God is unkind, let us learn that it is indeed a good, that in this fact God is most kind. Life could not be in us and for us but by the fact of change and passing. Love could not be in us and for us but for this fact of change and passing. The constancy we crave is just that these who have passed away from the glory of our eyes, loving them, have gathered into them the deathless, changeless spirit of our love; and in them it is passing up into new glory of living and loving. The constancy we crave is just that this love, whose outward form of loveliness has passed away, has become a part of our nobleness, of a fine nature persisting through all the changes that may befall, and showing itself forth in some tender, new beauty, some new holiness of life. It is fate? Nay: let us not petrify life’s heart by so calling it. Let us have no withered hags spinning out to us the threads of destiny and snapping them with a snarl and hollow laugh. It is the dear necessity of love that love’s life cannot in other ways be lived out and become just these experiences, which, although passing so swiftly from us, are yet the things we would not exchange for any monotony of petrification in our love and life. The bit of chestnut is gone from my hearth, and I shall never see it again laugh out for me in such a dear flame.

I gone, and never to look again upon its dancing glee; but this is the price we pay for that happy hour, for every holy time of our lives. This is life, and must be; but always has it its seasons of summer. Within, without, there is always a present beauty, a present joy. Life is of worth now, and will be. Whatever of worth in its past, that lives within us as power to work out the new worth in the new day, the new, faithful love in the new comradeship.

“As the fire burned, I mused” that “God is good, and his tender mercies are over all his works,”—not only over all, but in all and through all; that he abides all our experiences and changes, as our inmost life abides all our deaths as our resurrections into newness of life. I mused that his goodness and mercy appear in life, in being, by just the change and decay we sometimes lament,—this change and decay, not the reality, not the meaning, but the glad flame on my hearth, and in my heart the reality, the meaning, present love and present life the reality, and always without an abundance of truth and beauty and love, and always within us God and the dear ones we have loved and lost, to be experienced into greater, truer nature, diviner, more enduring character.

SONNET.

A thousand flowerets of a thousand hues,
Born of the sunset and the early dawn,
Burn in the darker forest, and suffuse
An unimagined brightness o’er the lawn.
These are the days I give my heart in pawn
To thee, O nature, and the world refuse;
These are the days I feel my footsteps drawn
To seek the wayward motions of the muse!
I have not long enough on earth to stay
To lose the joy of one bright summer day;
One quiet day of peace, ah, many a one!
Full of the song of birds and tremulous
With sunshine; let the world seek after us;
The muse and I are wandering with the sun.

—Philip Henry Savage, in First Poems and Fragments.

A LETTER OF ELIAS HICKS.

I enclose an exact copy of an “exhibit” used in the celebrated case of “Thomas L. Shotwell, complainant, and Joseph Hendrickson and Stacy Decow, defendants,” in the Court of Chancery of the State of New Jersey, in the year 1823, in a suit to obtain possession of property to be used for religious purposes. This exhibit is a letter from Elias Hicks, the famous Quaker that did for the society of Friends what Dr. Channing did for the Congregationalists of this country, at about the same time, the Friends now being divided into two branches, one known as the “Hicksite,” the other as “orthodox,” the “Hicksites” being Unitarian in their views.

I obtained this copy through the kindness of Mr. William Z. Flitcraft of Woodstown, N.J. Mr. Flitcraft kindly made this copy from the Court Reports of the State of New Jersey, so that there can be no reasonable doubt as to its genuineness and accuracy.

The letter is an argument by Elias Hicks

LONDON DIVAN.

Some pieces of furniture are built for beauty alone, others for pure utility, others for comfort, others for the advantage of limited space, others for convenience. When you find a piece that combines all these advantages, you have a sight well worth your West End car fare.

This London Divan may fairly claim such distinction. It is a charming piece of cabinet-work. The seat is fully 23 inches deep and heavily cushioned, the covering being of satin damask. The frame of Cuban Mahogany is inlaid with boxwood, tulip, rosewood, and mother o’ pearl.

We select this Divan as a special leader for this month, and give it an unusually low price.

PAINÉ FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

in favor of his views, couched in the peculiar language of the society of Friends, but none the less powerful on that account. I think that your readers would enjoy the letter, and I would suggest that you publish it in the Register. The underscored words are in Italics in the court report.

GEORGE W. STONE.

From "an authentic report of the testimony in a cause at issue in the Court of Chancery of the State of New Jersey, between Thomas L. Shotwell, complainant, and Joseph Hendrickson and Stacy Decow, defendants.

"Taken pursuant to the rules of the Court, by Jeremiah J. Foster, master and examiner in chancery.

"In two volumes. Vol. II."

[Page 333. Exhibit No. 37. Letter from Elias Hicks to Dr. N. Shoemaker of Philadelphia.]

JERICHO, THIRD-MONTH, 31ST, 1823.

Dear Friend,—Thy acceptable letter of First-month last came duly to hand; but my religious engagements, and other necessary concerns, have prevented my giving it that attention that its contents seem to demand. Thou queries after my views of the suffering of Jesus Christ the Son of God, and what was the object of the shedding of his blood on the cross, and what benefits resulted to mankind by the shedding of this blood, &c. I shall answer in a very simple way, as I consider the whole subject to be a very simple one, as all truth is simple when we free ourselves from the improper bias of tradition and education, which rests as a burdensome stone on the minds of most of the children of men, and which very much mars the unity and harmony of society.

1st. By what means did Jesus suffer? The answer is plain,—by the hands of wicked men, and because his works were righteous, and theirs wicked. Query. Did God send him into the world purposely to suffer death by the hands of wicked men? By no means; but to live a righteous and godly life (which was the design and end of God's creating man in the beginning), and thereby be a perfect example to such of mankind as should come to the knowledge of him and of his perfect life. For, if it was the purpose and will of God that he should die by the hands of wicked men, then the Jews, by crucifying him, would have done God's will, and of course would all have stood justified in his sight, which could not be. But it was permitted so to be, as it had been with many of the prophets and wise and good men that were before him, who suffered death by the hands of wicked men for righteousness' sake, as examples to those that came after that they should account nothing too dear to give up for the truth's sake, not even their own lives.

But the shedding of his blood by the wicked scribes and Pharisees and people of Israel had a particular effect on the Jewish nation, as by this, the topstone and worst of all their crimes, was filled up the measure of their iniquities, and which put an end to that dispensation, together with its law and covenant. That, as John's baptism summed up in one all the previous water baptisms of that dispensation, and put an end to them, which he sealed with his blood, so this sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ, summed up in one all the outward atoning sacrifices of the shadowy dispensation, and put an end to them all, thereby abolishing the law, having previously fulfilled all its righteousness, and, as saith the apostle, "He blotted out the handwriting of ordinances, nailing them to his cross," having put an end to the law that commanded them, with all its legal sins, and abolished all its legal penalties, so that all the Israelites that believed on him, after he exclaimed on the cross, "It is finished," might abstain from all the rituals of their law, such as circumcision, water baptisms, outward sacrifices, Seventh-day Sabbaths, and all their other holy days, &c., and be blameless; and the legal sins that any were guilty of was now remitted and done away by the abolishment of the law that commanded them, for "where there is no law there is no transgression." But those that did not believe on him, many of them were destroyed by the sword, and the rest were scattered abroad in the earth. But I do not consider that the crucifixion of the outward body of flesh and blood of Jesus on the cross was an atonement for any sins but the legal sins of the Jews; for, as their law was outward, so their legal sins and their penalties were outward, and these could be atoned for by an outward sacrifice. And this last outward sacrifice was a full type of the inward sacrifice that every sinner must make in giving up that sinful life of his own will, in and by which he hath from time to time crucified the innocent life of God in his own soul, and which Paul calls "the old man with his deeds," or "the man of sin and son of perdition," who hath taken God's seat in the heart, and there exalteth itself above all that is called God, or is worshipped, sitting as Judge and Supreme. Now, all this life, power, and will of man must be slain and die on the cross spiritually, as Jesus died on the cross outwardly; and this is the true atonement, which that outward atonement was a clear and full type of.

This the apostle Paul sets forth in a plain manner. Romans vi. 3 and 4: "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death, that, like as Christ was raised up from the dead (outwardly) by the glory of the Father, even so we," having by the spiritual baptism witnessed a death to sin, shall know a being raised up spiritually and walk in newness of life.

But the primitive Christian Church having soon after the apostle's days turned away from the true and only sufficient guide, the spirit of truth, that Jesus commanded his disciples to wait for, and not attempt to do anything until they had received it, but assured them that, when they had received it, it would be a complete and sufficient rule, without the addition of any other thing, as it would lead them and guide them in all truth. And to its sufficiency John, the beloved apostle, bore this noble and exalted testimony, in full accordance with his Divine Master, in this emphatic language to his fellow-believers: "Ye have an unction from the Holy One, and need not that any man teach you, but as the same anointing teacheth you, which is truth and is no lie." But the believers, by too much looking to their old traditions, soon lost sight of or neglected fully to attend, as they ought to have done, to their inward guide, turned their attention outward to the letter, which always killeth those who lean upon it as a rule. Hence the successors of those meek and self-denying followers of the example and commands of Jesus apostatized from the simplicity of the gospel by which the unity was broken, and they soon became divided into sects and parties, and persecuted each other, and invented and promulgated inconsistent and unsound doctrines, such as original sin, certifying that all Adam's offspring was condemned to eternal punishment for one misstep of our first parents; for they don't appear to have been guilty of but one failure, and that, it appears, they made satisfaction for at the time of their first arraignment by their benevolent Creator, manifesting sorrow and repentance, which seems to be fairly implied by the sequel of the interview between them; for it is said he clothed them with coats of skin, to hide their nakedness, which is an emblem of durable clothing; and, as their nakedness was not an outward one, but a nakedness of soul, not being able to conceal their sin from the all-penetrating eye of Divine Justice, so when he had brought them, through conviction, to see their error and repent of it, he was reconciled to them, and clothed them again with his Holy Spirit.

And, inasmuch as those idle promulgators of original sin believe they are made sinners, without their consent or knowledge, which, according to the nature and reason of things, every rational mind must see is impossible, so likewise they are idle and ignorant enough to believe they are made righteous without their consent or knowledge by the righteousness of one who lived on the earth near two thousand years before they had an existence, and this by the cruel hands of wicked men slaying an innocent and righteous one; and these are bold and daring enough to lay this cruel and unholy act in the charge of Divine Justice, as having purposely ordained it to be so. But what an outrage it is against every righteous law of God and man, as the Scriptures abundantly testify! See Exodus c. 23, v. 7, "Keep thee far from a false matter, and the innocent and righteous slay thou not; for I will not justify the wicked." Deuteronomy c. 27, v. 26, "Cursed be he that taketh reward to slay an innocent person"; and much might be produced to show the wickedness and absurdity of the doctrine, that would accuse the perfectly just, all-wise, and merciful Jehovah of so barbarous and cruel an act as that of slaying his innocent and righteous Son, to atone for the sins and iniquities of the ungodly.

Surely, is it possible that any rational being, that has any right sense of justice or mercy, that would be willing to accept forgiveness of sins on such terms!!! Would he not rather go forward and offer himself wholly up to suffer all the penalties due to his crimes rather than the innocent should suffer? Nay, was he so hardy as to acknowledge a willingness to be saved through such a medium, would it not prove that he stood in direct opposition to every principle of justice and honesty, of mercy and love, and show himself to be a poor selfish creature, and unworthy of notice!!!

Having given thee a sketch of my views on the subject of thy queries, how far thou may consider them correct, I must leave to thy judgment and consideration; and may now recommend thee to shake off all traditional views that thou hast imbibed from external evidences, and turn thy mind to the light within, as thy only true teacher: wait patiently for its instruction, and it will teach thee more than men or books can do; and lead thee to a clearer sight and sense of what thou desirest to know than I have words clearly to convey it to thee in. That this may be thy experience is my sincere desire; and, with love to thyself and family, I conclude.

Thy affectionate friend,

ELIAS HICKS,

DR. N. SHOEMAKER,

Literature.

A SYSTEM OF LUCID SHORTHAND. Devised by William George Spencer, with a Prefatory Note by Herbert Spencer. New York: D. Appleton & Co.—It seems odd enough that Mr. Herbert Spencer should have been lured into the publication of this system of shorthand invented by his father more than fifty years ago. It would seem somewhat like a reflection upon his own doctrine of evolution, for this is a case of stenographic atavism. In the last fifty years shorthand has made decided progress,—too much progress to make the reversion to an untried private system a safe one. The history of this book is curious. The manuscript, as it is here given, was completed by Mr. Herbert Spencer fifty years ago. The system was invented some ten years before by his father. It is not merely as a memorial of his father that this filial duty is carried out. It is not simply as a bit of stenographic history that it is given to the world. "Let me explain," says Mr. Spencer, "why I am anxious that this system should not be lost. It is not merely as a better shorthand that preservation of it is important. Existing short-hands serve very well,—especially, phonography. Save in respect that it keeps the line, the lucid shorthand has no advantage over phonography for reporting and kindred purposes. Nor is it that I am prompted merely by filial feeling to rescue from oblivion a work on which my father bestowed so much time and labor. The action I now take in the matter results from the conviction long since formed, and still unshaken, that the lucid shorthand ought to replace ordinary writing." The italics are Mr. Spencer's. This was once the dream of the inventor of phonography, and it has perhaps been more nearly realized by that system than any other. But phonographers have pretty well given up the idea of displacing the ordinary writing, and are using shorthand mainly for the purpose for which it was needed,—that of making verbatim reports of speeches and for amanuensis work. Mr. Spencer seems altogether to have overlooked one invention which renders the substitution of "Lucid Shorthand" for ordinary writing far less probable to-day than it was fifty years ago. We mean the introduction of the typewriter. It is now possible to write at the rate of seventy-five to ninety words a minute on the typewriter, and to have a text as perfectly legible as print. It is doubtful if those who should be deluded into taking up Mr. Spencer's system of lucid shorthand would be able to write it much faster without sacrificing the legibility claimed for it. There are other objections to this system. One of them is that the arbitrary characters are very arbitrary, and some of them hard to make. The system is not worked out with sufficient detail and with enough exercises to enable many to attain a practical mastery of it.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR MINISTERIAL POWER. The Carew Lectures for 1895, Hartford Theological Seminary. By Charles Cuthbert Hall, D.D. Hartford, Conn.: Hartford Seminary Press.—The expression of these lectures falls far below the level of their intrinsic quality. It is scholastic in the extreme, as if the lecturer were afraid that he might not appear sufficiently learned to the young theologians of the Hartford Theological School. The first lecture makes very little headway, but comes to a good conclusion with the concluding sentence of Jowett's essay on "The Interpretation of the Scriptures" in the famous "Essays and Reviews." A second lecture treats of physical and mental qualifications for the ministry, and contains some excellent warnings and suggestions. Experiential and devotional qualifications are next considered, then social and pastoral, next liturgical and homiletical, and, finally, theological and ecclesiastical. In the last chapter a passage on the neglect of certain truths is full of interest. It is said of the Fatherhood of God, "This truth, supreme in the estimation of Jesus, has for centuries remained in comparative obscurity," and then follows this significant quotation: "One is aghast to discover that the doctrine which Jesus put in the forefront of his teaching did not leave a trace on the dominant theology of the early Church, and for long centuries passed out of the Christian consciousness. Had it not been for the Lord's Prayer, and in a sense the three creeds, no witness had been left for the Fatherhood in Christian doctrine and worship. The Anglican communion has thirty-nine articles, with one on oaths, one on the descent into hell, one on the marriage of priests, one on how to avoid people who are excommunicate, and not one on the Fatherhood. The Presbyterian communion has a confession with thirty-three chapters, which deal in a trenchant manner with great mysteries; but there is no one expounding the Fatherhood of God." In the next following paragraph it would be interesting to know just exactly what Dr. Hall means when he says that "the expectation of our Lord's return—that thought which dominated the Apostolic Church, that hope which was the 'master-light of all its seeing'—is being reinstated in the Christian consciousness after centuries of practical effacement." Surely, the learned lecturer must know that the New Testament expectation had reference to an event in the immediate future which never came to pass. But the whole book is tragical with the suggestion of a half-emancipated mind, like Milton's

"tawny lion, pawing to get free His hinder parts."

FIRST POEMS AND FRAGMENTS. By Philip Henry Savage. Boston: Copeland & Day.—The suspicion that Copeland & Day are nothing if not eccentric in the manner of their making of books gets a notable rebuke from the appearance of Mr. Savage's "First Poems." It could not be more simple and refined. "In russet clad, every particular of print and paper is a pleasure to the eye and well suited to the volume's spiritual significance. Mr. Savage has not written in the hope or expectation of attracting wide attention. He is a nature-poet; and the nature-poets, as such, condemn themselves to an audience reversing the proverbial "fit, though few." Even those who love nature with a sincere and great affection are not always attracted to her image in the poet's glass, or their devotion to Wordsworth or Emerson makes them indifferent to every later vision. Mr. Savage's is that of a man whose admiration for the aspects of the natural world is wholly sound and sweet. Clearly, he is not one who thinks it a nice thing to write poems about nature, and therefore says: "Go to! I will do it." Clearly, he was a lover of nature before he took to verse. And the main pleasure in reading these poems is that of holding one's ear close to a heart that beats in loving unison with natural sights and sounds. Here are poems written as with the eye on the object, so realistic is the touch, and others more suggestive of "emotion recollected in tranquillity," wherein the object turns into a symbol of some spiritual relation. Meantime, Mr. Savage is as objective to himself as any natural appearance. He not only enjoys the natural vision, but he enjoys himself as so enjoying. All through his book there runs a note of self-approval, self-caressing, because of his preference to natural beauty and suggestion to the gauds which most men seek; and this note is so genuine, so unaffected, that it gives the book another very real charm. In a time when, with so many poets, it is refreshing to come upon a man the substance of whose poetry is superior to his formal workmanship. It is so in the case of Mr. Savage. Here and there he might have filed his line a little more to good advantage; and sometimes the distinction between what is homely, and therefore the true stuff of poetry, and what is matter of fact, and therefore to be put aside, is not carefully observed. It is more difficult to name particular poems for special commendation because none of them are named by the author. But it is in such poems as that numbered ten that we find Mr. Savage at his best, and there are many such between the covers of his sincere and thoughtful book. "First Poems"—name and thing—has a prophetic intimation, which we trust the times to come will happily fulfill.

"The form, the form alone, is eloquent,"

UN-AMERICAN IMMIGRATION: ITS PRESENT EFFECTS AND FUTURE PERILS. A Study from the Census of 1890. By Rena Michaelis Atchison, Ph.D., with an introduction by Rev. Joseph Cook. Chicago: Charles H. Kerr & Co. $1.25.—The author of this book is a lady who has given much attention to sociological discussion, and the structure of this book shows a good deal of

A SUNLIGHT EFFECT.

The clear morning sunlight brings with it gladness and renewed energy, and drives into the background, like a dark shadow, that old bugbear "wash day," and does its work quickly, easily, perfectly. Use Sunlight Soap, and you will realize that "Sunlight" has come into your life.

Sunlight Soap

It Makes Home Brighter.

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N. Y.

hard work. But the outcome is not wholly satisfactory. Foreign governments are resenting the charge that they sent either their paupers or their criminals to this country. In regard to criminals there is no doubt that the most important of European governments are trying to settle the problems of criminality upon their own soil. There is more ground for the assumption that paupers have been assisted to this country, as nothing is more natural than that the poor in foreign countries should hope to better their condition by coming to a land where labor is better paid and food abundant. The importation of emigrants by contractors has been one of the worst features of the emigration problem. The facts and statistics bearing on the subject of emigration are presented in various aspects in this volume. But the suggestions the writer has to offer for the restriction of emigration will have little practical result. The author would not exclude any particular race or people. She would admit the worthy and exclude the unfit, but this is the most difficult thing to carry out. She proposes that no emigrant should be allowed to land who cannot read and write his native language, and who has not money enough to prevent him from being a burden to the State for a period of six months. She would extend the time for naturalization, require immigrants to declare on landing their intention or non-intention to become citizens.

INTRODUCTION TO THE STUDY OF THE GOSPEL OF ST. JOHN. Together with an Interlinear Literal Translation of the Greek Text of Stephens, 1550, with the Authorized Version, and with Various Readings. By J. P. MacLean, Ph.D. Cincinnati: The Robert Clarke Company.—This book strikes us as being probably among the first-fruits of a scholarship still largely in the making. If it is only the expansion of a thesis originally presented for a doctorate, it may be looked upon as giving good promise for the future. If it is a product of maturity, and not of youth, its publication would seem to have been superfluous. As a guide to the present attitude of scholarship with reference to the mooted questions of the Johannine literature, it is imperfect and unsatisfactory. It doubtless did the author good to write the book; but the scholar needs something more complete, and the learner something at the same time more impartial and more accurate. The errors may be chargeable in part to the printer, provided he did not give the author sufficient opportunity to scrutinize the proof-sheets. Apart from the contents, the English style is that of a very unskilful writer. This, however, is a matter of secondary importance in such a work, albeit good speech is always preferable to poor.

MASTER WILBERFORCE. By "Rita." New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.—This is the history of a young man who was not "brought up," but "left to develop"; and this development is traced from infancy up through the period of his first love affair, with its tragic termination. At the age of three this remarkable infant began dieting himself on hygienic principles. He learned his letters by heart in a single lesson, and then stopped the praises of his nurse with fine contempt, saying: "I only remember them. I don't know them." Fortunately, he is less unusual as a young man than as a child; and his love affair is not without interest. The book, while not remarkable in any way except for the precocity of its hero, is a good average summer novel, burdened by no peculiar notions about the modern woman, and wholesome in its influence, so far as it will have any.

THE VEILED DOCTOR. By Varina Anne Jefferson Davis. New York: Harper's.—Miss Davis gives us a sad book in this study of an unhappy marriage and its strange ending. The frivolity of the youthful wife and the sternness of the husband, set in the quietness of a sleepy old town, "where the brooding quiet muffles every pulse of modern life," are well drawn, and awaken understanding with the successive phases of their misunderstandings. Miss Davis follows Hawthorne in her main idea; and the climax of her book, as of "The Minister's Black Veil," comes in the persistent determination of the man to keep the veil from displacement, even in his death struggles, and to let no mortal see again the face that he had once shrouded from sight. The death scene is one that will not be forgotten easily.

OUR WESTERN ARCHIPELAGO. By Henry M. Field. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.—The veteran editor of the Evangelist, Dr. Field, adds another to his many books of travel, this time describing scenes and experiences in our own country. Beginning with an interesting chapter on "The Canadian Pacific Railroad," he takes us with him through Winnipeg and British Columbia, Alaska with its glaciers and islands, and back through Washington, Montana, and the Yellowstone Park. His companion on the trip was his niece, introduced to us as the youngest of his household. While one cannot place this book by the side of "The Barbary Coast," for interest, it is yet fresh and animated description, showing that the traveller loses none of his enjoyment in visiting new places.

THE PLATED CITY. By Bliss Perry. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.—Mr. Perry's book is of unusual interest, as the minor novels go,—first for the cleverly worked out plot, the well-drawn characters, and the uncommon situations, and then for its keen study of social conditions in a small manufacturing town. The color question is skillfully handled; and the disagreeable or painful experiences which one instinctively expects to find in a book of which this is an element are, if not eliminated, yet so skilfully managed as to arouse thought without undue exaggeration. Mr. Perry is one of our most enjoyable writers of current fiction; and his books are wholesome, bright, and stimulating.

AFLOAT WITH THE FLAG. By W. J. Henderson. New York: Harper & Brothers.—This account of naval cadets and their adventures will prove no less entertaining to boys than the other books by Mr. Henderson; and it is a clean, wholesome story, less tinged with exaggeration than most books of its class. The search of these friends for a runaway, and the complications that arose after the enlistment of one with the Brazilian insurgents, form the main plot of the story. The writer has made the most out of the events in the harbor of Rio about a year and a half ago, when the White Squadron enforced respect for the American flag.

MEDITATIONS IN MOTLEY. By Walter Blackburn Harte. Boston: The Arena Publishing Company.—The meditative, gently satirical essay will always be in favor with lovers of good literature; and Mr. Harte's endowments for success in this sort of writing are not few. The very titles of this bundle of papers, "imbued with the sobriety of midnight," are tempting, as when he writes of "The Satisfaction of Prejudice," "Jacobitism in Boston," "About Critics and Criticism," etc.; and he treats his subjects with charming egotism and decided originality. They have received much praise from English reviewers.

Literary Notes.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co. will issue in the fall a volume containing the last poems of James Russell Lowell. The same firm announces a one-volume edition of Robert Browning.

Mrs. Humphry Ward's new novel, which is to appear in the Century during the coming year, beginning with November, is called "Sir George Tressady." The world to which its readers will be introduced is partly industrial and partly that of the English country house. It is understood that several characters of a former novel will reappear.

"The Proceedings of the Minneapolis and Cleveland Conferences for Good City Government" will be published by the National Municipal League about the middle of September. These papers treat of the municipal conditions of the leading American cities North, South, East, and West, and deal with the prominent features of the movement for municipal reform. The price will be $1.50 for the cloth-bound, $1.25 for the paper-bound edition. Orders may be sent to the National Municipal League, 514 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.

Books Received.

From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston. Twice-told Tales. By Nathaniel Hawthorne. Riverside Literature Series. Price 60 cents. The Autocrat of the Breakfast-table. With Accompanying Papers. By Oliver Wendell Holmes. Riverside Literature Series. Price 50 cents. From Copeland & Day, Boston. Robert Louis Stevenson. An Elegy, and Other Poems, mainly Personal. By Richard Le Gallienne. Price $1.25. From Macmillan & Co., New York. Passages of the Bible chosen for their Literary Beauty and Interest. By J. G. Frazer. Price $2.00. Grania. The Story of an Island. By the Hon. Emily Lawless. Price 50 cents. From Harper & Brothers, New York. The Money we need. A Short Primer on Money and Currency. By Henry Loomis Nelson. Harper's Book of Facts. A Classified History of the World, embracing Science, Literature, and Art. Compiled by Joseph H. Willsey. Edited by Charlton T. Lewis. Price $8.00. (Sold by Walter S. Bigelow, 50 Bromfield Street, Boston.) From D. Appleton & Co., New York. The Mottos and Commentaries of Friedrich Froebel's Mother-play. By Henrietta R. Elliot. From the American Book Company, New York. Psychology in Education. By Ruric N. Roark. Webster's Academic Dictionary. New Edition. Price $1.50. Pupils' Outline Studies in the History of the United States. By Francis H. White. From Funk & Wagnall Company, New York. The People's Bible. Discourses upon Holy Scripture. By Joseph Parker, D.D.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. Pretty Phyllis Gray. A Beautiful Song and Chorus. Words and music by Harry Moore. Save me, O God. Sacred Song. Words by Sweet Mollie Dell. Waltz Song and Chorus. Words by John T. Rafferty. Music by Alice C. Rafferty. Be Good, Sweet Maid. Words by C. Kingsley. Music by Otto Santor. Mission of a Rose. Song. Words by Clifton Bingham. Music by Frederic H. Cowen.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh
ANCHOR, Cincinnati.
ATLANTIC, New York.
BEYMER-BAUMAN, Pittsburgh.
BRADLEY, New York.
BROOKLYN, New York.
COLLIER, St. Louis.
GORNELL, Buffalo.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS, Pittsburgh.
ECKSTEIN, Cincinnati.
FAHNESTOCK, Pittsburgh.
JEWETT, New York.
KENTUCKY, Louisville.
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS. CO. Philadelphia.
MORLEY, Cleveland.
MISSOURI, St. Louis.
RED SEAL, St. Louis.
SALEM, Salem, Mass.
SHIPMAN, Chicago.
SOUTHERN, St. Louis and Chicago.
ULSTER, New York.
UNION, New York.

You May

not want to paint your house white, but that is no reason why you should not use Pure White Lead, which makes the best paint, and can be easily tinted to the color desired by using the National Lead Co.'s tinting colors, prepared expressly for this purpose. To be sure that you get Pure White Lead, examine the brands. Those in the margin are genuine.

For color-card and pamphlet—sent free—address

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,
1 Broadway, New York.

SUMMER READING.

A Child of Nature.

By MARION D. SHUTTER, D.D.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, 50 Cents.
Special gift edition, full gilt, $1.00.

Philadelphia To-day.—One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful.

Minneapolis Journal.—Dr. Shutter has a keen zest for Nature, and a mind to receive lasting impressions from her manifold moods in sky, water, cloud, leaf, grass, and flowers. He makes some charming applications and analogues in this volume, which will be prized by all who love homilies in stones and running brooks.

Toronto Week.—The ideas are so simply and so strikingly expressed that it is a pleasure to read it from cover to cover. The author strikes us as having eyes to see.

For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid, on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Poet-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Crosswell Cressey, Ph.D.

CONTENTS: Preface; I. The Conditions of the Problem; II. The Nature of Man; III. The Persistence of Mind or Soul; IV. The Nature of the Universe; V. Personal Belief; VI. Conditional Immortality; VII. Conclusion.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

BY

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Lectures and Sermons

BY

WILLIAM J. POTTER.

With a Biographical Sketch

BY

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Ph.D.

This book is published in style of Mr. Potter's previous volume, "Twenty-five Sermons in Twenty-five Years." Gilt top, bevelled boards.

Price $2.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Home.

MAN IN NATURE.

Climbing up the hillside beneath the summer stars,
I listen to the murmur of the drowsy, ebbing sea;
The newly risen moon has loosed her silver zone
On the undulating waters where the ships are sailing free.

O moon, and O stars, and O drowsy summer sea,
Drawing thy tide from the city up the bay,
I know how you will look and what your bounds must be,
When we and our sons have forever passed away.

You shall not change, but a nobler race of men Shall walk beneath the stars and wander by the shore;
I cannot guess their glory, but I think the sky and sea
Will bring to them more gladness than they brought to us of yore.

—William Roscoe Thayer.

For the Christian Register.

A DAY WITHOUT MAMMA.

BY ELIZABETH M. CHAPIN.

Things never would have happened so under mamma's administration. But mamma was away. Uncle Tom came for her that morning, for dear Grandma Armstrong was sick. Mamma turned very pale when she heard it; and Uncle Tom kissed her, and called her "poor little Maidsie," in a way which Master Donald considered quite frivolous in a man as old as his Uncle Tom.

"Be good children," called mamma, as she drove out of the yard, looking back at the three faces flattened against the window-pane. "Mind Mary, and don't tease Baby Fred."

"Yes'm, yes'm," chorused the children. They watched the carriage receding in the rain, till a bend in the street hid it from sight. Then they clambered down from the window-seat.

"Will Grandma Armstrong die?" asked Ethel, in an awe-struck voice.

"Like's not," returned Mary. "She's an old lady, an' she ain't been a mite well lately."

"Does it feel good to die?" pursued Ethel. "Do people go right straight to heaven?"

"Dear knows! I don't," Mary replied brusquely. "Now I've got to go down to the laundry to finish the washing I began yesterday. You play prettily together till I come back. I won't be gone long."

Donald had stood for the last few minutes, his hands in his pockets, staring at the carpet. He looked up when the door slammed after Mary. "I have an i-de-a," he said slowly. Donald was fond of large words, and pronounced them with solemn impressiveness, distributing the accent evenly on all the syllables. Leaving the room, he soon reappeared with a small box, the contents of which he emptied on the floor,—big buttons and small buttons, round buttons and flat buttons, buttons of all sizes, colors, and descriptions.

"Pwity, pwity!" murmured Baby Fred, admiringly.

"Will mamma like it?" Ethel ventured.

"She never said we mustn't," said Donald, quickly. "Now I'll tell you the game. These are to be our soldiers. I am an emperor, and this rug is my ter-ri-to-ry. You must live over on the mat next the door, and I will come and subdue your forces."

Ethel looked distressed; but she was so used to having her forces subdued, in one way or another, by Donald, that she made no verbal objection. And her little heart overflowed with gratitude, when he offered her her choice of the buttons. She formed a company of cut-glass buttons, another of round gold-dust buttons, and then carefully selected the prettiest of the odd ones.

"Those can be your mi-li-tia," suggested Donald.

"I've picked out all the nice ones," said Ethel, with a qualm of conscience. "Wouldn't you like some 'litia, too?"

"I don't mind. Men don't care much for looks, you know. This is the way we'll fight. You have to snap the buttons at each other. If you tick 'em, it don't amount to anything; if you send 'em aways, they have to retire from the field of battle; and, if you tip 'em over, they're mortally wounded. Now you take your men over to the mat, and I will come and invade your ter-ri-to-ry."

The campaign was a brilliant one, displaying much generalship on the part of Master Donald. He led his army across the burning desert with forced marches, leaving here and there a shoe-button, which he said sickened and died on the way. In the dead of night, by means of a pontoon bridge, he marched his troops over the swollen river,—a black stripe in the carpet,—and made an unexpected attack on Ethel's army, taking her entirely by surprise. A bloody engagement ensued.

Ethel found herself somewhat at a disadvantage; for her soldiers, being selected mainly from the point of beauty, were easily killed,—that is to say, turned over,—while Donald's big agate buttons no strength of hers could budge an inch. She could not help shedding a few tears when her gold-dust general received a mortal wound, but for the most part the game was a happy one. Even Baby Fred contributed to his brother's and sister's pleasure. They chose to regard him now as a neutral nation, now as an envoy, but most often as a destructive cyclone.

The children were still playing when Mary returned. "Mercy me!" she cried, glancing at the clock. "Who'd have dreamed it was so late! Well, your luncheon is all on the table; and the sooner you eat it, the better."

"Goody!" cried Ethel. "Aren't you glad, Donald? I'm so hungry."

"We'll finish after lunch," assented Donald. "What have you got to eat, Mary? We always have creamed crullers when mother's away, if we're good."

"I couldn't fuss to whip cream," said Mary. She was tired and cross. "Bread and milk and baked apples and sponge cake is a good enough lunch for any one. I know some little boys and girls that would think it a feast."

She led the way into the dining-room, and saw the children in their places and Baby Fred muffled in his bib. Then she left to "tidy up" the nursery.

"I think I've got another idea," said Donald. He broke up his bread into bits of various sizes, and named them as he dropped them one by one into his milk. "This is mackerel, this is a cod, this large one is a whale, and all the long brown crusts will be hungry sharks. We'll go fishing: only let's shut our eyes, so it will be a surprise what we get."

Ethel and Baby Fred followed their brother's example.

"Mine are all whales," shouted baby, delightedly, squeezing his eyes tightly together, and stirring the whales so vigorously with his spoon that milk splashed out of his dish far and wide.

When the milky oceans were fished dry, the children helped themselves to a sponge cup-cake each, and sat munching dreamily. A beam of golden sunshine suddenly darted across the floor, and stood dancing on the wall.

"It's just the color of this cake," cried Ethel. "I'm so glad it's cleared off. Now we can go out in the garden to play this afternoon."

"After we've finished our game," said Donald. "I'm through. Come on, children."

Donald stopped on the nursery threshold, wrath and indignation in his eyes. "What have you done with our troops?" he demanded.

Whish, whish, went Mary's broom. "I put them back in the bureau drawer," she said, "where they belong, and where they'll stay for one while. Now you all put on your hats and go out of doors. I can't be bothered while I'm sweeping."

Ethel and Baby Fred trotted off gayly. Donald followed at a slower pace, plotting in his naughty little brain how he might best pay Mary for capturing his soldiers.

"Say, children," he said, when he reached the corner of the garden where the others were busily spading a little plot of ground that they called their flower-bed, "if you'd like to go to the circus this afternoon, I'll take you with the new silver dollar Uncle Tom gave me on my birthday."

"Isn't that splendid, baby?" exclaimed Ethel, hopping up and down. "You're real good, Donald. But how will Mary?"

"She said she wanted us out of the way," retorted Donald, his eyes flashing; "and I suppose the outer of the way we are, the better she will like it."

However, Donald took great care that Mary's sharp eyes should not spy them as they went away; and the children made a very quiet exit into the street through a broken place in the hedge. "It's nearer this way," Donald explained, "and it's getting late."

As the three approached the centre of the village, the sidewalks grew more and more crowded and more and more thickly fringed with carriages. Riders galloped up and down the street on horseback, scattering yellow posters. Rough men and coarse-faced women jostled eagerly against each other. Clerks were gathered about the shop doors, making audible and sneering comments on the passers-by. Baby Fred, pushed this way and that, began to whimper.

"Take his hand, Ethel," commanded Donald, peremptorily, seizing the other himself. "Don't cry, baby! We're most there."

How the children managed, in that swaying jam of people, to cross the street and the circus-grounds to the tent is more than I can tell. But they certainly reached there, with no further mishap than the loss of Ethel's hat and a zigzag rent in the front of Baby Fred's embroidered white dress.

"These two," said Donald to the doorkeeper, ringing down his silver dollar, as he had often seen his father do, and waving his hand toward the younger children.

The doorkeeper eyed the small group quizzically. So did a benevolent, white-haired old gentleman just behind. "Gramp's takin' the kids to the circus," said the doorkeeper to himself, and handed Donald the tickets. "Evidently, they're known here," thought the benevolent old gentleman. "Belong to the troop, perhaps. Bright looking children! It's too bad, too bad." However, he followed them so closely that the man who took the tickets made the same mistake that the doorkeeper had done before.

Once inside the menagerie tent, Donald's uneasy conscience subsided; and he forgot everything but the happiness at hand. How could he help it? Here in front of him were all the animals he had ever pored over in the back part of the dictionary, many of them endeared by myth and history. True, Androclus's lion looked rather sleepy; and there was a peculiar and not altogether satisfactory odor about Hannibal's elephants. Still, if the tent were suddenly transformed to an arena, doubtless they would display many of their ancient virtues. And Donald pictured to himself, with much inward complacency, how the large man in front, who had just been standing on Ethel's toes, and who turned around with an oath at her brother's remonstrance, would look, with both arms torn off, slowly munched by a Bengal tiger.

To the other children, however, the long array of cages grew monotonous. "I wish that wolf would stop whirling round so," said Ethel at last, with white lips, clinging to the limit rope for support. "He makes me so dizzy."

"We'd better go into the other tent now," Donald hastened to say, wise from previous experience with Ethel's white lips.

But Baby Fred, who had planted himself before the sea-lions' cage in front, refused to budge one way or the other. And, when at last Donald bore him off by main force, his lips quivered and his brown eyes filled with tears. "Wahn' see—sea-li-ons—some—mo—ah," he sobbed piteously.

"Sh, sh!" said Donald. "You can see those another time. It's lots nicer in the other tent."

The children found themselves places on the lowest tier of seats in front of the central ring, and stared about them in open-eyed wonder. To them it was a scene in fairy-land; and what but fairies could be those dainty little creatures, all in gauze and star-bespangled, that danced so merrily on the backs of the strong horses, and jumped all unharmed through hoops of burning flame?

"It's so nice," sighed Ethel, nestling close to her brother. "Too good to be real. Perhaps we're all asleep."

"I might pinch you," suggested Donald. Ethel shook her head hastily.

The afternoon passed only too soon. The fairies became English sporting ladies, who, in turn, were shifted to fat clowns, and then to bright little black-and-tans.

"Is it all over?" asked Ethel, as the ringmaster shouted something about the evening exhibition, and the people began to leave.

"Yes," said Donald, hurriedly; "and we must get out as quick as we can."

The tardy conscience, or, perhaps, a hitherto latent fear of consequences, was awake now. Donald pushed his way eagerly on toward the door, only thinking that he would better reach home before his father returned from the bank. But just at the entrance he found himself abruptly hugged and kissed.

"Donald! Donald Gray!" cried his mother's voice. "And where are the others?"

Donald looked back, glad to turn from his father's grave face. There was Ethel pushing her way heroically between a very lank man and a very fat woman, but Baby Fred—

"Ethel," he called, "where's baby?"

"Isn't he with you?" asked Ethel, surprised. "I haven't seen him since I started."

Mrs. Gray faced her husband. "Fred-eric," she said, "my baby is lost!"

Back they hurried in the face of the crowd. Had any one seen a baby, a little, yellow-haired two-year-old, in a Swiss embroidered dress and a red fez cap? Every one looked interested and sorry, but no one had seen him. Mrs. Gray's face grew white with each successive step; but she only walked the more firmly, and clasped the more tightly by the hand the children that were yet hers. Donald's face looked like his mother's, white and determined.

"Papa," he said in a hard-set voice, "we'll look here, and you go into the menagerie tent."

"Why didn't I think of that before?" said Mr. Gray. "No, dear: Donald is right. You must stay and look here." He hoped she did not know the awful fear that came to him at Donald's words.

"Frederic," said mamma, "can it make much difference? I must be the first to find him,—my precious baby,—even if"—

They all went into the menagerie tent together.

The keepers shook their heads at the mother's question. No, they hadn't seen him. They would have known if there had been an accident, but children were sometimes stolen.

The tent was almost empty now, but there was no glimpse of the little wayward figure that would have been so precious to the eyes that searched. Relieved, though heartsick, Mrs. Gray turned back.

"I can see something white over there," said Donald, suddenly; and, wrenching his hand from his mother's grasp, he ran across the tent. The others followed.

Yes, there, curled up in the straw in front of the sea-lions' cage, lay Baby Fred, fast asleep, with a happy smile on his very dirty face.

Mrs. Gray lifted him gently in her arms. "Tired little man! We won't wake him," she said.

The motion opened Baby Fred's brown eyes. "Wahn' see sea-lions s'moah," he said drowsily, and dropped to sleep again.

"No, Frederic, I'm not tired; and I want to carry him,—mother's little, little baby! We'll all go home now. Thank God!—all!"

"Donald must be severely punished," said his father that night, after the children had gone to bed.

As he spoke, the door opened; and a little figure, clad all in white, marched slowly into the room.

"I have come to the con-clu-sion," said Donald, gravely, "that I will never take the children to the circus again."

"Little rascal!" muttered his father.

But Mrs. Gray, thinking of how some time her little ones might be motherless, even as she was motherless and heartsick now, felt very tender toward all delinquencies. She put her hand on Donald's head, and turned the wise little face up toward her own.

"Donald has hurt mamma very much," she said.

Ethel would have burst into repentant tears, but Donald only compressed his lips.

"I was bad," he said, in a judging voice, and left the room.

THE BLACK SATIN FAN.

"Grandma, won't you lend me your black satin fan?" asked Elsie, putting her head in at the open door of grandma's bedroom, where the old lady sat at her desk.

"I want to dress up in Aunt Mary's shawl and hat, and play I'm a lady going to make calls. I've got a parasol; but I must have a fan, you know."

"I'm afraid you might break the fan, my dear," said grandma; "and I value it very highly."

"Oh, no, I won't break it, grandma," pleaded Elsie. "I'll be so careful, and I can't play without a fan."

"Well, you may take it, then; but be sure you don't break it, and bring it back as soon as you are through using it," said grandma, who felt sorry for Elsie because she had no little brothers and sisters, and was obliged to play alone most of the time. They lived a long distance from neighbors, and those who were nearest had no children of Elsie's age.

Elsie ran out with the fan, and put on the hat and shawl she had borrowed from Aunt Mary. The parasol was her own, a recent gift from grandma.

Elsie felt much pleased with herself as she walked up and down the garden paths, fanning herself gently, just as she had seen Aunt Mary do. She pretended that she had friends at the dog-kennel, the chicken-house, and the rabbit-hutch, and held long conversations with imaginary ladies. The arbor was the last place at which she called; and, when she entered it, she heard such a twittering overhead that she forgot everything else in her curiosity to see the nest she was sure some sparrows had built in the vines. She laid the parasol and fan on the bench, and then sprang on it herself, and began to part and shake the vines, which had crept through the wide lattice and grown thickly over the inside. The twittering stopped at once, and at the second shake two sparrows darted out almost into Elsie's face.

Startled, she stepped back quickly, tripped upon the parasol, and came down with a crash upon the bench, the fan under her.

"Oh! Oh!" she cried. "I believe I've broken grandma's fan."

And she had. Two of the sticks had snapped, and the satin part of the fan hung over limply when opened. When the fan was closed, the broken sticks did not show. Elsie cried softly, and felt very unhappy. How could she tell grandma what had happened? And she had promised to be so very careful. After thinking it over a long time, she decided that she couldn't tell. Perhaps grandma wouldn't use the fan for a long time; and when she did, and discovered that it was broken, she might, perhaps, have forgotten that she had ever loaned it. She might think it had been broken in shutting the drawer.

Elsie, feeling very guilty, went quietly into the house, and listened at the door of the sitting-room. She heard her mother and grandmother talking together, and so was sure she could go into grandma's room and put the fan away without being seen.

She laid it away in its long, narrow box, and then hurried out. She didn't venture to go into the sitting-room, for she didn't want to see any one just then. She went upstairs to her own little room on the second floor, and played with her paper dolls until supper time.

Once her mother looked in on her way to her own room.

"You're very quiet this afternoon, it seems to me, Elsie," she said.

"I'm playing with my paper dolls," answered Elsie, not turning her head. She didn't want her mother to see her face; for she felt very guilty, and she knew it showed in her face.

"Did you put my fan away, Elsie?" asked grandma at supper.

"Yes'm," answered Elsie, keeping her eyes on her bowl of bread and milk.

Grandma asked no further questions, but that one had been enough to take away Elsie's appetite. She could not eat more than half the bread and milk which was in the bowl, and, to her mother's surprise, did not want any cake.

"I hope you're not going to be sick, Elsie," said Mrs. Bond.

Elsie shook her head. "No'm," she answered in a low voice.

"I think she has been playing too hard," said Aunt Mary. "Elsie is a regular romp."

"She is grandma's own dear little girl," said her grandmother; and Elsie felt more unhappy at the praise than she would have been, had she been scolded.

Several weeks passed, and Elsie had almost forgotten about the broken fan, when one afternoon the minister, his wife, and four children came to tea. Elsie had on her best white frock, her new slippers, and the string of silver beads which grandma had given her on her birthday; and of course she was on her best behavior.

She took the minister's four children out into the garden, picked them some flowers, showed them the rabbits and pigeons, and played hide and seek in the big orchard.

All three of the minister's little girls screamed and cried when, in hiding down by the hedge, Elsie stepped on a snake. But Elsie didn't cry or scream at all. She just picked up a stick, ran after the snake, which was crawling away as fast as it could, and killed it with several sharp blows.

"You're brave," said the minister's son, a boy of twelve, who came running up to find out what all the fuss was about. "I hate a coward. What's the use of being afraid of a little garter snake? I knew a boy once who use to catch garter snakes and hang them around his neck."

His little sisters looked horrified. They said they couldn't help being afraid of snakes, and they wouldn't play hide and seek any more.

Elsie felt proud and pleased because Oscar had called her brave. They all marched to the house, Oscar carrying the dead snake over a stick.

They had just finished telling of Elsie's bravery, when Grandma Bond came into the parlor, her black satin fan in one hand. She sat down and opened it. The afternoon was quite warm.

"Why, mother," said Elsie's mamma, "you've broken your fan."

Grandma looked sorely distressed.

"Susan must have broken it in some way," she said. "I sent her into my room after it. Perhaps she let it fall, and stepped on it."

Susan was the chambermaid. She had been Elsie's nurse, and Elsie loved her dearly.

She stood up, trembling from head to foot; but she spoke out in a clear voice.

"No, grandma," she said, "Susan didn't break it. I broke it the day I was playing I was a lady, and I didn't like to tell you."

Then she sat down, and covered her face with her hands. Every one was looking at her. She felt sure the minister's wife wouldn't want her to play any more with Oscar and his little sisters.

Then she felt her grandma's arms around her, and heard the minister say, "I think the child very brave to confess her fault before us all."

"Yes, that was braver than killing the snake," said Oscar.

"She has moral courage," said the minister's wife.

Elsie cried a good deal, but she was glad she had told the truth. She was unhappy only because she was ashamed of not having made the confession long before.

"It would have been easier," she thought. "Next time I break anything, I will tell about it at once. It makes it harder and harder to put it off."

"I'm glad you're not a coward, Elsie," her mother said.

"But weren't you dreadfully ashamed of me, mamma, when you heard me tell before all those people about breaking grandma's fan?"

"I would have been ashamed of you if you hadn't told," her mother answered.

Grandma sent the fan to the city, and had it mended. It came back as strong as ever. But Elsie never borrowed it again.—Florence Hallowell Hoyt, in the Standard.

A BRAVE MOUSE.

I met a little mouse on my travels the other day that interested me. He was on his travels also, and we met in the middle of a mountain lake. I was casting my fly there, when I saw just sketched or etched upon the glassy surface a delicate V-shaped figure, the point of which reached above the middle of the lake, while the two sides as they diverged faded out toward the shore. I saw the point of this V was being slowly pushed toward the opposite shore. I drew near in my boat, and beheld a little mouse swimming vigorously for the opposite shore. His little legs appeared like swiftly revolving wheels beneath him. As I came near, he dived under the water to escape me, but came up again like a cork, and just as quickly. It was laughable to see him repeatedly duck beneath the surface and pop back again in a twinkling. He could not keep under water more than a second or two. Presently I reached him my oar, when he ran up it and into the palm of my hand, where he sat for some time and arranged his fur and warmed himself. He did not show the slightest fear. It was probably the first time he had ever shaken hands with a human being. He was what we call a meadow mouse; but he had doubtless lived all his life in the woods, and was strangely unsophisticated. How his little round eyes did shine, and how he sniffed me to find out if I was more dangerous than I appeared to his sight!

After a while I put him down in the bottom of the boat, and resumed my fishing. But it was not long before he became very restless, and evidently wanted to go about his business. He would climb up to the edge of the boat, and peer down into the water. Finally, he could brook the delay no longer, and plunged boldly overboard; but he had either changed his mind or lost his reckoning, for he started back in the direction he had come, and the last I saw of him he was a mere speck vanishing in the shadows near the other shore.—From Little Nature Studies.

HE TRUSTED THE BOY.

Bishop Clark of Rhode Island recalls a story connected with Bishop Wilmer's visit to Boston in attendance upon the General Convention.

One morning he stepped into a shop in Washington Street, and made a few purchases. Some part of the goods could not be delivered at the moment, it appears; and the purchaser was to call for the bundle in the afternoon. He was on his way to do so, but, while crossing the Common, met a boy whose looks he fancied; and suddenly it occurred to him that he might save his steps.

"Are you a good boy?" asked the bishop, stopping the boy.

The boy was taken aback. He hesitated, and then answered, "No."

"What do you do that is bad?"

The boy seemed unable to define his shortcomings.

"Are you honest?"

The boy thought he was, on the whole.

"Well, then," said Bishop Wilmer, "I am going to trust you with ten dollars to pay a bill for me in Washington Street."

With that he gave him the name of the firm and the number of the shop, and added,—

"Bring the receipted bill and the bundle to the Brunswick Hotel as soon as you can, and here is half a dollar to pay you for your trouble."

The boy trotted away on his errand; and the bishop returned to his hotel, where he told his friends what he had done. They assured him, of course, that he had made a great mistake, and would never see either money or bundle.

In due time, nevertheless, the boy arrived at the hotel with the receipted bill, which, on looking at it, the bishop found to be for ten dollars and a half instead of ten dollars, as he had thought.

"How did you manage it?" he asked the boy. "I gave you only ten dollars."

"Oh, I took the half-dollar you gave me for doing the errand. I thought I could trust you as much as that."

The bishop was much pleased, of course, and told the story at a public meeting in Providence a few days afterward.—Youth's Companion.

A MONKEY'S CAPRICES.

The last of the famous group of pets which Frank Buckland collected at his house died a few months ago. It was the monkey, Tiny the second, of the species Cercopithecus mona. She was a beautiful and graceful creature, covered with a thick coat of handsomely shaded hair, and had been under Mrs. Buckland's care seventeen years and a half. She had the lifelong reputation of being exceedingly mischievous, and was an accomplished thief. She led a gray parrot, which had been an inhabitant of the house for twenty-five years, a terrible life; and, when she was let out of her cage, she played havoc with her master's papers and manuscripts. She would dash about the room, make a clean sweep of the table, and fill her pouches with anything that appeared especially nice. Her two later companions were a gray parrot and a thoroughbred dachshund, Olga. Every morning Tiny and the dog had a game of romps that invariably ended in the discomfiture of Olga. The dog would run round the monkey's cage, barking loudly; Tiny, inside the wires, would run round also, and, when opportunity occurred, would seize the dog's ears and keep pulling at them till Olga released herself. Notwithstanding these little disagreements, the dachshund appeared to miss Tiny, and went about the house as if seeking her. The parrot, too, seemed to regret the loss of the monkey, and efforts were made to cheer her drooping spirits, if possible.—Popular Science Monthly.

One of the most remarkable churches is to be found at Freudenthal, in the Black Forest. It is built on such a plan that the men are unable to see the women, and vice versa; for it is composed of two wings which meet at an angle where the pulpit stands. The right wing is allotted to men, and the left one to women of the congregation.

To Inherit

* Disease

is not absolutely necessary. Children of sickly parents are not always born with disease germs in their systems. They are simply fit subjects, in whom such microbes will best thrive when encountered later in life.

Bovinine

not only keeps the body toned up so that disease is kept at bay, but, being itself a germicide, dispels it where it already exists.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every library and reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 26. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,

50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

SAPOLIO

LIKE A GOOD TEMPER SHEDS A BRIGHTNESS EVERYWHERE.

AT THE WASHINGTON "ZOO."

A favorite amusement of the little bear was to go off to the end of his cage away from his mother, and then, rising on his hind feet, walk over to her, and, throwing his arms about her neck, hug her for all he was worth, and then begin to bite and scratch and pommel her.

This she would stand for a while; but, if he became too severe, the usual cuffing was given him, or else, if he was very bad, she would take him up in her mouth, and go and drop him in the large water tank at one end of the cage, the edge of which was on a level with the floor. This great tank was two feet deep, and even when there was no water in it it was wet and slimy; and the little bear did not like it.

Sometimes he was thrown in when the tank was half full of water, and was left to gasp and choke several minutes before the old bear would reach in, and, grabbing him by leg, foot, back, or head, whichever one came uppermost, pull him out and drop him on the floor to dry. The last time I saw him he was very naughty indeed, and was several times doused in the water.

The last dip seemed to have been successful, for a very quiet little bear crept up to its mother's side by the edge of the tank. But, when the mother's head was turned, he leaped up and sprang at her in such a way as to make her lose her balance. There was a tremendous splash as the old bear slid over the side and under the water.

The little bear's ears stood straight up, and he looked the very imp of mischief as he saw his mother disappear. His expression changed, however, when the old bear's head came above water again. There was a look in her face that made him think that it would be well to retire.

With ears laid flat back, he sped for the small covered room opening off back of the cage, and retired to the darkest corner, where he crouched down and pretended to go to sleep. Mrs. Bear slowly climbed out of the tank, then tramped across the cage to the room in the rear, and, blocking up the entrance with her body, leaned forward and administered several resounding thumps to the little black bundle in the corner. The little bear was on his good behavior after that for twenty minutes.—Congregation-alist.

Education.

It is said that there are over one hundred thousand children in the State of Pennsylvania who are receiving no education.

Mrs. Harriet C. Porter, of Waterford, Conn., has given $6,000 to Union College as a fund to aid worthy graduates of the college who shall take up the study of law. The bequest is made in memory of Mrs. Porter's husband, the late J. K. Porter, who was a member of the class of '57.

The class in Practical Morals connected with the Massachusetts Reformatory listened in June to a series of lectures, delivered mainly by Mr. G. O. Virtue, on such subjects as "The Right to Labor," "Social Ideals," "Democracy," etc. At their close a list of examination questions was used to test the knowledge and judgment of the class on the subjects discussed.

The College for Women of Western Reserve University was the first women's college in this country to be established as an integral part of a university. It represents neither separate education nor coeducation. It represents what may be called the co-ordinate system, which embraces, it is believed, what is excellent of the separate and the coeducational systems, and eliminates the undesirable features of both.

The French Archæological School in Athens is to celebrate its jubilee in March, 1896. The institute was founded in 1847, which would make the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary come a year later than it is decided for. The reason for this is that the much talked of Olympian games are to take place in Athens during April and March, 1896; and the directors of the school thought it advisable to hold their celebrations at a time when the city was full of visitors.

A kindergarten settlement, similar to the plan of the college settlements, is proposed for Boston, and will, in all probability, be opened in the autumn. It will be called the Elizabeth Peabody House. The plan is to lease or buy a suitable dwelling, in some quarter of the city where the population is crowded, have a group of eight or ten kindergartners, normal students, and teachers in residence. The undertaking is to be a memorial to Elizabeth Peabody, to whose efforts the growth of kindergartening is largely due. The settlement will be supported by the Elizabeth Peabody House Association.

A noted thinker said that character was not what we saw in action in a man, but what we saw in reserve for great emergencies. To say that a teacher should have self-control and self-possession, in the narrow sense of the words, is cant. To say the same, with the broader meaning of being able to concentrate the whole mind upon a given point and hold it there, to bring up for use all the knowledge he has acquired, is to utter a truth of supreme value. Such a character makes his pupils thinkers.

The Old South Prizes, that have done much to foster the increased interest in American history for the last fourteen years, are offered again in competition to all who have graduated from the Boston High Schools (including the Latin Schools) in 1894 and 1895.

Forty dollars will be awarded for the best essay on each of the subjects named below, and twenty-five dollars for the second best, —making in all four prizes. Competitors may write on both subjects if they wish, but no one can receive more than one prize.

The essays must be sent between Jan. 1 and 31, 1896, to the Committee on Old South Prizes, Old South Meeting-house. It is recommended that they be written on quarto letter paper, and that no essay exceed in length fifteen pages of the North American Review. Each essay must bear an assumed name, and must be accompanied by a sealed letter, having the assumed name outside and the real name of the writer within, together with the date of graduation and the name of the High School at which the pupil graduated.

The judges will give some weight to the literary merit of the essays, but will chiefly consider the amount of historical knowledge and thought displayed. They will reserve the right to withhold any or all of the prizes in case essays of sufficient merit are not offered.

The subjects this year are:—

- I. New England Politics as affected by the changes in England from 1629 to 1692, the dates of the two Massachusetts charters.
- II. The Character of Cromwell as viewed by his contemporaries. Consider especially the tributes of Milton and Marvell.

Charities and Reforms.

The outing trips which have been given to poor women and children by the Salvation Army workers have been very beneficial to the recipients. In five trips they have taken 2,834 persons, who have enjoyed an outing of several hours at Nantasket, Winthrop, or other of the beaches in the vicinity. They have taken those children not connected with Sunday-schools or institutions, which are otherwise provided for. The cost is a little less than ten cents a head. Unfortunately, this work must now come to an end if funds are not provided for its continuance. The treasurer is Frank P. Luce, care C. H. Robbs & Co., 1 Dock Square.

The Hartford School of Sociology is about to enter upon its second year. The first curriculum has been successfully completed. The development of the practical side has been effected not only by field work, study of institutions, and investigation of local problems, but by the organization of a Sociological Club, which is divided into sections for special research. A Social Settlement has been established under its superintendence. The objects of this club are: I., Promotion of the study of Sociology; II., The practical development of Sociology in Hartford; III., Assistance to sociological organizations already existing; IV., Institutional movements; V., Municipal progress; VI., Federation of sociological organizations. A substantial library of Sociology has been founded, and a reading-room is well furnished with the periodical literature of this science.

Brilliancy, not the ordinary brightness, but a brilliancy equal to the silver-smith's finish, that's the work will do without wearing or scratching. Others claim to do it, we'll prove it.

SILVER
ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH

ELECTRO-SILICON is unlike any other silver polish. Send for trial quantity or box postpaid, 15 cts. It's sold everywhere.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

PRATT INSTITUTE, Brooklyn, N.Y.

NORMAL, professional, and special training in the various branches of Applied Art, Literature, Science, and Mechanics, and carried on under the following departments: Fine Arts, Domestic Art, Domestic Science, Science and Technology, Kindergarten, Library, and Museum. The Manual Training High School offers a Four Years' Course for both sexes, in preparation for College or for the advanced work of the other departments.
FREDERIC B. PRATT, Secretary.

Spiritual Life.

Afterglow. By FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY. 81 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

There are few who, reading it, will not be strongly attracted to this little book. It is written out of life,—out of the struggling, perplexing, troublous, hopeful, aspiring life we all know and dread and delight in. And grow in. And this is how the book is to help us.

CONTENTS: I. Voices out of the Silence; II. They had all Things Common; III. Spiritual Awakening; IV. "The Star! The Star!"

"Afterglow," like Gannett's "Wrestling and Blessing," is a book which one would like to keep in stock, to be given to the stricken, the troubled, the perplexed, the struggling, and the discouraged."—Christian Register.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMAN-DIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS M. HOBENOCKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Books of Value.

The New Bible and its New Uses. By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER. 286 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction: The New Bible; I. Errors in the Bible; II. What the Bible claims for itself; III. The Bible as Authority; Appendix, Contradictions in the Gospels.

Multitudes of people to-day, both outside and inside the churches, are aware that the New Criticism, arisen in our age, has revealed a New Bible; and what they want to know, and in the simplest, most straightforward way, is this: What changes in our attitude toward the Bible are involved; and what new and wiser uses of it are made possible and necessary by these discoveries? Mr. Crooker's present work succinctly answers this query.

Modern Ideas of the Birth of Jesus. By HENRY A. MILES, D.D. (Second Edition.) 212 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

It is the purpose of this book to show that the common interpretation of the birth of Jesus were unknown in the primitive Church; were never appealed to by Jesus as proofs of his divine mission; are not once named in the Acts of the Apostles; are not alluded to either in the Epistles or in other Christian writings of the first century and a half; but that they originated in the theological speculations of the Alexandrian mystics, etc., etc.

Phillips Brooks in Boston. Five Years' Editorial Estimates. By M. C. AYRES, Editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser. With an Introduction by Rev. W. J. TUCKER, D.D., President of Dartmouth College. 120 pages. Cloth, 50 cents.

"One of the most valuable of monographs upon the late Bishop Phillips Brooks. No editorial pen in Boston has done such discriminating and appreciative work along religious, ethical, and literary lines as that of Mr. Ayres in the Advertiser. The publisher has done well to gather these five years' estimates."—Journal of Education.

Vexed Questions in Theology. A Series of Essays. By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. 250 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

The remarkable faculty possessed by James Freeman Clarke for presenting difficult problems in a simple way—clearing away all non-essentials, and having the heart of the subject stand out vividly and helpfully—is nowhere better seen than in the present volume. For any earnest seeker after the more reasonable thought of God, duty, life, religion, the book has very much of help.

Gems of the Orient. Selections from Eastern Wit and Wisdom. By Rev. C. D. B. MILLS. 238 pages. Cloth, full gilt, $1.50.

"The choicest gems of thought and expression from the literatures of the ages; the really fresh and living utterances of truth and the law of excellence, scattered along the different centuries of human history." "Full of invigorating and uplifting power."

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

IMPORTANT WORKS BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE

The Peak in Darien: With Some Other Inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and Body. An Octave of Essays. 266 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"Vigorous in thought and style. We have read the volume through from preface to 'the end,' and enjoyed it."—Watchman.

Darwinism in Morals, and Other Essays. 422 pages. Cloth, $2.00.

Some of the chapters: Darwinism in Morals; Hereditary Piety; The Religion of Childhood; Prehistoric Religion; The Religions of the World; The Religions of the East; The Religion and Literature of India; Unconscious Cerebration; Dreams; The Evolution of Morals and Religion.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"The profoundest, wisest, purest, noblest book in principle, aim, and tone yet written upon the true position of woman in society."

The Scientific Spirit of the Age, and Other Pleas and Discussions. 243 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Religious Duty. 311 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

A Faithless World. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

17. THE MORAL AND RELIGIOUS ASPECTS OF HERBERT SPENCER'S PHILOSOPHY: The relation of religion to morality. By SYLVAN DREY.

18. THE RELATIVITY OF KNOWLEDGE: The nature of sense-perception; sight, sound, taste, smell, feeling; the doctrine of the Unknowable. By ROBERT G. ECCLES, M.D.

19. A STUDY OF MATTER AND MOTION: An excellent digest of a much vexed question, with quotations from many authorities. By Hon. A. N. ADAMS.

20. PRIMITIVE MAN: Pliocene, paleolithic and neolithic races; the ages of bronze and iron, cave-men and lake-dwellers; mound builders; primitive tools. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.

21. GROWTH OF THE MARRIAGE RELATION: Its earlier forms; polygamy; polyandry; marriage by capture; monogamy; divorce and divorce laws. By C. STANILAND WAKE.

22. EVOLUTION OF THE STATE: The growth of political institutions; family tribe, clan, city; the State's final form. By JOHN A. TAYLOR.

23. EVOLUTION OF LAW: How law begins; statute law and judge-made law; the conversion of customs into law. By PROF. RUFUS SHELDON.

24. EVOLUTION OF MEDICAL SCIENCE: Supernatural ideas of disease; the beginnings of medical science; modern sanitary science. By ROBERT G. ECCLES, M.D.

25. EVOLUTION OF ARMS AND ARMOR: The struggle for existence; Nature's methods; individualism and co-operation; final universal peace. By JOHN C. KIMBALL.

26. EVOLUTION OF THE MECHANIC ARTS: Development of the human hand; earliest use of implements and tools; inventions; the laboring classes. By JAMES A. SKILTON.

27. EVOLUTION OF THE WAGES SYSTEM. The definition of wages; economic characteristics of the wages system; wages the outgrowth of slavery; development of the system. By PROF. GEORGE GUNTON.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1885, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

Single copy, 2 cts.; per hundred, 50 cts.

Address Christian Register Association, 141 Franklin Street, Boston.

THE QUEEN'S DONKEY.

Queen Victoria, during her recent sojourn at Cimiez, on the French Mediterranean coast, was often seen to drive, on pleasant afternoons, a very sleek and comfortable-looking donkey. The aged queen, holding the reins herself, seemed greatly to enjoy her drive, and the complacency of the donkey suggested that he almost understood the honor which was being done him. This donkey, whose name is Jocko, has an interesting history.

During a previous sojourn in the same district the queen was one morning enjoying herself incognito, in the open air at Acquisgrana, when she saw a peasant leading along by the bit a donkey which looked as if he had once been a fine animal of his kind, but now seemed to be almost starved. He was lean, languishing, evidently suffering.

The queen asked the man if his donkey was for sale.

"That depends, signora," said the man. "If I were to sell him, now, how should I get my living?"

"How much did you pay for him?"

"A hundred francs."

"I will give you two hundred, and you can buy another donkey."

The man sold him to the unknown "signora," and poor Jocko at once began a new life. Abundantly fed and carefully groomed, he blossomed out as a royal favorite. The story spread, and the queen could take no more promenades with convenience; for she was certain to encounter every day several peasants who tried to sell her decrepit and half-starved donkeys. She bought none of them.

During her late visit the queen drove through Acquisgrana with Jocko; and his former owner, the peasant, saw the equipage go by. The donkey was fat, glossy, and glittering with buckles of silver and gold.

"Alas!" exclaimed the peasant. "When I sold my donkey, why didn't I throw myself in?"—Youth's Companion.

A CONSCIENTIOUS DOG.

I have a little silver-mounted Malacca cane that I sometimes carry when walking out with the dogs. This stick Smith (Dachshund) is never allowed to carry, as his teeth would leave too many traces behind; and his most eloquent pleadings to have it "just once" are always met with a steady denial. One day I had accidentally left this cane lying upon the lawn, and I saw from an upper window a struggle of Smith's conscience over his wishes that really did him the greatest credit.

As he was playing about the lawn by himself, he suddenly came unawares upon this long-coveted treasure. He stopped and stared at it eagerly, and then looked carefully round him. I was hidden behind the window curtain, and there was no one in sight. Then began the battle with himself. He looked at the stick. He smelled it carefully all the way along. He drew back a little to gaze at it, licking his lips in delighted anticipation. Then he approached it and smelled it once more; and it seemed just as if he must take it and pull it to pieces, as he loves to do. But all of a sudden his better nature came to his aid. He turned his back upon temptation, and sat down with his head the other way, guarding the treasure till his mistress should claim it, but not touching himself what he knew he was not allowed to have.—The Quiver.

Here and There.

No tree has yet been measured taller than the great eucalyptus in Gippsland, Australia, four hundred and fifty feet high.

Elbert, the centre of the French woollen manufacture, is so well off that it has abolished nearly all its town taxes, and now petitions the government for leave to do away with the octroi, the duty on provisions entering the town.

Clay suitable for paving brick has recently been discovered near Minneapolis, and the discovery is likely to have an important bearing upon public paving in the twin cities of Minnesota. Hitherto paving brick was to be had only by paying a high freight rate for a long haul.

The gigantic California trees are the protected wards of the nation. At the headwaters of the San Antonio River is the group of two hundred, of which ninety are of the largest size, thirty feet in diameter near the base, and towering far up into the skies four hundred feet.

The blue jay is proving a decided pest in California by eating the eggs of other birds, particularly quail and game birds. So the Olympia Club of San Francisco has appointed a Saint Bartholomew's day on which every one who can buy or beg or borrow a shot-gun is to join in the slaughter.

Among the curiosities of tropical plants are the pearls found occasionally in the cocoanut palm of the Philippine Islands,—pearls which, like those of the ocean, are composed of carbonate of lime. The bamboo, too, yields another precious product in the shape of true opals which are found in its joints.

Canada has a forest in the Hudson Bay and Labrador region 1,000 by 1,700 miles in extent, while that of the Amazon basin is calculated to be about 2,100 by 1,300 miles. Central Africa has a forest region of 3,000 miles from north to south, of an unknown depth; and the vast pine, larch, and cedar forests of Siberia are 3,000 miles from east to west and 1,000 miles from north to south. The natives call them "places where the mind is lost."

The United States Agricultural Department has decided that the peanut is not a nut, and that its native home is Brazil. In the South, where it grows, it is known as the goober pea, the earth-nut, and goober. The part we eat is the seed, and the shell is a pod. If you carefully separate the parts, you will find in the seed, as in the pea and the bean, the little shoot folded away ready to sprout if the seed is planted.—The Outlook.

Science.

The new bridge that spans Chicago River at Van Buren Street is wholly dependent on electric power for operation, being equipped with 200 horse-power in motors.

The Association of State Weather Service, of which Major H. H. C. Dunwoody is president, has reconsidered its intention of meeting in Springfield in September, and will meet in Indianapolis in October.

A plan is on foot in Buffalo, N.Y., to erect a bridge across the Niagara River, and beneath it to place a series of undershot water-wheels which would be used to drive dynamos to furnish light and power to the city.

An exhibition is open this month in London of Egyptian antiquities discovered by Professor Flinders Petrie. The main feature of the display is a series of objects illustrating the new race who overthrew the first Egyptian civilization.

It is stated that Dr. Bertillon, inventor of the famous Parisian method of identifying criminals by exact measurement, has discovered a new method for identifying handwriting by enlarging the letters by photography, and measuring the alterations due to beating of the pulse.

The air-tight compartment theory of building ships was copied from a provision of nature shown in the case of the nautilus. The shell of this animal has forty or fifty compartments into which air or water may be admitted to allow the occupant to sink or float as he pleases.

Roots draw enormous quantities of moisture from the soil, and by this means it is discharged into the atmosphere. For example, the common sunflower was found to exhale twelve ounces of water in twelve hours; and an oak-tree with an estimated number of 700,000 leaves would in the same way give off something like 700 tons of water during the five months it carries its foliage.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,
The Largest Manufacturers of
PURE, HIGH GRADE
COCOA and CHOCOLATES
On this Continent, have received
HIGHEST AWARDS
from the great
Industrial and Food
EXPOSITIONS
IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.
Caution: In view of the many imitations of the labels and wrappers on our goods, consumers should make sure that our place of manufacture, namely, Dorchester, Mass. is printed on each package.
SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.
WALTER BAKER & CO. LTD. DORCHESTER, MASS.

GLENWOOD RANGES AND HEATERS
MAKE HOUSEKEEPING
EASY.
TWO GOLD MEDALS.
Made by WEIR STOVE CO., Taunton, Mass.

Mozoomdar's BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.
An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.
Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.
The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by
GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Important Works.

Members of One Body. Six Sermons by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS. 132 pages. Cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.
CONTENTS: I. Roman Catholicism; II. Calvinism; III. Methodism; IV. Rationalism; V. Mysticism; VI. The Unity of Christendom.
In the whole list of Liberal Religious books, past and present, it would be hard to find any series of utterances freer with the true freedom—more ingenuous, more appreciative, more prophetic of the unity that is to be, more religiously "satisfying"—than Mr. Crothers gives us in these six discourses. The outline alone, which each chapter contains, of the stronger, more helpful points in the various schemes of religious thought and life discussed, renders the book invaluable.

The Evolution of Christianity. By M. J. SAVAGE. 178 pages. Cloth, $1.00.
CONTENTS: Old World Religion; Judaism and its Hopes; Conditions when Christianity was born; Jesus and What he attempted; The Influence of the Christ Idea; The First Church and Paul; The Problem of the Trinity; The Church of Rome; Growth away from Jesus; The Protestant Revolution; Science and the Church; Free Christianity.
"One would seek in vain for a more enlightened application of the scientific method to the history of religion; and one can believe that, if close reasoning and rational faith could convert, Mr. Savage's words might bear a message to those who are without the churches and within. One reads with pleasure and confidence and hopefulness, and finds the end come all too quickly."—Boston Times.

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By Rev. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.
CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Usages and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.
Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

Seeing and Being, and Other Sermons. By JOHN W. CHADWICK. 234 pages. Cloth, $1.00.
CONTENTS: Great Hopes for Great Souls; "A Mere Man"; The Constructive Achievements of the Higher Criticism; Tempted of God; The Price of Moral Freedom; Orthodoxy, what is it? Morality and Religion; The Conversion of Energy; Two Meanings of Religion; The Undiscovered Country; Samuel Longfellow; The Old, Old Story; The Fulness of Time; The Unbridled Tongue; Immortality; Seeing and Being.

Kindling Thoughts. By ELIZABETH P. CHANNING. 315 pages. Cloth, $1.25.
Contains fifty-seven brief essays, such as Dev upon the heart; The angel in the shadow; A disappointed life; Plain living and high thinking; The spiritual tangle; The charm of the old; Accepting ourselves as we are; etc., etc.
It is a long time since anything so brightly refreshing as these Kindling Thoughts has come to us. . . . They are full of that best cheer which comes from the deepest, clearest springs of faith.—Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by
GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR AUGUST.

The Gift of a Day. Rev. Charles E. St. John.
Adaptation. Hattie Tyng Griswold.
Spencer's Ethics. Frederic W. Sanders.
A Confessional. II. Ursula Tannenfort.
Vanity and its Cure.
Along the Way. Rachel B. MacMullin.
Col. Ingersoll's Latest Views about the Bible. I. Howard MacQuerey.
Causes of the Reformation. S. Fletcher Williams.
To G. L. C. W. I. L.
Intuition. G. B. Stebbins.
As Others see us.
A Suggested Doxology.
Congregational Installation.
Unitarianism in Transylvania. Joseph Ferencz.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; Guilds;
Temperance Work, C. R. Elliot; Literary Notes.
Children's Corner.
NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*.*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
- No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
- No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
- No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Pleasantries.

She: "Tell me, when you were in the army, were you cool in the hour of danger?"
He: "Cool? I actually shivered."—Exchange.

"Well, Johnnie," said a doting uncle to his little nephew, who had been fishing all day, "did you catch a good many fish?"
"No, unc'e; but I drowned a good many worms."—Tit-Bits.

The eye of little Elsie was attracted by the sparkle of the dew at early morning. "Mamma," she exclaimed, "it's hotter'n I thought it was. Look here, the grass is all covered with perspiration."—The Evangelist.

The member for North-South Blankshire: "Gentlemen, you twit me with having turned my coat. Years ago I supported this measure. Then I had a reason. But now, gentlemen, I have lost my reason!" And he wondered at the deafening smile that pervaded the meeting.—Fun.

Last Christmas eve Mr. J. went upstairs to see if the children had hung up their stockings for Santa Claus, and found that little Fred had pinned his up in a prominent place with a slip of paper attached, containing this suggestive sentence: "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver."—Exchange.

An invitation to dinner in Japan commences as follows: "I beg pardon for thus insulting you by requesting your company at my house to dinner. The house is small and very dirty. Our habits are rude, and you may not get anything fit to eat; and yet I hope you will condescend to be present with us at six o'clock."—Exchange.

Mr. Blue Island: "Pardon me, but do you know which of those mills is Brown's?"
Miss Hub (with an impulsive shudder): "Sir! Do I look like a woman born and reared in Chicago? I am a stranger here. I'm from Boston." Mr. B. I.: "Oh, well, that's all right. I didn't know but you might know a little something, for all that."—The Satchel.

I overheard a comic opinion pronounced by a 'bus-driver. "It's this way," he said. "Wot 'ud wimen do with a vote if they 'ad it? They're that contrary. Why, if I says to my old woman, 'Give me tripe and onions for dinner,' does I get it? No! I gets beef and greens!" With which convincing argument he settled the matter to his entire satisfaction.—Exchange.

Here is a sample of American humor which might any day be paralleled, for the same incident might happen over and over among people born with a funny bone. Two men met in the country road, perhaps on the way to and from market. "How are you, old Ben Russell?" called one. "Come, now," said the other, "I'll bet you I ain't any older'n you! Tell me what's the earliest recollection you can put your finger on." "Well," said the other, thinking a moment intently, "the very first thing I can remember is hearing people say when you went by, 'There goes old Ben Russell!'"—The Interior.

HER NAMESAKE.

It is related that an enthusiastic admirer of Fanny Kemble, whose full name was Frances Anne, once decided to name a little daughter for that distinguished lady. Unfortunately, she disliked the name of Frances only a little less than that of Anne; while Fanny struck her as too undignified to replace the fuller form. After much thought the child was named, and named, her mother declared, for the person she had originally desired to honor in that way. But the baby was christened Franciola Annetta, and it is at least doubtful if Mrs. Kemble would have recognized her namesake.

A much funnier, and entirely authentic, case was that of the little black baby in Washington which the mother, a respectable colored woman, asked leave to name for Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford. Mrs. Spofford cheerfully granted the permission; but when, some weeks later, she went to call on the infant, she was greatly surprised to hear it addressed by its fond parent as Genevieve. "Why, how is this?" she asked. "I thought the baby was to be named Harriet for me?"

Mrs. Spofford's friends, as it chanced, had often remarked that her Christian name was not suited to her, it was too chilly, too prim, too conventional a name. Therefore, her amusement was all the greater when the smiling mother replied at once, a trifle apologetic, yet quite confident the correctness of her course would be manifest on consideration.—

"Oh, yes, Mis' Poffit; but then Genevieve 'spresses you a great sight better'n Ha'yit does!"—Youth's Companion.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.
POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....	$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....	22,217,399.94
	$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has indorsed thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.
50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building.
BEACON STREET, BOSTON,
EUROPEAN PLAN,
J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM

DANVILLE,
New York

Established in 1858.

A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P.O. Box 1873.

The merits of the Palmer Woven Patent Hammocks have never been equalled. Their superiority of material, construction, and design has made them the standard since first introduced. While there is a continual effort by imitators and infringers to produce something similar, it has all been without success, and the "Palmer Patent Hammocks" still stand pre-eminently superior to any of the imitations. They are produced in larger quantities and infinitely more varieties than the combined production of all others.

Before purchasing, insist upon seeing the "Palmer Patent Hammocks." Remember, the name "Palmer" is a synonym for all that is best in Hammocks. If your dealer does not have them in stock, he can get them for you, but be sure that he does. I. E. Palmer, Middletown, Conn.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES
of Copper and Tin.
BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sell
CHURCH CARPETS
at manufacturers' prices.
John H. Pray, Sons & Co.,
Wholesale and Retail CARPETS and UPHOLSTERY,
658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston.
Correspondence Solicited.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

Chauncy-Hall School.

(Established in 1828.)

For Boys and Girls of all ages. Especial care for health and for individual needs. Thorough preparation for the Mass. Institute of Technology, for business and for college. Special students received into all regular classes. Chemistry and Physics are taught by laboratory work. Instruction is given in Sloyd. There is Military Drill for boys. Upper classes begin Sept. 18.

593 Boylston Street, Copley Square, Boston.

SCHOOL OF DOMESTIC SCIENCE AND CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

Courses for Teachers, Matrons, Home-makers, City Missionaries, Pastors' Assistants, Y. W. C. A. Secretaries, etc. Eighth year. Address for Circulars,

Miss L. L. SHERMAN, Principal
(Formerly Principal D. L. Moody's Training School),
52 Berkeley St., Boston, Mass. (B. Y. W. C. A.)

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.
SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address
E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE Springfield, Mass.
Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN McDUFFIE, Ph.D.

MISS KIMBALL'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS,
Worcester, Mass.
Thorough preparation for College. Intermediate, Academic, and Special Courses. Send for Illustrated Circular.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS
in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address
HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.
Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y.
MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.
Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address
JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

THE HIGHLAND MILITARY ACADEMY,
WORCESTER, MASS., begins 40th year September 11. Classical, Scientific, Business, Preparatory Departments. Gymnasium. Athletics encouraged. Careful training. Home influences.
JOSEPH ALDEN SHAW, A.M., Head Master.

Boston, 10 Ashburton Place.
BOSTON UNIVERSITY Law School.
Fall term opens Wednesday, October 2. For circulars address
EDMUND H. BENNETT, Dean.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL,
Framingham, Mass.
Entrance examinations WEDNESDAY, Sept. 11, 1895. For circulars address
ELLEN HYDE, Principal.

Rev. and Mrs. John A. Bellows'
BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS will begin its seventh year Sept. 18, 1895. Number of boarding pupils limited to eight. Address
91 DANFORTH STREET, PORTLAND, ME.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL
FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.
Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D.
REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

THE MORGAN SCHOOL, PORTSMOUTH, N.H. This Home and Day School for Girls will reopen September 25 for its second year under the new management. College, Preparatory, and Finishing Courses. Address for circular
Miss GEORGINA S. WOODBURY, Principal.

THE JACOTOT SCHOOL.
A French and English Boarding and Day School for Girls.
No 11 West 86 St., New York.
Adjacent to Central Park. Miss. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals. Circulars on application.

West Newton English and Classical School.
ALLEN BROTHERS.
Family School. Both Sexes. Unsectarian. Prepares for College, Scientific Schools, Business, and for a useful life. Forty-third year begins Wednesday, September 18. Catalogue of
ALLEN BROTHERS, WEST NEWTON, MASS.

Mr. HALE'S SCHOOL 86 BEACON ST., BOSTON.
The 13th year will begin September 25. Preparation for Harvard College and the Institute of Technology. Full Classical and Scientific Courses. Primary department for young boys nine or ten years of age. Fine situation, directly opposite the Public Garden. Large, sunny, high-studded rooms, open fireplaces, gymnasium, extensive laboratories, covered fire-escape, lunch-room. Teachers: ALBERT HALE (Harv.), E. D. MARSH (Harv.), E. K. STEVENS (Harv.), C. S. STREET, Amherst. Address
ALBERT HALE.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION
for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods; large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. R. W., Christian Register.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1895.

NUMBER 36.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; Eclectic Religion,	561
A Vision of Good Women,	562
MUSINGS,	562
BREVITIES,	562
PRO AND CON.
The Atlanta Exhibit; A Successful Free Church; Free Pews Again; Aid for Armenia; Church Closing; Spain and the Bible,	563
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Agnosticism with a Difference, by Rev. James M. Whiton, Ph.D.; International Prison Congress, II., by Rev. Samuel J. Barrows,	564
In Vagrant's Land, by Alice Gordon; A Nineteenth-century Prophet,	565
Dr. Hale as a Public Man: What the Boston Herald thinks of him; American Unitarian Association,	566
A Laplander's Dress,	567
An Army Chaplain,	569
Ellen M. Grant,	574
The Labors of Theodore Parker,	574
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	567
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	567
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	567
SERMON GLEANINGS.
Men of Clay and Men of Iron, by Rev. W. F. Place; Self-mastery, by Charles F. Thwing; Individuality, by Rev. J. A. Chase,	568
LITERATURE.
Rhodes's "History of the United States,"	569
Other Book Notices; School Books,	570
Miscellaneous; Magazines; Literary Notes; Books Received,	571
THE HOME.
Little Gitana, by L. J. Sanderson; A Pair of Shoes,	572
How Willie and I rode Pig-back; Dot's Adventure; An Electric Cup,	573
POETRY.
Summer, by Rev. Perry Marshall,	564
Meeting and Parting, by Rev. Henry G. Spaulding,	566
Alone with God, by Rev. Edward F. Hayward,	568
Like as a Father, by Mary Curtis Baird,	572
HERE AND THERE,	574
EDUCATION,	574
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	575
TEMPERANCE,	575
SCIENCE,	575
PLEASANTRIES,	576

Editorial.

ANNOUNCEMENT was made some weeks ago of the meeting of the National Unitarian Conference at Washington October 21-24, and we have already printed the first draft of the program. The officers of the Congress are now busily engaged in completing arrangements and details, and we shall soon have further announcements to make of special interest. We urge our readers to make early arrangements to attend the Conference. Apart from the special purpose of the gathering itself, Washington is one of the most beautiful cities in the United States; and October is a delightful month in which to visit it.

THE sultan, with the evasive diplomacy which is characteristically Oriental, put off a decision on the Armenian question until he should see what would be the attitude of the new English ministry. He now promises reforms, but declines to give the guarantees asked by the powers or to accept the scheme and methods proposed. Mr. Gladstone's speech at Chester ought to assure the sultan of the state of English sentiment on this matter, and it is to be hoped that the new ministry will not abate one jot of the demands which have been made. They were much more moderate than the sultan ought to have expected.

THE work of Unitarianism has been exerted in four directions. First, in showing the true simplicity of Christianity, in placing right emphasis upon its practical side, in bringing into the foreground the Sermon on the Mount, the Lord's Prayer, and the two great Commandments. Second, it has demanded the most fearless application of reason to the study of problems which reason has been found adequate to solve. It has encouraged the critical study of the Bible in the light of modern scholarship, and has welcomed every advance in the field of science. Third, it has stemmed the tide of materialism, and insisted that spiritual things should be spiritually discerned. And, fourth, it has aided in the application of enlightened principles and wise benevolence to the problems of poverty, crime, and education.

THE rage for inflation in these days takes various forms. One of its most useful applications is made when the bicyclist pumps air into his rubber tire, and the invention has also been applied to carriage wheels. It helps to make the road smoother. And now we are told of an invention by which some stimulating gas is pumped into a man or horse to make him more buoyant. The invention is to be applied to athletes, so that the bicyclist will have to inflate himself as well as his wheel, and the jockey his horse as well as his sulkey. Undoubtedly there are some things that will improve by aeration. A balloon is not worth much unless it is inflated. But the application of inflation methods to the currency, to politics, to oratory, and to business, may lead to disastrous results. The bubble may look pretty while it is floating; but, when it is burst, we may be surprised that there is so little of it left.

"SALVATION by phraseology," that is what we may call the use which is made of certain words and phrases, which are advertised as if they had a salvatory power. There is no difficulty in securing a certificate of Orthodoxy, if one will simply use orthodox phraseology. Many of these phrases have lost their original meaning or are not true in the sense in which they are uttered. They are the mould of earlier thought, which does not fit conceptions of our day. Much ingenuity has been exercised in trying to revive and rekindle these silicified concretions, but they will not kindle. They furnish no real fuel for the altar of religion. Salvation by phraseology has long been the loud voice of the revivalist; but in the quieter halls of the theological seminaries one is often compelled to ask whether the work of phrase-building and phrase-fitting which is carried on is not much like the work of children who play with alphabetical blocks, who are not dealing really with the objects they spell, and whose combinations sometimes result in words without meaning.

THERE are mysteries which are real, and there are those which are artificial. Everything beyond the range of our exact knowledge presents some aspect of mystery. We cannot go far in any branch of science without coming to the background of the unknowable. Mystery may develop either awe or curiosity. This susceptibility of the human mind has led to the manufacture of mysteries as a means of acquiring power and influence. The juggler adopts it as a business. It is his art to mystify his audience. His ingenuity and skill elude the senses. The more elusive he is, the more does he appeal to the curiosity of those who witness his performances. His patrons go not because they believe in the reality of what he does, but because they want to see how it is done. Curiosity is not confined to the female sex. It was probably just as strong in Adam as in Eve. The juggler is not the only man who thrives on it. A prominent knight templar freely confessed recently that Freemasonry could not afford to give up the appeal to human curiosity which it made by the element of secrecy. It was represented that Masonry might do just as much good in the way of philanthropy, and might do a much broader and better work, if its ritual and ceremonies have in them any stimulating power, by exhibiting them in the light as well as in the darkness. But the knight confessed that few would join if they could find out wholly what Masonry meant without entering the organization, and we have no doubt this is true. This is a weakness of Freemasonry; but its strength lies in this weakness, and the same is true of various other secret societies. Such a mystery is, of course, purely artificial. It is something which does not belong to the subject, but which is really thrown around it. It is not a natural fog in the landscape, but a smudge or a forest fire which some one has kindled, and which would better be put out. To create artificial mystery is simply, like the puzzle-makers, to challenge curiosity or to becloud the atmosphere with smoke and mist.

IN the realm of religion we find also those who trade in the mysterious, and a good many of their wares are altogether artificial. When a man looks out toward the universe, there are mysteries which challenge his reason or his faith. They may grow out of the limitations of his knowledge and his faculties. But there are mysteries which are man-made; and priests have thrived on these artificial mysteries, just as the juggler thrives on his art. Simon, the magician, who amazed the people of Samaria with his sorceries, was not the first or last to manufacture mysteries for the sake of beguiling credulous people by his arts; and he supposed the apostles were engaged in the same sort of business. One who can delude the senses is often able to delude the reason. The supposition that there is some mysterious power in priestly incantation in a piece of wood supposed to be taken from the cross, in the bone of a saint, the coat of a martyr, has secured and still holds the reverence of thousands of people. But all this has not the slightest relation whatever to religion as such, is in no way necessary to its existence, but rather a hindrance to it.

THE magicians and mystery-makers, in spite of the light of our own age, are as busy to-day as ever. They not only perform their miracles in the old churches to delude the ignorant, but they delude the educated and intelligent. There is a psychological realm which investigation has only dimly lighted. The uncertainty of our knowledge here is taken advantage of by deceivers and mountebanks. This deception and fraud is carried on under the name of Spiritualism, many of whose followers are so fond of being humbugged that they prefer to pay their money to these impostors than to pay it for the scientific investigation of psychical phenomena; and so a room full of people will sit and watch the manifestation of make-believe ghosts in a dark room, who talk gibberish and make grotesque and disgusting impersonations of departed friends, and pay from two dollars to five dollars a night for such manifestations, when a fourth-rate juggler would in a few minutes show how it is done, and get them up as many such performances as they wanted for fifty cents a night. Honest, earnest Spiritualists may mourn over this; but they are not able to prevent it.

THERE are mystery-makers in theology, and they have wrought a good deal of mischief. They have manufactured artificial incense, and waved it before make-believe gods. They have raised a smoke instead of a flame. They have introduced artificial doctrines, founded on false assumptions.

They have enveloped the simplest things with a tangle of verbiage and a cloud of metaphysics. Thus we have whole libraries of disquisition upon the mystery of the trinity and on the double nature of Christ, which are man-made mysteries, difficulties of thought which have grown out of limited or confused thinking and inexact knowledge. The religion of Jesus, on the other hand, was simple, beautiful, clear, trustful, ethical. He disliked to be taken as a wonder-worker or a magician, but he could not escape the tendency of his age and those which followed to throw an air of artificial mystery around the simplicity of his nature. He who was one of the most natural of men has been made an artificial being with a double nature, concerning which theologians have wrangled for centuries, whose mission has been supposed to save the world from hypothetical sin. It is easy enough to see historically why much of this has happened, but it is not easy to see why it should be perpetuated. The cry of "Back to Jesus" is the sign of a desire to find the real Jesus instead of the artificial one.

ECCLECTIC RELIGION.

The eclectic in religion is the man who chooses here and there what he likes. He is not governed by names, parties, or labels, by creedal bounds or traditions. The eclectic to-day has several thousand sects and religions to choose from. He may pick what he wants from this and that,—a piece of doctrine here, a bit of definition there, a form, a ceremony, a statement, a scrap of ritual, as he likes. There is no certainty, of course, that the eclectic in religion will always be guided by wise choice. Instead of taking the best, the richest, the deepest things in the religions which invite his choice, he may choose the superficial, the grotesque, the non-essential elements. The result may be an incongruous collection of particulars,—a kaleidoscopic medley of patterns, without depth or vitality.

Mormonism is an example of a curious eclecticism in religion. It is a mixture of Protestant freedom and hierarchical slavery, of patriarchal institutions of the Old Testament grafted upon nineteenth-century society. It has a pope of its own and a bible of its own and a doctrine of infallibility, while it believes, like the Quakers, to a certain extent in the "Inner Light." Its ceremonies are a curious mixture of traditions and inventions. But, in spite of its coat of many colors, it has succeeded in fitting it to the religious sentiment so as to develop a good deal of power.

Eclecticism has certain disadvantages. The bigot is narrow: he cannot see the good in any other system but his own. His narrowness gives concentration of effort and interest, and that means strength. The evils of bigotry are terrible; but they carry, like weeds, a power of self-propagation, and have thus an advantage over the weakness of concession or the dilettanteism which often go with eclecticism. The eclectic may lack the inspiration and impulse which come from relation to some historic movement which flows in a definite channel. He may have, also, too many ingredients in his religion. It may be in religion what patent medicines are in therapeutics,—a mild concoction of innocent simples, or some drastic nostrum that creates more disease than it heals. There is no surety that the eclectic may not become himself a bigot when he has made up the ingredients of his religion and put his own label upon them.

But, making all allowance for the danger of eclecticism in religion, it may attain a virtue, a strength, and a richness, a breadth, and a power from the underlying elements which may enter into and inspire it. These are, most of all, freedom and catholicity. If the eclectic is free to reject, he is also free to accept. He may reject the evil and accept the good in the medley of sects about him. His freedom may help to secure for him that judicial frame of mind which accepts as easily as it condemns. Catholicity is the natural and noble fruit of a rational, just, and unperturbed freedom. It places us in sympathetic relation with the various religions and sects of the world, both past and present; and only when such sympathy is established is one prepared to recognize and accept the best elements in whatever is offered to his choice.

The eclectic who is really catholic may not find it necessary to reconstruct a new religion out of the peculiarities of those that exist. He may go deeper than external form, and may discover what is vastly more important,—the sympathy which underlies all religions. When he attains to this deeper conception and experience, he will be less troubled or attracted by superficial features. He may not give up his own form of faith, his own religious connection, because he may learn to see it in its historic proportion and relation to the other movements with which it is allied, any more than a pear may wish to become an apple or an apple a plum in the same orchard. He is content to bring forth fruit after his kind, and not to disparage the yield of some other tree. So, without leaving his own religious household, he may establish a vital sympathy with his religious neighbors. But, if his freedom and catholicity can make him at home where he is, they also make him at liberty to go elsewhere for his affiliations, if his sympathies draw him: he is as free to go as to stay.

The Unitarian Church is an historic one. It is a growth from the root of Christianity, like Episcopalianism, Methodism, Roman Catholicism, or any other branch. It is a faith which may be held narrowly or broadly and grandly. Its ideal is not realized unless it expands into true catholicism. It is free to adopt whatever it may need for its own life and nature, whatever methods it may need for its propagation. The best Christianity has always been eclectic. It has sometimes adopted the corruptions of other religions, but it has also adopted elements of their strength. Unitarians and other liberals in religion need not be afraid, then, of the reproach of eclecticism. When marked by rationalism, freedom, catholicity, it is a synonyme for liberality; and it is not inconsistent with profound, definite, and burning conviction.

There are liberal churches in which this principle is well illustrated. In their worship we may find the music of the Roman Catholic Church, hymns drawn from every sect in Protestantism, a prayer-book in which the aspiration of the old liturgies may blend with those that are new, the extemporaneous prayer of Congregationalism and the silent prayer of the Friends. It may be as liberal and catholic in its spirit as in its worship. It may cherish the faith in immortality which is the distinguishing feature of Spiritualism, without asking for materialistic demonstration. It may recognize the faith in spirit which marks Christian Science without its contempt for matter, surgery, and physiology.

The most liberal church is the most comprehensive, and comprehensiveness is not weakness. The great Mississippi, as it rolls to the Gulf, may bring with it the waters of a thousand streams; but they only add to its volume, as it joins the Gulf Stream in carrying warmth and life to the ocean.

A VISION OF GOOD WOMEN.

So much is said nowadays of the "new woman," we are led to ask who it is who represents to us the typical woman. What are the qualities which compose for us that dearest vision? Not those who are nominally, but really good. Nominal goodness may be a stale product, like soda water left uncorked. It is a negation or a sham. The typical good woman has been a stumbling-stone for hosts of novelists. She resists definition, like music or perfume. But we all know her, and her distinguishing trait is a positive quality. We know her by the way she touches our inward appreciation, renews our faith in human nature, and uplifts us when we feel ourselves about to sink in a sea of pessimism.

Who is the woman we would have bend over our sick-bed, and hold our hand in death? Who but the woman who makes up for us that dear image which Goethe calls the eternally womanly? Not the wise, not the witty, not the perfectly gowned, the learned, and instructed in all the arts of pleasing, but the woman who is transcendently good, whose virtue so transfuses her nature that all the other qualities are dissolved in the glow of clarified goodness. Generally, some three or four we have known make up this composite image, touch and mould and color it until it calmly takes its place at the top of our appreciation. It is the essence, the light, the loving presence that fills us with gentle but sufficing happiness. To know her near us is enough. The necessity of doing may be great; but the perfection of being thrills the whole nature, like musical vibrations.

The goodness of the good woman may not transcend the goodness of the good man; but it is different. It has a quality all its own. It is more frankly flavored with the heart, for the good woman is not afraid to let her heart speak. She grows unostentatiously, silently, into the likeness of divine tenderness, that cannot confine itself to husband or child, father or mother or friend, but must be diffusing itself throughout its sphere, pulsing almost unconsciously into a little world, to make it sounder and sweeter and more true and faithful. This type of woman may not be a speaker, a conversationalist, a maker of phrases, an entertainer. She is more often a poor woman who lives her religion, and is quiet and unemphatic about it because it is so profound. Silently, she fulfils the decree: "he who would be first among you let him be a servant." She may be old and plain, by no means eloquent. But, when the time of need comes, she quietly shows her quality, steps into her right place, becomes an influence, a helper, a dependence,—in fact, a providence. Happy the childhood that has such a woman for its shelter, whose warm affection enwraps the germ of the young soul, nourishes it on simple, instinctive truth, brings forward the nature through no formal incubation of unreality, but by the nurture of the highest intuitions, ever making truth truer and virtue more virtuous and honesty more honest and bravery and fidelity fresh air for the lungs of the mind.

Such a mother sanctifies all she touches. Her children cannot wander beyond the gleam of her halo, nor lose the precious gift she has bestowed. If the new learning, the enlarged opportunity, the expanding life of woman, were to lower this vision of the good woman, so unique in her simple loyalty and devotion, these things might not find advocates among the wisest and best; but the top of all expansion, all education, must be spiritual insight and the perfected nature where character passes insensibly into influence. Society is swayed as much by the intuitional seers as by the instructed in formulas. The ennobled conscience works as subtly in the world as undercurrents and principles of growth. The mysterious and inexplicable part of life is that which tells most. All training must have for its aim the highest ideal. The conception that pauses on the lower slopes fails. Perfection of goodness comes not with the narrow, but with the enlarged view. The feminine principle, so precious for supplementing the male, raised to its height of perception, will enfold the vision of holiness that lived in those women who followed Jesus.

It has been the civilizer, the ennobler of human nature through all ages: woman's goodness from the first helped to conquer the defect of her weakness. Out of the good, pure woman as mother, the divine made manifest in the flesh, came the Madonna,—the tender type that stretches a human hand of pity to every bruised heart, and smooths the rugged path of repentance. Womanly sympathy formulated this picture of the one woman worthy to be the mother of a God, who has taken her abiding-place in churches and wayside shrines,—the woman courageous in death; for her faith created the Saint Catherines and Saint Ursulas. And, great as have been the abuses of saint-worship and Madonna-worship, the germ of this sentiment lies deep in human nature, is entwined with the fabric of society. Half-way up the mount of transfiguration, where God shows his face to the exalted nature, stands the humble woman shrine of the poor in spirit.

We all have our madonnas. We reverence them somewhere in the depths of our worldly hearts. They have kissed our bruises in infancy; they have wiped away our childish tears. They have shamed us by their patience and cheerfulness and loving endurance. They have taught us the great lessons of unselfishness and sacrifice. We rested in their arms as infants: we rest in the thought of their goodness all our lives. If they could endure bravely,—those tried and loving souls, who took so many vicarious sorrows into their breasts, besides bearing their own burdens,—cannot we bear ours without complaint?

Education, opportunity, will tend to enlarge this type, to relieve it of narrowness, to enlighten and make wiser and nobler. Head will instruct heart, and heart will infuse its lovingness into the conclusions of head. The good woman is an ineradicable type. All that goes to enlarge and strengthen woman's nature must burnish the lovely image and enlarge the sphere of her influence. This type of the good woman is perhaps too much overlooked in the present phase of our society, where brilliance and ambition sway the crowd. But it is an essential of the world. Beauty and wit and pleasure and intellect must lower their stars before this radiant-fronted one whose changeless star burns undimmed on the heights of humanity.

Musings.

I MET a gentleman on the street the other day who, after greeting me as a returned exile, inquired whether my notes and articles on foreign travel were to continue in these columns. I looked into his face to see whether this question showed any element of anxiety, but his smile was so ambiguous that I could not tell whether it veiled fear or expectation. It is somewhat dangerous to send a minister abroad. The danger is not only that he will buy his clothes in London, but that his sermons will be filled with imported goods, and have a strong exotic flavor. Large sections of the Alps, miles of glaciers, possibly Mt. Blanc en masse or the Weisshorn or the Jungfrau, will be set into the discourse, or served up by the spoonful from Sunday to Sunday throughout the year. It might be possible for an expert, on looking over a minister's sermons for the year after he has been abroad, to extract from them his whole route of travel. I have known intolerant parishioners to object to this constant reference to "when I was abroad," though most ministers are more artful than to begin the illustration in this way. A preacher whom I used to report twenty-five years ago was in the habit of carting tons of Palestine into his pulpit, and justified himself, no doubt, for doing so on the supposition that it was holy land. It occasionally became a little wearisome to the people, though not to the preacher. There are editors who are liable to the same reproach. I will not mention them by name; but I am sure that no reproaches of this kind are uttered against my friend Dr. Henry M. Field of the Evangelist, who year after year has taken his readers from country to country over different parts of the globe, and issued a small library of books of travel, made up from his charming letters to that paper. And the good doctor is still continuing. A gentleman met an editor of my acquaintance who had just returned from abroad, and said to him, "I am glad to see you back, but hope you'll go away soon; for I always enjoy your writings better when you are away from home." This may be a doubtful compliment; but it is true that there are authors whose writings are more interesting than their personal presence, and what they most need for the peace of their friends is transportation.

I AM in no position to take a pledge therefore that "Musings" and notes on foreign travel and observation will not reappear from time to time in these columns. This is a form of intoxication not easily cured. The gold-cure is of no use here. It may only aggravate the malady, and lead to a second trip to Europe. I have much sympathy with the minister or editor who is afflicted with this form of inebriety, and who is periodically taken with a paroxysm of reminiscence. He is often as helpless as his hearers or readers. He comes back from Europe with his brains scratched all over with impressions. Back of his eyeball there is a whole gallery of pictures. His ear has vibrated to the music or the jargon of strange tongues, and he is a rare man or woman if some of these voices have not for him a special melody. If he sees Europe with an open heart as well as with an open eye and an open ear, and does not charge too much for entrance to that stronghold of his affection, the turnstile will register a good many admissions. Then, of course, he carries a kodak and a note-book; and one can travel so fast in these days that no weekly paper can keep up with his wanderings. Let him write as industriously as he may, he is sure to come back with bales of material, not dutiable at the custom-house. It is his readers and hearers who must pay the tax on these imports. I have known travellers who did not succeed in relieving themselves of this malady of reminiscence until they got a lantern and a number of slides, and proceeded in this pictorial way to give their views of Europe.

Brevities.

The editorial in last Sunday's Herald on Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D., which we copy this week, will call forth a good many answers from those who see it in the Register.

The Philistine, a new periodical, is not a giant as was Goliath of Gath. It is a pygmy in size, and calls itself a "periodical of protest." Let us hope that no Israelitish shepherd will sling stones at its forehead.

Mr. Albert K. Smiley, proprietor of the Lake Mohonk Mountain House, invited Booker T. Washington to speak to his guests the evening of August 26. The result was a collection of $1,100 for Tuskegee, the largest single collection ever taken by Mr. Washington.

Bishop Whipple of Dakota, who has done such a noble work among the Sioux Indians, recently said to a reporter: "The Indian is proverbially honest, unless he is demoralized by drink. In thirty-six years' experience with the Indians, I never knew one to tell me a lie, and I never had a thing stolen by one. I asked an Indian once if it was safe to leave my property in my wigwam while I made a distant journey. He laughed, and said: 'Quite safe. There isn't a white man within one hundred miles of you.'"

Certain streets in Cambridge, where the great forty-inch steel water-pipes are being laid, have assumed the appearance of lines of fortification, and give one an idea how a city might look in a state of siege. At least, that is what people say who saw Paris in 1873. This is because long stretches of the deep trenches must remain uncovered until the pipes have been tested in place, which can be done only from gate to gate. The new pumping-engine now under construction is one of the largest in the world, with a capacity of twelve million gallons every twenty-four hours.

In our department of "Education" is an extract from the Boston Transcript, calling attention to the work of Mr. J. W. Davison at Fort Valley, Ga., who is carrying on an industrial school for colored youths in that city. Rev. James De Normandie of Boston in a personal letter says: "Nothing can be of greater value than the establishment of these schools for the training of the colored people in the South. This one for which Mr. Davison is soliciting help is doing such good work that I am glad to promise $25, and more, if possible, and commend his work to the interest and generosity of all friends of the colored race."

It is not uncommon for a cloud to float into a poem or for a poem to float into a cloud; but just what a fearful thing clouds may be when marshalled into a scientific procession may be seen by the closing paragraph of an interesting article on "Natural Rain-makers," by Alexander McAdie, in the Popular Science Monthly for September: "So, while the clouds delight us, they are also active for our welfare. In never-ending procession they move, ragged ranks of fracto-nimbi, jostled by frowning cumuli, tatterdemalion scud leading an army of mighty nimbi, the baleful funnel cloud, hovering and ill-omened, rolling strato-cumuli that lie far out on the flank. Thus they pass, while in the calm above appear the cirri dainty and lacelike, or curling wisps of laughing cirro-stratus."

Rev. I. M. Atwood in the Christian Leader says: "If a preacher does not know how to carry his message to the people, he has not mastered his business. Let him set that down as a fundamental truth." Then, referring to the address of Rev. E. C. Butler of Quincy at a Unitarian meeting on Boston Common, he adds: "The second speaker at the Unitarian meeting was an object-lesson in this respect. The word he had to utter was not more simple than any word of the gospel, but he bore it at once to the mind of his hearers. By his manner, his art of statement and illustration, his evident mastery of his own purpose, he made every one listen and understand. He had light: many others have. He let his light shine: many others bottle their light up."

And now here is the Watchman, published in Boston August 29, in this year of our Lord 1895, putting on its spectacles, and with the utmost gravity writing an editorial on the fall of the walls of Jericho by the blast of a ram's horn, treating the subject as if it were solid fact, and trying to draw some moral lessons from this event. One might imagine that the writer had never heard of such a thing as Hebrew mythology, and did not know that this was an interesting specimen of it. There is no moral lesson which the story is capable of teaching that would not be just as telling if the narrative were treated as poetry or mythology instead of as hard historic fact. But, if it is to be treated as fact, then the moral the Watchman draws from it ought to be greatly modified. If the walls of Jericho were so badly built that they could be blown down by the blast of a ram's horn, somebody was guilty of criminal negligence. But, if it was really a cyclone that did the work, the Hebrew writer ought to have a little credit for grim humor in calling it the blast of a ram's horn. We hope the walls of Zion on which the Watchman stands are better built than those of Jericho, but the indications of that article are that they are a little shaky.

Pro and Con.

THE ATLANTA EXHIBIT.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The responses which have already been made to our request for books, pictures, and other illustrations of the Unitarian Church, to be placed in the exhibit at Atlanta, Ga., are just enough to make us wish for more. Boxes will be sent to Atlanta from 25 Beacon Street this week and next; and all loans or contributions to this object should be sent there before September 9, care of Miss F. L. Close.

G. L. C.

A SUCCESSFUL FREE CHURCH.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Having been connected with an old Unitarian society conducted on the pew-renting system, and for the past eighteen years an active worker in a new society formed and very successfully carried on under the "free pew system," I wish to place before your readers the last and, as I believe, only right method, as it appears to me.

I admit at the start that such a free church system as "Layman" describes in the Register of August 1 would be unbusinesslike, because their theory and sentiment were not carried out in actual practice; and I also believe that it would be next to impossible to introduce the new idea into a church that had been long established and that had become habituated to the pew-renting system, and with reasonable success. But, if a new society is to be instituted, the new way will be found perfectly easy, and much more pleasant and helpful, for the reason that all favoritism and discrimination on account of the money value of the pews is entirely eliminated.

Of course, every church, in common with all other helpful organizations, has to be supported; and all thoughtful people understand it, and are more than willing to do their part. It is possible that the voluntary contributions are not always given in the spirit that they should be, but that would be still more true if the expenses were paid by selling the pews annually at auction.

In the church which it has been my privilege to attend constantly for eighteen years, every person on entering feels absolutely free and welcome to the use of any of the four hundred seats; and no person, no matter what their standing, financial or otherwise, expects, or ever is shown, any preference whatever. After the sermon and during an organ voluntary the young men who act as ushers pass around the contribution-box to give strangers and friends from abroad, who may be with us for the day, an opportunity to help if they desire to do so. It is not understood by anybody that this pittance each Sunday is to defray the expenses of the service. At the beginning of the year a soliciting committee sees every member of the parish, and all subscribe from five cents to two dollars per week, payable to the collector once in three months, or oftener if the subscribers prefer; and that is the end of the money matter, so far as the church services are concerned. I submit that that is the true way rather than the old pew-renting custom, that allowed a few people who happened to have money to usurp the best places in the church, while many more interested and more helpful and deserving were driven to a less desirable seat, or, from a feeling of false pride, driven from church influences altogether.

Our church was never so prosperous as it is to-day, and nothing could induce the society to give up the "free church system."

WORKER.

Athol, Mass.

FREE PEWS AGAIN.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

It is with much satisfaction that I note the replies to my few lines regarding what seems to me the free pew fallacy. The subject is one worthy our best thought, and my hope is that those for and against the free system will state their views frankly. To my mind none of the replies made meet the point raised, which was not based on theory or sentiment or preference, but on my personal experience alone. I asked, If an attendant signs an agreement to pay a certain yearly sum, and selects or has assigned a special pew, how is the church "free" any more than if the amount paid is called "pew rent" instead of a "contribution"? Is it not the same thing in effect, and how does the "free church" idea receive any true recognition?

"W." replies that under the free system it is not the amount paid that secures the choice of pews, but early application, and that the poor will shun our church doors if we say, "No money, no place," or "The more money, the higher place." Well, I truly think there is far less chance of "feeling," or discord, where a family selects such a pew as it prefers to pay a known rental for at fixed times. As for announcing to any human being, however lowly in estate, that without money there is no place, surely there is no such church as that. "W." is creating a difficulty, while I only desire to meet the difficulties that really exist.

At one of our Unitarian Club dinners some one quoted from an Irish servant, who, when asked if any heat was coming up the register, replied, "Yes, there is heat; but it's a cold heat." Perhaps there is too much cold heat in our churches; but, surely, renting our pews does not condition our keeping a cashier in the vestibule to demand spot cash from non-pew-holders. As well might our preachers withhold their sermons unless the society would pay cash on delivery! I don't believe there is any Unitarian church, regardless of its "system," but will cordially welcome any to seats without money and without price.

Mr. Nichols does not seem to agree with "W.'s" idea that under the free system early application should secure the best pews. On the contrary, he claims that "any form of assignment of pews is undesirable," and that all this should be left to "the tact and skill of ushers," who "can provide for the various tastes of different people." Perhaps. But why is it, then, that, almost without exception, families prefer to and do occupy the same pew Sunday after Sunday, instead of leaving the matter to the tact and skill of an usher? And is not this the case in all churches, regardless of the system guiding its affairs? Mr. Nichols takes ground with "W." that renting the pews keeps the poor from church, or else relegates them to undesirable sittings; and, while this may in some cases be true, still, even when the pews are called free, I doubt if a family that gave nothing toward the church support would feel quite comfortable in taking possession of one of the most desirable pews, to the exclusion of another family that contributed liberally.

Mr. Hale's "Double" remarked, "What has been already said has on the whole been so well said that I will not further occupy the time." Mr. Dole's reply reminds me of this. He thinks there is nothing to add to what "W." has said, but then goes on in a most kindly way to say that I have not informed myself. This is true; but in my first paper I was careful to state that it was not offered as expert testimony, but only as a bit of personal experience. Mr. Dole is correct in supposing that I would be interested in knowing how many churches are supported under the voluntary method. Far from claiming "to know it all," I am only a seeker after truth. But neither "W." nor Mr. Nichols nor Mr. Dole has yet converted me from my lack of faith in the system they advocate.

Few ministers receive any business training whatever. Almost the only successful preacher well known to me personally, who has also a keen, well-balanced business judgment, is the present secretary of the American Unitarian Association. His opinion from the practical point of view would be of value, as would the conclusions of the Association's treasurer, who, in feeling the denominational pulse and prescribing from the financial standpoint, must realize that all theories relating to church support must, after all, submit to the monetary test.

As a member of one of our larger parishes and one of its standing committee, it was my duty to approve all accounts prior to their payment by the treasurer. When I recall the various items aggregating many thousands of dollars, it still seems to me that no organization, and more especially a religious body, has any moral or legal right to positively contract these debts without arranging with certainty for their payment. And I repeat that, if they are to be paid by pledged contributions, this is practically the same as pew rent, except that in the former case there is no certainty as to when the contribution will be sent in, while in the latter the treasurer sends out his bills at stated intervals. They are recognized as a business obligation, and the treasurer can know with reasonable certainty when he will be in funds to pay the debts incurred.

It would be interesting, as a phase of this subject, to know under which system church debt (meaning excess of expenses over income) is more prevalent. My impression is that in this direction the verdict would show against the free system,—the debt growing in the usual way until some great stir is made, when a few provident members wipe it out in order that the improvident ones may go to work building it up again.

As stated in the beginning, the subject is one of general interest; and its agitation can hardly fail of being helpful.

LAYMAN.

AID FOR ARMENIA.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

For nearly a year the story of the horrible Turkish outrages upon the Armenians in Sassoun (Armenia) has shocked all civilized nations. Conclusive evidence has established the sickening fact that the atrocities in the Sassoun equalled in savagery those perpetrated in the past by the same fiends in Greece, Crete, and Bulgaria. Unfortunately, universal indignation could not secure, so far, either present relief or future protection to the many thousands of victims of Moslem fanaticism. Only through the slow, diplomatic intervention of the great European powers can such be in time obtained for them. In the mean time the general sympathy with the cruel fate of the Armenians can alone manifest itself through protests by speech and in print, and through the exercise of charity in alleviation of their pitiful distress. Besides murder, rapine, and devastation, another dire visitation has now come upon that stricken people, calling for immediate pecuniary help. They are threatened by famine, and urgent action is necessary to avert the danger of starvation.

We are informed by a private letter that in one district alone "there are now about eight hundred and sixty of these houseless wanderers living in the woods and mountains, in caves and hollow trees, half naked, and some indeed without covering for their nakedness. Bread they have not tasted for months."

A strong committee of leading Englishmen, representing all parties and all classes, has been formed under the chairmanship of the Duke of Argyll, and has already raised and forwarded a considerable sum of money. Believing that our generous countrymen will be glad to follow the noble example of the kindred nation, an American committee has been organized for the same object.

The committee herewith confidently appeal to the American public for liberal contributions, which will be distributed through the agency of the English Committee, or through the Armenian patriarch at Constantinople, as contributors may prefer.

Checks should be made payable to Spencer Trask, treasurer, 27 Pine Street, New York.

The following are the American Committee: Mrs. Robert Abbe, Prof. N. Murray Butler, Morris K. Jesup, Jacob H. Schiff, Spencer Trask, Rev. Henry Van Dyke, D.D., Mrs. Henry Villard, Everett P. Wheeler.

A. AYVAZIAN, M.D., Secretary.
424 W. 57th Street, New York.

CHURCH CLOSING.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I am glad to learn that the question has been asked several times at the Unitarian rooms this summer, "Why is it that our churches need to be closed from one-fourth to one-sixth of the year?" I hope that question will continue to be asked, and that the subject will receive the attention it deserves. If a church should be closed one-fourth of the year, why not close it for the whole year? It is no answer to say that the congregations in the summer are small. If a church should be closed because the congregations are small, then certainly many of our churches should be closed altogether.

Then the pastor must have a vacation. How many men of any other profession or occupation take a vacation of a fourth of a year? Of course, all men and women who really work need rest. But this can and may be secured without a sacrifice of the duties of the position, whatever it may be, of the man or woman.

No man can worthily and properly embrace the profession of a Christian minister without being ready and willing to make whatever sacrifice may be necessary in order to fulfil, so far as in him lies, all that the sacred office requires. He should not consider first what may most conduce to his pleasure or comfort. If I spoke my whole thought on this subject, I should use strong language. I hope that the question which our new treasurer says has been asked several times will be repeated.

W.

SPAIN AND THE BIBLE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I am considerably surprised to-day, while looking over your paper of July 4 last, to find the ancient and somewhat stupid story of the Spanish shoemaker and the Bible. This is one of the stock-in-trade stories of the enemies of the Catholic Church, and is rather worthy of an A. P. A. paper than the columns of the Christian Register. The Bible has been through very many editions in the vernacular in the kingdom of Spain, under the sway of the Catholic Church. I have by me at the present time a beautiful edition printed at Barcelona in the vernacular in the year 1852, than which I have seen none comparable in England.

The very first book that was printed by Gutenberg was a Bible; and, before Luther and the Protestants arose, more than seventy editions of the Bible in different languages had appeared from the hand-presses then in use.

The Spaniards are a well-educated and very literary people, and the shoemaker in the story could not have been in good faith. In fact, I am inclined to think he was guying the minister. By the way, in 1887 the population of England was 27,826,798, with 8,802 pupils in the universities. In Spain, at the same time, the population was 16,945,786, with 15,787 pupils in the universities. Spain has always had the Bible, and I venture to say there is more Bible literature in the Spanish language than the English.

By giving this room in your columns you will make a little reparation for a wrong which, I feel sure, was not done intentionally.

ARTHUR M. CLARK, C.S.P.
628 California Street, San Francisco.

For the Christian Register.
SUMMER.

BY REV. PERRY MARSHALL.

Why waste the ointment poured upon his head?
Why its aroma fill the hallowed room?
Why waste the heliotrope and rosy red,
The pansy and the pink, their rich perfume?

Why wasteth June the summer's sunlight long?
Why beauty wild upon the landscape spread?
Why doth the warbler waste his wooing song?
Why waste the blossoms which the fruit trees shed?

These be the offerings of the summer days,
The tokens of the heart's devotion fair:
"She hath done what she could" in earnest ways;
It shall be spoken of her everywhere.

The flowers fair are mother of the fruit;
Without fond love best deeds are never done;
It is not waste, but summer's warm pursuit
By which the wealth of life is truly won.

AGNOSTICISM, WITH A DIFFERENCE.

BY REV. JAMES M. WHITON, PH.D.

There are agnostics and agnostics. There is an agnosticism which is mere indifference, devoid of interest in the Unperceivable. There is an ethically superior kind, earnest and reverent, endeavoring to know the Unperceivable, and regretting that it cannot. To this class belongs Mr. Spencer. He declines the name of Christian, but he is closer to many who hold to it than he is willing to admit. Among these, also, there is an agnosticism, between which and that of Mr. Spencer, in his highest affirmations, there is an approach, which is hopeful, if it be fairly recognized on both sides, for the progress of the theistic problem toward a larger agreement.

Mr. Balfour, in his recent "Foundations of Belief," while criticising Mr. Spencer, goes far to pare away the fundamental difference between them. Mr. Spencer, replying in the Fortnightly, makes no account of any concessions, but devotes himself to the difference, and, as we think, exaggerates it. The real, as distinct from the apparent, approximation between the professed theist and the professed agnostic deserves some adequate recognition.

In his "Ecclesiastical Institutions," Sections 659 and 660, Mr. Spencer has made this important admission, "The final outcome of that speculation commenced by the primitive man is that the Power manifested throughout the world, distinguished as material, is the same Power which in ourselves wells up under the form of consciousness." In this recognition of an identity of nature between the divine and human, he is at one with the Christian theist, who might even accept the statement as "a rationalized vision" of the Pauline doctrine, "God was in Christ."

But Mr. Spencer is not disposed to recognize the approach to his own views that Mr. Balfour has made; e.g., great as is our seeming advance beyond the speculations of the primitive man, "our approximate guesses are still closer to his than they are to their common Object." "We cannot form, I will not say any adequate, but even any tolerable, idea of the mode in which God is related to and acts on the world of phenomena." Ignoring these concessions, Mr. Spencer attacks Mr. Balfour's thesis that the order of the universe is explicable only by the postulate that it has proceeded from a rational Being. But is not the human consciousness, in which he recognizes the universal Power as welling up in us, a rational consciousness?

Mr. Spencer's impediment seems to be in his self-imposed use of words. "Thinking truly," as he says in the Fortnightly, "requires mental representation." Consciousness does not become thought till put into definitely conceivable form. But, when we try thus to think of a rational Author of the world, all definite conception fails, "leaving only a consciousness that cannot be put into form." Hence the traits of a rational Author, not being "mentally representable," are "unthinkable," being only "abstractions of human attributes existing unlocalized and multiplied by infinity." Such a result, he says, is not thought, but "a mere blank form of thought, a pseud-idea. The difficulty here is in Mr. Spencer's restricted notion of thought, as always explicit and reasoned out in definite terms. But nothing is a more common fact than the valid judgment; i.e., thought, which is simply a form of consciousness that eludes, or even defies representation in definite terms, but is valid notwithstanding. Man not being built in compartments, thought is not restricted to the logical process of the intellect. In reality, these two great writers are not so far apart as one of them would make it seem. As to ultimate scientific ideas, they are at one. Both hold that the Infinite Reality behind phenomena is not mentally representable in thought. Both hold that this Reality is witnessed to in human consciousness apart from forms of thought. Mr. Spencer holds, further, in line with Mr. Balfour, that "the necessity we are under to think of the external energy in terms of the internal energy gives rather a spiritualistic than a materialistic interpretation to the universe."

It is in their treatment of these common positions that the two part company. The one emphasizes the positive, the other the negative aspect. The one affirms what is given in consciousness apart from thought-forms: the other denies what is unrepresentable in thought-forms. And so Mr. Spencer concludes his reply by maintaining that "not even the highest mental attributes conceivable can be predicated of that Existence which fills all space for all time." Inconsistent as this seems with his recognition of the Universal Power as welling up in that rational human consciousness which it has called into being, he is tethered to it by the limited connotation which he has assigned to "thought."

For Mr. Spencer's well-known antipathy to conventional Christianity only too much cause exists. But it should not involve one who has almost, if not altogether, broken with the crudities of the popular theology. It is, of course, regrettable that Mr. Balfour, with all his concessions both to liberals and agnostics, is not wholly clear of entanglement with doubtful theories,—for instance, as to the need of theological formulas for a basis of ecclesiastical co-operation. But that Mr. Spencer writes under a strong bias is plain throughout his reply to Mr. Balfour, and particularly at the outset, where he flagrantly misrepresents him as writing in the interest of supernaturalism as currently conceived. It seems to us a case where prejudice has thrown away a fair opportunity of staking out for theists and agnostics some common ground. Had Mr. Spencer been disposed to emphasize his agreements rather than his disagreements with so serious and open-minded a seeker after truth, he might have written more helpfully for all who are trying to explore the Great Mystery which the Christian poet speaks of,—

"And what I am beheld again
What is, and no man understands;
And out of darkness came the hands
That reach through nature, moulding man."

INTERNATIONAL PRISON CONGRESS.

BY REV. SAMUEL J. BARROWS, SECRETARY OF THE AMERICAN DELEGATION.

II.

PROBLEMS AND DISCUSSIONS.

In a previous article I have described the preparation, composition, organization, and scope of the "V^e Congrès Pénitentiaire International," held at Paris. In the present article I purpose to mention some of the more important problems and discussions which engaged attention in the first section.

For purposes of classification, to save time and focalize discussion, the Congress was divided into four sections. To the first section was assigned "Penal Legislation," to the second "Questions relating to Prison Administration," to the third "Preventive Means," to the fourth "Questions relating to Children and Minors."

A president, vice-presidents, and secretaries were elected for each section. Sessions were held in separate rooms each morning; and the results of discussion were presented through a reporter chosen for each theme to the general session of the whole congress, where a vote was finally taken on the subject, with the general result of confirming, with occasional amendments, the conclusion of the special section. While this method had its advantages, it was attended also with manifest disadvantages. The interest of many delegates was not confined to one section. Important questions might be discussed simultaneously in two or three sections, and the delegate could only attend one. Yet division into sections is perhaps the only way in which to successfully do the preliminary work of collecting and converging knowledge or opinion in a large, deliberative body; and every delegate had the advantage of listening to reports and conclusions in the general assembly, though he might miss the sifting process of discussion. A more serious difficulty lay in securing unanimity of conclusion without whittling away the sharp, definite point of the question until it became a generality, or without fusing it with an alloy of compromises. It is a rule of our National Conference of Charities and of the National Prison Congress not to adopt a platform, not to form a philanthropic or sociological creed. The reports of discussions speak for themselves. It often happens in bodies of this kind—and the Paris Congress furnished some illustrations—that very important questions are formally decided by a bare majority vote. The decision then may be merely a numerical one: the real weight of knowledge and opinion may often be with the minority. On the other hand, there is an advantage in being able to gauge the direction of thought and sentiment and the march of progress; and, when a representative body like the International Prison Congress comes to a unanimous conclusion upon a question of theory or practice in philanthropy, it means a good deal.

PENAL LEGISLATION.

The questions relating to penal legislation brought together in the first section the large array of legal knowledge and ability from all nations in which the Congress was especially strong. The question whether a malefactor ought to be regarded as a recidivist until he had renewed the same infraction awakened much discussion and difference of opinion, and also whether the penalty ought to be progressive. In some countries a criminal who is sent to prison two or three times is regarded as a recidivist without reference to the nature of his offence. Under the German system he is regarded as a recidivist only if he renews the same offence. It was maintained during the discussion that there are recidivists who are accidental and occasional, and that there are those who are professional and anti-social. It is the last, whether he be a general recidivist, committing a variety of crimes, or a special recidivist, confining his infractions to a single line, who is most dangerous. It was ably maintained in the discussion that an increase, or cumulation, of penalty should follow in such cases, and that it should be left to the discretion of the judge. This question of dealing with "repeaters," as the prison wardens call them, is one of the most difficult practical problems in penology; and it was not surprising that the discussion on this subject was animated and prolonged. Before any agreement could be arrived at, it was found necessary to appoint a special committee to formulate opinion, and to defer report until a later session. The result was the final adoption of a report in which recidivism was treated as general or special according to the gravity of the offences, and with some reference to the time elapsing between them. The committee were swayed more by practical than by theoretical considerations. It is of the greatest importance to have accurate classification; but practical necessities are more important than theoretical ones, and the dangerous criminal, whatever his record, must be properly controlled. The report favored a progressive accumulation of penalties and the infliction of more rigorous sentences in the case of professional criminals. Courts, it was declared, in the third place, should not suspend these rules unless they recognize the existence of extenuating circumstances of an exceptional character. The law should fix a minimum special penalty to avoid the imposition of short sentences. It was further reported that the law should fix the number of condemnations which, in connection with the nature of the condemnations incurred and the perversity of the criminal, should enable a judge to decide whether the accused is a malefactor by profession. A great majority of the section was certainly of the opinion that there was too much clemency exercised by the judges toward habitual offenders. The clemency of the judge is too often determined by the gravity of the special act of which the prisoner is accused than by the character of the criminal committing it. The section did not go beyond a general expression of the need of a cumulative penalty. It did not decide in favor of the indeterminate sentence or of a long definite period such as exists in certain countries. It left the nature of the measure to be pronounced by some future Congress. In this connection I may remark that an habitual criminal law exists in Massachusetts, as in some other States, the prisoner receiving twenty-five years when convicted under this law.

TRANSPORTATION.

The subject of the transportation of the criminal is not in the United States a practical question; but it assumes a good deal of importance in an International Prison Congress, since France and Russia are committed to it, and debate is sure to be warm on this question. In the preliminary reports the French system was presented by Messrs. Charles Petit and Charles Babinet, counsellors of the Cour de Cassation, Paris. The text of the question was whether transportation in the larger sense should be admitted in a rational system of repression; and, if so, what particular rôle should it be called upon to fulfil? Previous congresses have dealt with these questions with caution. The Congress in Stockholm in 1878 did not proscribe transportation, as some of the members desired, but passed the following vote: "The sentence of transportation presents difficulties which do not permit of its adoption in all countries or the hope that it will realize all the conditions of justice." The Congress of 1890 in St. Petersburg, held in a country where transportation has been maintained for three centuries, said: "Against hardened and rebellious criminals prolonged imprisonment or transportation to territories, or dependent possessions of the country interested, may be employed, but always with the guarantees which ought to surround authority for those who are deprived of their liberty, and with the possibility of regaining that liberty by their good conduct according to a system of conditional liberation."

In 1854 France, after a long and painful experience with defective penal prisons, revised its system, and found new hope in transportation, which was established in Guiana and New Caledonia. Next to New Zealand the latter is the largest island in the Pacific, twenty-five miles broad and about two hundred and forty miles long. It has many conditions which adapt it for a penal colony. The French system has been in operation for forty years. A system of conditional liberation in the island without the privilege of leaving it, and with remuneration for work for those who are set free, encourages good behavior. At the expiration of the sentence the libérés form a class by themselves, and have many of the advantages of free emigrants. Undoubtedly, the French system is carried on under conditions which are more humane and hopeful than the old prison system which it to some degree replaced. It has distinctly in view the reformation of the prisoner. It recognizes the need of a wise administration and superior personality, the need of rewards and encouragements as well as strict discipline. Relegation or banishment to these colonies is a milder imposition of the penalty. Both of the French reporters advocate the French transportation system, and maintain that, while under the old system the number of recidivists was ninety-five per cent., there are only five per cent. of recidivists under transportation. It must be remembered, however, that this is a comparison between transportation and the bagnes, or French convict prisons which the penal colonies replaced. It is not a comparison between transportation and the best modern system of prisons.

The Russian reporter to the conference was Prof. N. S. Tagantzew of St. Petersburg, professor in the Faculty of Law, honorary member of the university, and a member of the Court of Cassation. He is one of the distinguished jurists of Russia. He did not disguise the defects in the administration of Russian transportation. He maintained, however, that transportation combines the essential conditions of intimidating the prisoner, securing the safeguard of society and the correction of the criminal, and that it ought not to be excluded from penal measures. But, since the practical application of transportation, as history and experience can attest, presents serious difficulties, it is only to be recommended for States which offer convenient conditions and in a restricted measure. Transportation should be maintained only in countries possessing territory for its application, and especially where they cannot secure the repression of crime by seclusion in prison. Transportation is not a measure to be extended to a great number of criminals without regard to individual qualities. But it is to be applied in accordance with their physical and moral aptitudes for colonization.

The report of Prof. Tagantzew was read before the Commission of the Juridical Society of St. Petersburg. Their judgment of the report is of interest. They declare that the significance of transportation as penalty, abstractly considered and without reference to the indications of experience, is unanimously received by Russian jurists in the same sense set forth by Prof. Tagantzew. On the contrary, when it came to the practical application of transportation, there was dissent. To the optimism of his report was opposed a negative opinion, since there is reason to doubt the rational organization of transportation in Russia, where, though it has existed three hundred years, it has not been able to establish itself firmly. "Nevertheless, transportation must be accepted as necessary, with the restrictions indicated by Prof. Tagantzew, in the presence of defects of penitentiary organizations; for, of two evils, a bad prison and a bad system of transportation, the first is evidently the greatest." It must not be forgotten, however, say this committee of Russian jurists, that the existence of transportation does not forbid the perfection of the penitentiary system.

These words indicate how earnestly and decidedly Russian jurists are moving toward the development of their prison system, and that traditional and hereditary methods are not to stand in the way of their ideal of what a prison system should be.

Another of the most distinguished members of the Russian delegates to the Conference was Prof. Ivan Foinitski, professor of law of the faculty of St. Petersburg, and general advocate of the Court of Cassation. Prof. Foinitski is one of the most eminent writers in Russia, and indeed in any country, on penological subjects. As most of his writings are in the Russian language, they are not readily available. It is, therefore, fortunate that his able and valuable study of the subject of transportation has just been translated into French by M. George Bonet-Maury of Paris, son of Prof. G. Bonet-Maury of the College of France, so well known to many of our readers from his visit to this country to attend the Parliament of Religions, and his contributions to religious literature. The translation is confined to the historic study and criticism of English and Russian transportation, with a condensed summary of different systems practised by other countries, save that M. Bonet-Maury has deferred the translation of Prof. Foinitski's account of the French system until another time.

Prof. Foinitski is a strong opponent of transportation. His volume of two hundred and sixty pages appeared just before the Prison Congress. It was expected that it would influence the discussion of that body. I have not time or space now to notice this elaborate volume as its merits deserve. Prof. Foinitski examines carefully all the arguments which have been presented in favor of transportation, and rejects them in toto. He declares that transportation up to the present has nothing but negative results to show.

In private conversation, and also in debate in the Congress, Prof. Foinitski ably maintained his view, and declared that this method had been renounced by all countries except France and Russia, and that even in these countries it had not been successful. His important work deserves careful study as a standard treatise on this subject.

The debate in the first section was exceedingly warm, and extended over three sessions. Prof. Leveillé of the Faculty of Law of Paris warmly defended the French system. It was evident that only negative conclusions or a compromise could be reached with such a division of opinion. The legal section succeeded in passing the following vote: "Transportation under different forms, with the ameliorations already realized and of which it is still susceptible, has its utility, whether for the execution of long penalties for great criminals or for the repression of habitual criminals and obstinate recidivists." This conclusion was strongly combated in the general session.

Other questions which came up in the legal session were questions of classification,—the distinctions between vagabondage and mendicity, measures to be adopted against those who induce young girls to emigrate for the sake of prostitution, the important question of conditional liberation, the question whether the victim of a crime is sufficiently protected by modern laws, and whether he should receive some indemnity for the wrong he has suffered. On this latter question it was voted that penal legislation should take more account of the necessity of the reparation due to the injured party; that, when the complaint of a party in a civil suit is recognized as grounded, he should never be condemned to pay costs. The Congress decided that it should take into serious consideration a proposition to allow to the injured party a portion of the gains realized by the work of the condemned during his detention. But, recognizing the difficulty of estimating all the elements which enter into this question, it was referred to the next Congress.

The question of conditional liberation also had an important place in discussion and I had the honor of submitting a paper on what Massachusetts has done with the probation system.

IN VAGRANT'S LAND.

BY ALICE GORDON.

A bit of old pasture, consisting of two gentle slopes and the broad, shallow basin between, is occupied during the late summer by a vigorous colony of those vagrants of the vegetable world called, indiscriminately, weeds. The term, viewed in the light of its etymological meaning, is often a misnomer, as inapplicable as some human nouns collective.

These Ishmaelites of Flora's kingdom are given a bad name, and then made to justify it, are first banished to the desert, and then reproached for developing hardihood rather than beauty. Little blame to them if their latent poisonous qualities also appear in the struggle for existence. Emerson's definition of a weed as a plant whose use has not been discovered has a quality of justice, and suggests a different attitude toward these wayfarers of the earth. But is it their condition of outlawry alone, or the influence of blood, that causes the difference between them and the denizens of the garden parterre? Surely, something more than the effects of environment divides them from the stately lily, the grave pansy, and gentle pink, and all the prim beauties of the conventional border, growing and blooming like well-trained children where they are bid. A natural selection of the estate that suits them best may make a broad line of separation between the plants that will and those that will not be cultivated out of individuality, massed according to color, trimmed and clipped into nondescript forms at the gardener's fancy. The vagrant blood defies restraint in the plant world as in the human. Some connection may yet be found between these plant gypsies and the Turanian races of mankind. The earth is their home: their native air is liberty. If driven from the fields, they have the fence corners and waste places for their encampments. The autumn wind is courier, guide, and vehicle for their marches. Always ready to move on at the behest of agricultural beadleism, without title to a rood or tithe of its surface, they yet possess the earth.

But the vagrants are not in haste to assert their birthright. They remain in the background through the spring, while violets paint a summer sky on every sunny slope, and pink and white beauties haunt dim woodland ways; through early summer, the time of June roses filling the air with bloom and perfume. But, with the tropic heats of August, they obey the call of the sun, and come in throngs to take the place of the delicate children of the royal line.

This old pasture is one of their favorite haunts. Here are patches of golden-rod, its clusters of buds wrapped in green sheaths of calyx, with no hint of the golden glory to come. Here is pale purple mint, whose blossoms children love to rub between their hands, seeing in imagination "gardens of spices, wind blown." A succulent stalk bears purple and white cups so daintily pleated they seem a model for dressmakers to fashion after. There are stalks of milkweed filled with a viscid fluid that oozes out of every wound, and a nameless scion of gypsy land, whose purple blossom has a honeyed odor of inexhaustible sweetness.

Half way up the slope, gray and solitary, stands a mullein stalk. A plant of to-day, it reminds one of some hoary ruin with the dust of ages upon it. There is such a venerable air about it, such a lack of even the suggestion of former bloom! But touch the leaves. Did loom of human make ever weave a velvet pile so soft and fine? What an aristocratic indifference is expressed by the solitary yellow flower crowning the ancient watch-tower. No bourgeois enthusiasm for this melancholy recluse! Calmly it opens its golden rim, preserving a serene composure in the midst of vivid life. We are reminded of the precious metal, buried in its rough quartz, for which men risk life.

Not far away is another flower castle,—the thistle. No solemn ruin, but an intensely modern affair. Its walls are set with terrible reminders to the avaricious fingers that would meddle with its royal occupant. If there be a gypsy queen in vagrant's land, she is the thistle. Reclining in her purple robes, in the heart of her fortress, she keeps her honeyed sweetness for that bold courtier, the bee, and the sweet-voiced court poet, the goldfinch, whose yellow wings hover near. The mailed walls of the castle glitter in the sunlight; but already a power that no walls, however guarded, can shut out, is making itself felt. Many of the purple-tressed beauties are turning white, and shedding their glory of bloom. The ground around is covered with a soft silken down, fit only for a fairy's couch or to line the nest of the dainty goldfinch.

These late summer days the place is vocal with another life than the intense but silent life of plants. From the monotonous chirp of the cricket, the undertone to the summer orchestra, to the loud shrilling of the cicada, the gamut of sound is complete and incessant. Each little musician attends strictly to his own performance, without regard to what his neighbor is singing. At your every movement a crowd of winged forms rise and dart hither and thither. On every side they are clinging to the stems, staring with goggle eyes at the intruder.

Master Crooked-knee is here, with all his relations,—the creaky, crawly performer who makes night hideous with a tune resembling that of a door swinging on rusty hinges,—and crowds of gauzy-winged creatures in hues of emerald, crimson, and gold shining in the sun.

Some of the merry company are singing their last song; for Arachnida has spread her fatal web everywhere between the green stems, and in gorgeous black and orange armor waits her prey. And she has not long to wait. Foolish little Crooked-knee, darting to and fro, entangles his active legs in the web woven of filmy threads hardly visible to the eye, but of terrible power. In one web a monster in ebony and gold has been keeping guard over a motionless form wrapped in its white winding-sheet. In another two grasshoppers are caught, and the spider from the top of the web calmly watches their frantic struggles to escape. A little work with a twig sets them free; and away they dart, to fall into another trap, probably, while the indignant spider runs up her winding-stair to protect a skeleton hung in the attic. One feels no compunction at robbing a spider of her well-earned dinner, perhaps because of the terrible advantage she has over the unwary, and the cool, pitiless vigilance with which she uses it.

Amid the hum of busy life it is odd to find a member of the fuzz family who has gone to sleep in his curtained hammock, trustfully swung between two grass-blades, whose green tops bend over like a canopy. Wrapped in his soft silken coverlet, he has closed his eyes on the summer world, heedless of accidents that may prevent his ever becoming a butterfly.

Ephemeral creatures of a day,—how soon that day passes, and what intense life they crowd into its few golden hours! Day and night the pæan ceases not till autumn comes to end it, and a rheumatic cricket lonesomely chirps the farewell number.

Autumn vapors are trailing over the vagrant's summer home. The dead stalks rustle in the wind. A cold breath rises from the damp ground. All have vanished,— the humble beauty and the castled queen, the bird and the bee, the hunter and its victim. The vagrants are ready to move on. Now, while the farmer garners his crop, comes Nature's sowing time. The wind, the all-sufficient sower, is ready, with many a mournful song of the past in mind, to sing on the way. With breath of ice and fire, with wheels of the sun and road of blue, the charioteer offers free passage to the waiting seeds. He makes no promise as to direction or destination. The tiny brown voyagers spread their white sails, and set forth without chart or compass, their only course "whither the wind will."

Golden-rod has turned to silver-rod. A white inflorescence appears on every decaying stem,—a sort of ghostly bloom. It is a symbol of death and resurrection. Every pod is bursting with potential life. I found one upon a milkweed stem, from which the first seed was taking flight. Its fairy white wings fluttered in the breeze, as if longing to sail up into the blue sky, while the seed yet remained fast in the pod:—

"Just poised for flight, its brown feet clinging yet
To the earth house, the husk that held it long;
While its white wings tremble to forget
Their bonds, and join the liberated throng.
Type of the spirit in its house of clay,
Bound to the earth, yet striving to be free,
Through birth and death, by Nature's devious way,
Seeking its unforgotten liberty."

A NINETEENTH-CENTURY PROPHET.

DR. LYMAN ABBOTT VISITS DR. MARTINEAU.

No one, in my judgment, has done more, probably no one so much, among English-speaking peoples as Dr. James Martineau to stem the tide which half a century ago was running so strongly toward materialism,—the doctrine that there is nothing but matter, that all thought, emotion, life, are only subtle forms of physical force, that there is, therefore, no God in the universe and no soul in man. Dr. Martineau modestly disclaims having rendered any such service. Materialism, he says, has changed its form rather than its nature, and, so far as it has disappeared, has done so to give place either to a spiritualism which deals with ghostly appearances, rappings, mind-readings, telepathy, and like forms of spiritism, or else to a phase of Hegelianism which merges man's consciousness in a universal consciousness, and so destroys the foundation of religion. For worship is, he truly says, communion between two personalities; and any philosophy which denies a divine personality in and behind and in some sense apart from nature denies the possibility of worship, and, in the highest sense, of religion.

Something like this he said to me as we were riding from the station—where, with two of his daughters, he had met me—to a beautiful loch in a wild, romantic glen in the north of Scotland. For seven or eight months of the year he lives in London, where, a friend who knows him well tells me, he has a most beautiful private library. Four or five months in the year he lives at Aviemore, which is little more than a station on the Highland Railroad. It is not even large enough to have an inn; and a place must be very small in England or Scotland not to have an inn. I had to ride in the train six miles further up the valley to Boat of Garten to get a place to spend the night. I shall not attempt to describe the ride up from Edinburgh to Aviemore, over what Baedeker well calls one of the most beautiful railroad rides in Scotland: through the lovely vales of Perthshire; through the wild, romantic pass of Killcrankie; by the side of wild Scottish moors and the Grampian Hills where "my father fed his flocks," and where I should fancy they would have got very little to eat; to the fertile vales and high hills which combine to make the region about Aviemore one of exquisite, romantic beauty.

Though Dr. Martineau has just passed his ninetieth birthday, his eye is not dimmed, nor his natural force abated. "Would I like to take a drive before dinner, which was at five o'clock?" "Very much." "It had been raining, and another shower was evidently coming up, but Dr. Martineau would not mind it, for he had a waterproof on: would I mind it?" "Not at all, for I also had a waterproof on." In fact, rain did come down in a smart shower; and he did not mind it in the least. When we got out, he was as spry as I was. And I could readily believe what his daughter told me, that he made nothing of climbing one of the smaller—but not so very small—Scottish hills which she pointed out to me. It was more difficult to believe that he had passed his ninetieth birthday, and that his life had been one of ceaseless literary activity. He seemed to be a demonstration of the truth of the spiritual philosophy, the independence of the soul, and its mastery over the body. It is partly, at least, because he has so young a soul that he has so vigorous and hale a body.

As we rode, we talked. It was not an interview. It would therefore be very unfair to hold Dr. Martineau responsible for this fragmentary report of what is at best but my understanding and memory of a memorable hour.

Some remark of mine led him to give me a sketch of the origin of English Unitarianism. English Unitarianism has grown by a natural development out of the Richard Baxter Presbyterianism. The bond of union was not dogma, but spiritual sympathy. There was no creed, no theological definition. After the restoration of Charles II. and the Act of Uniformity, for a generation all churches not in conformity with the Church of England were prohibited by drastic legislation. They could not meet for religious worship, and the nonconforming ministers could not live within five miles of a large town. For a generation, therefore, whatever worship was conducted was in violation of this law, and by stealth.

Of course, organized Presbyterianism was impossible; and when under William and Mary the Act of Toleration was passed, and liberty was again permitted, these Presbyterian churches had become independent, and have remained so ever since. But they have retained the character which they had taken on in Richard Baxter's time and under his influence. In the same church a Calvinist, an Arminian, an Arian, and a Socinian might work and worship together. There was no standard of belief: no one was required to define his theology. Indeed, it was hardly considered permissible to do so. In this air of liberty, unhampered by creeds and traditional beliefs, the development went on naturally until the churches generally became in fact, though not in form, Unitarian in their belief. But the same spirit of freedom remains. They are representative not of Unitarianism, but of a perfectly unfettered Christian liberty. Their bond is spiritual, not dogmatic.

I asked him if the churches were not growing together, and what he thought of the Lambeth Articles as a basis of church union. I judged from his reply, as from the replies of other nonconformist divines with whom I have spoken on this subject, that these articles have attracted no such attention in Great Britain as they have in the United States. I should think it was clear that they are not taken very seriously outside the Episcopal Church. The creeds, said Dr. Martineau, afford no basis for union. Historic scholarship has made it clear that the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed possess no authority; that the Apostles' Creed was the gradual growth of an earlier age, and as such has no binding force on us, and affords no foundation for the Church to build on. The only hope of union is in some scheme of federation whereby each church will preserve its own autonomy, but will recognize every other church as a church of Christ.

I have no right to invite my readers into Dr. Martineau's cottage, or to introduce any stranger to his daughters, or to ask any one to sit down with us at the evening meal. I can only say that, after a most delightful afternoon in most delightful company, where art, literature, and philosophy all were guests, I came away from this visit to one of the nineteenth-century prophets of the Christian Church with that admiration akin to affection which his writings had inspired in me deepened by this brief personal acquaintance.—The Outlook

MEETING AND PARTING.

BY REV. HENRY G. SPAULDING.

We meet by chance, but at our meeting find That thought and life and poesy and art Disclose the selfsame meanings to each heart; And tones accordant sound whenever mind To mind responds. Such ties may surely bind Us twain in friendship's bond. Our lives apart Will run; but on her mystic loom the heart New threads of golden memories shall wind.

Farewell. Too soon the sea will greet the land; Too soon old ocean's murmurings will cease, And soon our feet their different ways must go. Auf wiederseh'n! may Heaven have kindly planned That we shall meet again in joy and peace, Or here, or where celestial waters flow!

On S.S. Normannia, August 21.

DR. HALE AS A PUBLIC MAN:

WHAT THE BOSTON "HERALD" THINKS OF HIM.

[In its issue of September 1 the Boston Herald publishes the following interesting tribute to Rev. Dr. Edward Everett Hale. While the Herald rightly claims Dr. Hale as a proud and special possession of Boston, it is also true that his name and influence are known the country over.]

"Why didn't you tell Edward these kind things when he could have heard them himself?" said the wife of Dr. Edward A. Washburn to Bishop Potter, as she stood outside of the door of his study in Calvary rectory, tearful and grateful, as she heard one after another of his brethren say from the heart what he had been to them as a leader of religious thought and what he had done in his life. "He would have been gladdened and helped by them." It is often the case that the wisest and the best of men never hear the words that would have encouraged them in their work, because it seems as if they ought to do it without sympathy and appreciation; but when a man like Dr. Hale has reached the period of threescore and ten, though he would be the last man to seek it, it is not an improper thing to say what he has been to his generation while he is yet with us. More or less this has already come to him in the fact that his services have been widely recognized; but there is an emphatic word which may be rightly spoken in his presence and which his career justly deserves. For about forty years he has gone in and out here in Boston, claiming nothing for himself, meeting the opportunities of life, as they came to him, and making the lives of countless men and women the richer for his relations to them. No cause has needed a friend without having his response; and, the more hopeless has been the outlook for the individual, the more ready has he been to give his sympathy and help. Again and again, where a party has been cast aside, he has persisted in following the needy one with his kindness, saying that, when every one else had failed, it was the privilege of the clergy to cling to the unfortunate with the persistence of the Master over a lost soul. In the city, to know that one needed a good word was like a command to Dr. Hale to give it. Hundreds of young men on the threshold of a career, but needing encouragement, have found in him one who followed them with his love, and one who stood ready to help in a substantial way if this was required. He has not waited till others approved and a thing was popular before he gave a helping hand; but, if a cause was right, he has stood by it and made it popular. It used to be the inquiry, "Is Dr. Hale in it?" if one wished for the authority of an enterprise; but it long ago was taken for granted that he would have a part in every worthy matter that was before the public.

Such a willingness to give one's self to the service of others, and to do it in the spirit of one who feels thankful for the opportunity to do good, is not so common as it might be; and it has done more than any other one thing to place Dr. Hale at the head of those who live for others. Wherever a social service was to be rendered, wherever a cause needed a champion, wherever an oppression needed to be righted, wherever a worthy person needed a friend, he has been ready to render such service as he could. Dr. Hale has filled his life with the richness of these experiences. Some years ago, as Bishop Kemper, then in charge of the North-west, entered a railway train, one exclaimed, "There is the richest man in the North-west!" His companion replied, "I did not know that the bishop was a rich man." "He is not; but the look of affection that greeted him as he entered the car was worth more than you or I could buy, and we are not men of small wealth." So the interest in Dr. Hale, as he goes about the city, is based upon a public service which has had no limits. Wherever he goes, some one remembers this and another remembers that; and there goes forth to him a grateful tribute of respect which means infinite riches in itself. The late Dr. Holmes was a sunny and kindly man whom everybody loved; but his wit, his bonhomie, his humanity, were chiefly in response to what was addressed to himself. He had the personality that awakened an interest in others. Dr. Hale has a not less distinct personality; but the interest of the public in him is not due so much to his wit and genial personality—abundant as these are—as it is to the knowledge that underneath his brilliant play of intellectual gifts there is a kindness of heart that is unbounded. Wherever he goes, there is a response to the nobleness of his heart. Every one has found something in him that endears him to his fellows.

We have been so long used to his advocacy of what ought to be done that it is not easy to consider what he has done, but it would be much easier to tell what he has not done than to describe the rounds of his activity. During all the years of his service in a Boston pulpit he has been the pastor of humanity in a ministry at large. He has taken possession of the hearts of the people; and to-day there is, perhaps, no other man in Boston, among all the faiths, who so commands the reverence, the affection, and the respect of the people. He has not neglected his own flock for the service of others, but he has been in no sense a tea-drinking pastor among his own people. He has saved his time, so that he has met all his necessary duties; and he has never failed to be where duty called him. To-day he lives in the minds and hearts of thousands who have never heard him preach, but who have been won to him by some act of kindness that has changed the current of their lives. His relation to social issues, his interest in good citizenship, his close concern for the development of character among the young, his recognition that religion is the highest type of manhood,—many-sided as they all are,—have endeared him to young and old; and, eminent as Boston has been in great citizens, he stands out as the first and foremost man in this community for his helpfulness to all humanity. It must not be forgotten, in this connection, that he is one of our most voluminous authors, and that he is in constant service in a city parish at an age when he has earned the right to retire to private life. His career is an example of the largeness of heart that a man may put into his work when he lives up to the measure of his gifts. He has embodied the spirit of the Roman maxim, whose free translation is that nothing that pertains to humanity is foreign to myself. Boston is vastly richer for the life and services of such a citizen, and this brief tribute to his many-sided activity will find a warm response in the minds and hearts of thousands who have felt the blessing of his career.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

BOOK-ROOM CHAT.

The head of the procession marching homeward for new struggles, and let us hope new victories, has reached Boston. Every day brings numbers of ministers with sun-browned faces, who are on their way home. All express the hope that we are to have a good year, and that with the return of prosperity, which all predict, with the help of the National Conference meeting and a general revival of interest in our work, we may make a record the coming year of which we shall have reason to be proud, and for which we shall be truly thankful.

We have no new books to call attention to just yet; but we have some that would be new to very many of our Unitarians, and not only new, but interesting. We have complete sets of books of the following authors; and we hope that our congregations will remember this list when they are wondering what they can do in the way of a little gift for their minister or a contribution to their own libraries or the libraries in their towns, public or private:—

	Vols.	Price.
Rev. Wm. R. Alger.....	5	$9.00
" Joseph Henry Allen.....	6	6.35
" Cyrus A. Bartol.....	4	4.25
" Stopford A. Brooke, LL.D....	5	7.00
" John W. Chadwick.....	14	15.25
" Wm. Ellery Channing.....	5	5.50
" James Freeman Clarke.....	24	29.00
" Robert Collyer.....	5	6.75
" O. B. Frothingham.....	12	15.50
" Edward E. Hale, D.D.....	16	15.30
" Frederic H. Hedge, D.D.....	7	13.00
" James Martineau, D.D.....	10	21.50
" Dr. Andrew Peabody.....	10	11.90
" Theodore Parker (partial).....	5	5.75
" Minot J. Savage.....	28	26.20
" Edmund H. Sears.....	5	5.75

The prices given above are list prices, subject to the usual discount.

BEGINNING TO VISIT.

The treasurer has begun one of the agreeable duties connected with his office; namely, that of visiting the churches, conferences, etc. The summer camp at Weirs was a very pleasant beginning. The weather was cool, if anything too cool; but the greetings were not lacking in warmth by any means. It really seems as if we ought to make a great deal more of these delightful opportunities to meet our Unitarian friends. We ought to have hundreds more there next year than were there this year. It would be a good stroke of missionary work, as well as an agreeable social occasion. Next at the old historic church at Quincy. If our good Unitarians at Quincy are as liberal with their money as they were on the Sunday the treasurer visited them with their water, there will be no complaints that they have not done their duty. It simply poured on that day. We hope to see more of our friends in Quincy some time when the sun shines. There was considerable vacant room in the church on the day we were there.

Next Newport, R.I., the beautiful city by the sea, and in the beautiful church called the Channing Memorial, with its chimes and the noble statue of Channing in the park fronting the church, a lovely summer day, a good congregation, and everything as pleasant as it could possibly be. The church in Newport is alive, and we feel sure it will give a good account of itself this fall.

UNITY OF PURPOSE.

Can we not have this year a concentration of all our unities upon the one unity of purpose,—that purpose being the earnest, enthusiastic, persistent presentation of our denominational missionary work? Let every man and woman consider himself and herself a special committee of one to give the Unitarian church a lift in some way. If you can't work, you can pay: you can probably do both; but you can pay something, and you can do something, if you really want to.

Really, we haven't any record that we want to use as a guide for this year, either in paying or working. We never had such a chance; and, if we mean anything by our professions, now is the time we ought to show it. This Association will do all the work you will let it do; and, the more you give it to do, the happier will be those who have the work to do as officers and directors.

By the way, please remember that the American Unitarian Association is a church member. It belongs to all the churches. Always think of it as WE, not as you.

CHURCH COLLECTIONS.

Now that the churches will soon be open, we would like to say to those who control the collections, let us have your contributions just as early as you can, so that we can not only know what we dare undertake, but so that we may not have to pay interest on money to keep our work along until you pay in your contributions; but look out, please, and don't skip anybody who wants to help. And, if you wish, you may make a number of contributions. Quarterly contributions to the missionary work of the church is the old-fashioned way, and we can manage it, if you want to do it that way. We are ready, as the editor of the Register suggested last week, to receipt for money, no matter how it comes, by telegraph or mail. GEORGE W. STONE, Treas.

A LAPLANDER'S DRESS.

The operation of dressing in cold weather in the far north is so elaborate that it is difficult to understand how a deliberate boy or girl in Lapland can be ready for breakfast before dinner-time. First, two suits of thick woollen underclothing are put on, and over these goes a shirt of reindeer-skin, with cloth bands to fasten at the wrists. Sometimes two of these shirts, or kaptas, are worn, and a reindeer-skin vest beneath them. The trousers are of reindeer-skin also. Two pairs of heavy woollen stockings are worn, and the child who puts these on when they are damp is sure to have trouble with his feet. Around the feet a peculiar grass, well-dried, is carefully wound; and, over all this goes the shoes. Button and hooks and eyes are scarce in Lapland, all clothing is fastened by strings, and it is dreadful to think of all the "hard knots" that Lapp children have fumbled over while too sleepy to be amiable.—Harper's Young People.

Spiritual Life.

No human life would be possible if there were not forces in and around man perpetually tending to repair the wounds and breaches that he himself makes.—Mrs. Humphry Ward.

The man of large faith is the man of great inspiration and, naturally, the man of large life; for faith is not in itself an end, but a means to an end which is the enlargement of life in all noble and beautiful qualities.—E. Sloan.

God is the ally of every soul that seeks wholly to be true. Experience sooner or later corresponds to genuine and noble aspiration. Opportunities for heroism come to him who is fitting himself for heroic action.—Philip Stafford Moxom.

The question is not whether a doctrine is beautiful, but whether it is true. When we want to go to a place, we don't ask whether the road leads through a pretty country, but whether it is the right road, the road pointed out by authority, the turnpike road.—Julius Hare.

If I had only one prayer to utter, it should be this: Holy God, leave me not in the power of my own sins. Abandon me not to my own blindness; spare not my shrinking flesh; leave no hiding-place for my follies; wash me though in the bitterness of gall, if only so I may be clean; crucify me like my Master, if only so I may rise with him to the true knowledge of thy Fatherhood.—Dr. Bellows.

To be at work, to do things for the world, to turn the currents of things about us at our will, to make our existence a positive element even though it be no bigger than a grain of sand in this great system where we live,—that is a new joy of which the idle man knows no more than the mole knows of sunshine or the serpent of the eagle's triumphant flight into the upper air. The man who knows, indeed, what it is to act, to work, cries out, "This alone is to live."—Phillips Brooks.

To the wise man who lives close up to his opportunities, one day to look forward to is no meagre blessing. It is much, it is truly a royal privilege, if we perceive its almost infinite possibilities,—possibilities of thought which can traverse the centuries of human history; possibilities of feeling which may sound the depths of the human heart; possibilities of action which, on this one day, by some true word or deed, may change the whole course of a human life, may leave an undying memory or influence in the world.—John C. Learned.

The Sunday School.

The "New Song and Service Book," issued by the Unitarian Sunday School Society, is now in the third edition. Sunday-schools are ordering this new publication quite rapidly as the autumn work begins.

Every Other Sunday, Volume X., is now ready in one bound volume. In this shape the twenty-two numbers form a rich resource for Sunday-schools and homes of stories, anecdotes, illustrations, and apt teachings. Bound in cloth, price 75 cents per copy, postage prepaid.

The Unitarian Sunday School Society will not issue a new Harvest Service this year.

There are four reprints from which the schools can select, all of which have been popular. These are for the years 1887, 1890, 1892, and 1893. Price 5 cents a copy or $4 per hundred. Besides these the "New Song and Service Book" provides a large amount of material adapted both in service and song for harvest concerts.

Religious Intelligence.

(Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.)

BOSTON COMMON.—Rev. Rush R. Shippen of Washington, D.C., and Rev. Mary T. Whitney were the announced speakers for last Sunday's open-air service. These exercises, as has been stated before, are so happily welcomed by the public that they will be continued through September. Among the speakers engaged are Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D., and Rev. Frank A. Gilmore of Haverhill, Mass., for September 8. On succeeding Sundays Rev. Ida C. Hultin, Dr. J. M. Pullman, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, and others will take part in the services.

BROOKLINE, MASS.—The First Parish Church will be open next Sunday, September 8, and Rev. W. W. Fenn will preach.

CHICAGO, ILL.—The Stewart Avenue Universalist Church has already issued a carefully planned prospectus for 1895-96, showing that it will continue and even enlarge its various lines of work. The various sections of the Study Club are well organized, and their membership is very large. The work of the church is defined as "a serious attempt to serve our community along the noble lines of life, to find the spiritual and ethical meaning of all phases of life, to help misfortune, to create in our immediate social life an intense love for life's highest possible interests. We raise no barrier of creed. 'Tolerance and freedom' in pulpit and pew is our motto; to seek truth instead of defending past statements of belief, our purpose. Our doors are wide open to all whom we can serve. In the spirit of love and fellowship for all we set our hands to the tasks of the coming year, and welcome to our fast growing company all who may need our service and all who through us seek to serve others."

DORCHESTER, MASS.—First Parish: Rev. F. L. Hosmer of St. Louis will preach next Sunday at 11 o'clock.

GARDNER, MASS.—The people of the First Unitarian Church have been looking forward for several months to the ordination and installation of William Channing Brown as their pastor. The service is to be held on Wednesday, September 11, at 2.30 P.M. Mr. Brown is a graduate of the Meadville Theological School, class of 1894; and he spent last year as a graduate student at the Harvard Divinity School.

JANESVILLE, WIS.—All Souls' Church begins its services September 1; and the pastor, Rev. Victor E. Southworth, will preach on "Our Church: What can it do for Janesville?" The Fortnightly Club has planned a progressive course of study on "Ethics of Citizenship in History, in Literature, and To-day." The Sunday-school work is carefully organized. An unusual feature of the services in this church is indicated by the following notice on the announcements: "At the close of the regular Sunday services, after an intermission of fifteen minutes, the audience is called to order for a free discussion of the subjects involved in the morning sermon. The preacher is anxious to have every one remain, and enter freely into this discussion."

NEWBURYPORT, MASS.—Robert Collyer spent the month of August in Newburyport, in fulfilment of a large desire to share for a time the life of a New England seaport town. Though it was vacation time, yet the church was opened on August 18; and a large congregation dared the rain, and filled the house to listen to him. The following Sunday Joseph May received a warm greeting from his old parishioners at Newburyport, and gave them a powerful discourse, while Mr. Collyer preached in the ancient and quaint Rocky Hill Meeting-house in Old Salisbury to an audience that occupied even the window-sills; and, though the church is Orthodox Congregational, the people's delight was universal. Mr. Collyer also addressed a vacation meeting of the Newburyport Women's Alliance, at which two hundred women and some men were present.

OAKLAND, CAL.—The Oakland (Cal.) newspapers announce that Rev. C. W. Wendte, after nine years' faithful service, has resigned his pastorate. "The trouble is entirely a financial one. Mr. Wendte's relations with his church members are harmonious, and the feeling with a majority of them is that such arrangements must be made that his services will be retained. The resignation was written and sent to the trustees two or three weeks ago; and probably the main motive dictating it was a desire to place the trustees and church members in a position in which they would be perfectly free to do what they thought would be for the best interest of the church. Since the resignation was placed in their hands, the trustees have held several meetings; and one of their first acts was to pass resolutions heartily indorsing Mr. Wendte and calling upon him to remain. But Mr. Wendte said the matter should go before the church as a whole, as the Unitarian polity of church government is a congregational one; and he also insisted that, if he was to remain, some effort should be made to reduce the debt of the church, and make the general burden lighter. Mr. Wendte came to this city in 1886, after holding pastorates in Newport, R.I., Cincinnati, and Chicago. In 1871 he founded the Athenaeum in Chicago, which has grown so largely, and become a people's college. Since his arrival here Mr. Wendte has been very active in many enterprises which have been organized for the elevation of the people. He has delivered many lectures upon literary themes and upon the compositions of classical music composers. He is now president of the Alameda Humane Society, the Oratorio Society, and a director in the Fabiola Hospital and the Chabot Home. He was the founder of the Unitarian society in this city, and also of the Associated Charities and the Starr King Fraternity."

At a meeting of the members of the church, called to consider Mr. Wendte's resignation, a series of resolutions were unanimously adopted, expressing the regard of the congregation for its pastor and its desire for him to remain, and pledging itself to lift the debt on the church.

WEST DEDHAM, MASS.—The society in West Dedham have extended the vacation of their pastor, Rev. Obed Eldridge, to September 15, hoping that the additional time will enable him to regain his health."

IOWA ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of the Iowa Association of Unitarian and Other Independent Churches will be held with the People's Church, Anamosa, October 15, 16, and 17. It is hoped that friends farther West on their way to the National Conference will plan to attend this meeting. To all such the Conference would extend a cordial invitation. Leon A. Harvey, Secretary.

MINNESOTA CONFERENCE.—The annual meeting of the Minnesota Conference will be held at St. Cloud September 17-19. The conference sermon will be preached by Rev. William R. Lord of St. Paul. Mr. George R. Stephens of New Paynesville will read a paper with the subject "Fields White unto Harvest." Rev. F. C. Davis of Winona will speak of "The Scope of the Liberal Pulpit"; and to Mrs. W. A. Shoemaker is assigned the leading topic of the Sunday-school Conference, "The Difficulties and Advantages of Teaching without Appeal to Scriptural Authority." There will be a platform meeting, with short addresses by Rev. William Ballou of Fargo, Rev. H. M. Simmons of Minneapolis, Rev. A. W. Gould of Chicago, Rev. Marion D. Shutter of Minneapolis, and Rev. T. B. Forbush. Rev. F. C. Southworth, Rev. J. L. Andrew, and Hon. L. W. Collins will be present at the general meetings and share in the discussions.

UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of the Unitarian Sunday School Society. Additional donations to Sept. 1, 1895:—

Apr. 9.	East Boston Sunday-school.....	$5.00
" 10.	Templeton First Parish, additional..	1.00
" 10.	Stow (Mass.) Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 11.	Youkers (N.Y.) Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 13.	Cohasset (Mass.) Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 13.	West Roxbury Church.....	30.00
" 17.	Laconia (N.H.) Sunday-school.....	3.00
" 17.	Eastport, Me.....	16.88
" 17.	Madison (Wis.) First Unitarian Church.....	10.00
" 20.	Burlington (Vt.) Sunday-school.....	20.00
" 22.	Revere (Mass.) Sunday-school.....	3.00
" 23.	All Souls' Church, New York.....	100.00
" 23.	Channing Memorial Sunday-school, New York.....	20.00
" 23.	Fitchburg (Mass.) First Parish.....	10.00
" 23.	Brewster First Parish Church and Sunday-school.....	7.00
" 25.	Peabody First Unitarian Church.....	15.00
" 29.	Wilmington (Del.) Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 29.	Roslindale Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 29.	Needham Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 30.	Christ Church Sunday-school, Dorchester.....	10.00
" 30.	Asbury First Parish.....	9.51
May 1.	New South Church Sunday-school, Boston.....	5.00
" 1.	Alton (Ill.) Sunday-school.....	2.00
" 1.	Spring Garden Society, Philadelphia.....	25.00
" 1.	Milwaukee Sunday-school.....	2.00
" 1.	Church of the Disciples, Boston.....	50.00
" 3.	Sterling (Mass.) Sunday-school.....	6.35
" 3.	Berlin (Mass.) Sunday-school.....	6.00
" 6.	Cambridge Third Congregational Sunday-school.....	25.00
" 7.	Haverhill Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 7.	Lancaster (Mass.) First Church.....	10.00
" 8.	Dorchester First Parish.....	50.00
" 9.	Reading (Mass.) Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 13.	Mis A. R. Faulkner.....	30.00
" 14.	Winthrop (Mass.) Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 14.	McMullen (Wash.) Sunday-school.....	1.00
" 21.	Chelsea (Mass.) Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 21.	Bath (N.H.) Sunday-school.....	2.00

May 21.	Salem (Mass.) First Church.....	$8.23
" 27.	Church of the Unity, Boston.....	100.00
" 27.	Channing Religious Society, Newton, additional.....	20.00
" 28.	Harvard Church, Charlestown.....	19.35
" 28.	Philadelphia First Church Sunday-school.....	20.00
" 29.	Hartford (Conn.) Unity Sunday-school.....	10.00
June 5.	Hingham New North Church.....	16.00
" 6.	Brooklyn (N.Y.) First Congregational Society.....	25.00
" 7.	Brookline First Parish.....	75.00
" 7.	Canton First Congregational Society.....	20.00
" 10.	Hingham First Parish.....	65.00
" 12.	Weston First Parish.....	20.00
" 12.	Concord (Mass.) First Parish.....	25.00
" 13.	All Souls' Sunday-school, Roxbury.....	3.77
" 15.	Randolph Sunday-school.....	40.00
" 18.	Jamaica Plain Society.....	20.00
" 20.	Hawes Church, South Boston.....	25.00
" 24.	Barre First Parish.....	7.20
" 24.	Charlestown, N.H.....	7.00
" 26.	Petersham Sunday-school.....	50.10
" 28.	North Easton, Unity Church.....	27.00
" 29.	Lynn Second Congregational Society.....	12.00
" 29.	West Upton Sunday-school.....	10.00
July 1.	Billerica Sunday-school.....	10.00
" 2.	Neponset Sunday-school.....	110.65
" 2.	Buffalo, Church of Our Father.....	1.77
" 6.	Athol First Unitarian Sunday-school.....	50.00
" 11.	West Newton Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 17.	Somerville First Congregational Society.....	45.00
" 24.	Santa Barbara Society.....	5.00
" 26.	Harvard (Mass.) Sunday-school.....	5.00
" 30.	First Parish, East Bridgewater.....	15.88
Aug. 8.	John Capen.....	25.00

RICHARD C. HUMPHREYS, Treas.

Business Notices.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Four Hundred in All.—"Four Hundred" is a number which has become famous through the late Ward McAllister. But this has no bearing on the use to which we put it now. We only employ it here to comment upon the enormous number of styles of chiffonieres in the warehouses of the Paine Furniture Company on Canal Street. Such an immense variety gives to the purchaser an element of value in selection, which adds nearly twenty per cent. to the worth of his purchase. This is one of the great benefits from trading at a large establishment.

Deaths.

In this city, 26th ult., Sally E. Longley, aged 98 yrs. 5 mos. 14 days, widow of James Longley. In Malden, 28th ult., Rev. William M. Bicknell, 75 yrs. In Salem, 29th ult., Ellen Maria Grant, aged 70 yrs.

IN MEMORIAM.

MRS. HENRIETTA G. DORR.

On the morning of July 28 there passed from death into life a sweet soul, whose gentleness and strength came from that "wonderful compounding of the element of suffering with the spiritual forces" to such a marked degree that we who watched and saw the beautiful outcome feel like offering the tribute of a grateful memory. To many of us the mere mention of the name of Mrs. Henrietta G. Dorr will always bring to mind the chamber toward the east, where for so many weary months she taught us such a lesson of patience and trust. Herself the object of such a ministry of devoted love as never was exceeded, she still seemed to grow more and more unselfish and to desire to give all the happiness and gratitude in her power. No little neighborly attention was forgotten. No birthday or anniversary of any friend but had its special remembrance from her. She was particularly gracious in her thought of the aged. Her sympathies and attentions took even wider range, and included every one of whom she could hear who was ill or in any way afflicted. No undertone of pain ever disturbed the melody of her kindness. "So as by fire" was she refined. We went to cheer and comfort her, and every time came away feeling that we had been the recipients. George Eliot says "illness seems to me the one woe for which there is no comfort, no compensation"; and yet our dear friend, whose sufferings were most acute and constant, kept them from us, and, instead of complaining, gave us glad greetings.

Gradually, she dropped her various interests, and lived only upon love, to whose smallest expression she ever gave quick response. And so she left us,—richer far for having known her, inspired to effort by her heroic example, brightened and uplifted rather than saddened and depressed, as we recall her "serene triumph of spirit over hopeless anguish of body."

When she was laid to rest on the little hilltop at Mount Auburn, under a mound of flowers such as she had always loved, after the committal service her pastor, Rev. Mr. De Normandie, repeated Tennyson's beautiful "Sunset and Evening Star." And we seemed to see her cross the bar, meet her Pilot face to face, and enter the haven of eternal rest.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE

Unitarian and Other Christian Churches

AT WASHINGTON, D.C.,

October 21, 22, 23, and 24.

Messrs. RAYMOND & WHITCOMB have arranged for the accommodation of delegates and others who may wish to attend the National Conference an Attractive Series of Excursions at Very Low Rates.

Parties will leave BOSTON Friday, October 18, and Monday, October 21, under special escort. A choice of routes by boat and rail.

Additional Excursions to GETTYSBURG, OLD POINT COMFORT, Etc.

Send for special circular.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB, 2961 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

For the Christian Register.

ALONE WITH GOD.

BY REV. EDWARD F. HAYWARD.

Alone with God, when, in the dark together,
Sin and my soul in deadly conflict meet;
And, oft defeated, when, with broken tether,
I wander far from his constraining feet,—
Alone with God.

Alone with God, when, in the shadow waiting,
The blow descends from Sorrow's lengthening arm,
And o'er me fall with fury unabating
The waves of this world's unrelenting harm,—
Alone with God.

Alone with God, when, in some happier hour,
The joy I dreamed, yet half despaired to see,
Breaks on the heart, oh, then the blessed power
Of a life shared between such worth and me,—
Alone with God!

Yet not alone. For he who by the Father
Attended walks, has friends to cheer the way:
Nature and man and all things gayly gather
To speed with hope the long and silent day,—
Alone with God.

Sermon Gleanings.

MEN OF CLAY AND MEN OF IRON.

BY REV. W. F. PLACE.

"Quit you like men, be strong."—1 COR. xvi. 13.

Sculptors model in clay, but carve in marble. The clay changes form readily, every touch leaving its impress; and the lump that was fashioned into a saint to-day can be moulded into a villain to-morrow, while the marble retains each feature through the ages.

We note similar characteristics among men, and speak of men of clay and men of iron, men who are moulded by every circumstance and men of solid character, whether it be good or bad. Our political life presents abundant illustrations of these plastic men. Many people are swinging back and forth in their religious associations, not as conviction remoulds them, but as trifling circumstances shape them. We find in every community men who have chased every political, social, and religious phantom that has appeared.

The world has always honored men of iron; and all its heroes have been men of that metal, whether a Cæsar, a Hannibal, a Cato, or a Luther, a Savonarola, a Garrison. The world honors men that it can find when it looks to them for service, and can fully trust when it has found them.

We want boys and girls, men and women, of iron to meet the temptations of life. When our boys and girls go away to the city, we do not wish days and nights of anxiety for fear they may yield to the allurements of the world about them. When we employ them, we need the assurance that we can trust them. We need church members who believe something, and have enough iron in them to be trusted in their work.

We want men of iron in our politics. When we attempt to replace a man of clay in political life, we are not sure we have not put another in his place. But I need not enumerate the places where we need men and women of iron. It is wherever there is noble work to be done.

The thought of unfeeling hardness is often associated with the idea of men of iron. It is true of some men of iron, but it is not necessarily true. Luther, who was as immovable as the eternal hills for right, was tender and loving in his social relationships. Was Sir Philip Sidney any less a hero that he gave his cup of water, in the agony of his own dying thirst, to the wounded soldier? We need not fear hardness of heart in making ourselves men of iron.

It may be objected that, were men generally of iron, there could be no progress. Heat softens iron, so that it may be moulded into new forms. The heat of a living issue and the blows of earnest debate soften men of iron, and beat them into new forms. Thus this country was changed from pro-slavery to anti-slavery sentiments. Thus all great revolutions of thought are brought about. The men of clay can claim no real glory in any forward movement. They have been whatever the immediate pressure upon them has made them. I imagine that it is because we have lacked heat that we have reshaped men so slowly. It will not do to say, for instance, that Methodism has made so great progress and we so little, because it has worked upon men of clay. No: it has had the heat able to soften them and shape them to newer and nobler uses.

Can we do anything to change men of clay into men of iron? There is a mysterious alchemy that transmutes clay into iron, for all are plastic at first. We should use our best efforts to aid that transmutation. We should train our children to endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. We often coddle them into incurable babyishness,—and often more in religion than anything else,—instead of fitting them to be heroes. We ought to refuse to make a selfish use of the weaknesses of others, and so discourage them,—refuse to make the pliability of another serve us in politics or religion. Were a man to come to me and say, "I have had trouble with Deacon Jones, and wish to withdraw from my church and join yours," I should tell him to stay at home and settle his difficulty with his deacon like a man. Were I to do otherwise, I should not only encourage the very trait of character that I condemn, but manifest the same trait.

There are some who are doomed to remain clay through life; but, if there be a little sand in their composition, heat, the fires of trial, difficulty, affliction, persecution, may give them considerable firmness. I once heard a minister pray God to send persecution upon his denomination. It seemed to me a strange prayer; yet that minister knew that the fires of persecution would bake the clay men about him into some firmness and consistency of form.

You say that such a doctrine as this makes religion too hard! Our religion is hard. That is its glory. A young man can get through many a Western college before he could fit himself to enter Harvard; yet those colleges are begging for students, while the halls of Harvard are thronged. Live young men and women are not seeking the easy in education, and we commend their judgment. In like manner we are not seeking an easy religion; for we are building for eternity, and we wish our material to last. So we mould day by day, with painful effort, not the easily moulded, plastic clay, but the adamant that shall retain its beauty and its glory forever.

SELF-MASTERY.

BY CHARLES F. THWING.

Self-mastery, the last and highest stage in the development of character, has in itself, at least, three elements. One of these elements is egoism. By egoism I mean a just, worthy, and proper confidence in self. Great men always have egoism. It is the condition of aggressiveness. Without aggressiveness, no man proves himself to be great. Take Emerson's representative men. Plato, the philosopher, is the man of egoism. Swedenborg, the mystic, is the man of egoism. Montaigne, the sceptic, is the man of egoism. Shakspeare, the poet, is the man of egoism. Napoleon, the man of the world, is the man of egoism. Goethe, the writer, is the man of egoism. Each of these great men is a man of egoism. Each of them has trust in himself. It is not cockyism: it is not pride blown out so big that it has become thin, and is in peril of collapsing from its very big thinness. It rests upon the calm weighing of the evidence presented by one's self for doing great things. Some college men have too much trust in themselves. They are inclined to trust in themselves because they are college men. This is foolish while one is in college: it is more than foolish when one has gone forth from college. Folks will soon forget whether you are college-bred. They do not forget what you are or what you can do. To them the process of getting power is a zero. To them the results, the power itself, is supremely significant. Trust yourself exactly, and only for what you are and for what you can do. A proper self-interpretation will always produce seriousness in any man. It will also give to each man a sense of mastery in and of himself. And this mastery of himself will also give to himself a proper interpretation of himself. Egoism, not egotism, self-respect, not self-conceit, self-love, not selfishness, is an element in self-mastery.

Self-mastery also has in itself the element of work. The master of himself is a man of work. Work is both a cause and a result of self-mastery. Work is an expression of the worker. In expression man finds a larger self. Work is his alter ego, and also it may be a magnified ego. The piece of work done is a convex mirror of the worker. The expression of self in work reacts on the man, and makes him larger. The humblest work gives dignity to the worker who has put himself into it. Such an architect as the great Richardson of our own time must have felt this enlarged selfhood, as he saw his ideas soaring skyward, like birds on wings of stone. Such a poet as our own Lowell must have felt this enlarged selfhood, as he wrote the "Commemoration Ode" or "The Cathedral." Such a romancer as our own Hawthorne must have felt this magnified power of himself as he created the immortals. It seems to me that this is somewhat the meaning of the words written at the very beginning of the Bible, in which it is said, "God saw everything that he had made, and, behold! it was very good." This self-satisfaction of God with his own work helps to prove how good and great he himself was. He was in a sense more of a master of himself and more conscious of his mastery when he had finished the creation and looked upon it than he was before creation began. Necessity carries along with itself beneficences. The necessity of work carries along with itself enlargement of selfhood. And this enlarged selfhood means a larger humanity, and, if a larger humanity, a better and stronger one. Work magnifies. Ignorance minimizes. The person of the worker becomes so great that his own personality goes out into other personalities. He masters them by his own enlarging self-mastery. Work is thus both a cause and a result in this self-mastery of man. O my friends, thank God that you are called to be workers! Thank God that you are put in a world of work! Thank God that you are put in an age that calls for work! As you love your own self and wish to have for yourself the largest selfhood, ever and everywhere be a worker.

Self-mastery also has in itself the element of loyalty to the highest principle and the highest being. Self-mastery implies respect for all facts and truths. The freedom of self-mastery is born of perfect obedience to perfect law. The man, master of self, has sufficient intellectual acumen to see that there are personalities more wise than himself. The man, master of himself, has sufficient heart to feel the presence of personalities more present and more pervasive than his own. The man, master of himself, has sufficient will to recognize the fitness of his will being ruled by will more puissant. The man, master of himself, has sufficient conscience to accept the universal law of right. Men have long discussed whether God exists; and, if he exists at all, how? For us such discussion is ended. But more important than the mere principle of theism held by a man is the relation which the man holds to the God who is embodied in this principle. A mighty mental conception of the theistic fact may have slight influence over life, for the conception is purely mental. The conception is never translated into a personal principle of belief. A slight mental conception of God may have great power over life, for this feeble conception has been translated into a personal principle. The power of God in a life is a product made up of the multiplier of the mental conception and of the multiplier of the personal grasp which the man has on this conception. For one, I should prefer a feeble intellectual conception and a mighty volition grappling this belief to one's being before I should prefer a well-ordered intellectual belief and only a feeble volition to make this belief personal. But, when to a mighty intellectual conception of the God is joined a mighty volition which makes this idea a part of one's character, the whole person of the man comes into the largest, the noblest, the deepest, and the highest relationship to the profoundest principle, to the highest being. The man thus comes into a self-mastery,—a self-mastery which is born of loyalty to the highest, a self-mastery which results in loyalty to the highest. He has a self-mastery which comes from perfect obedience to perfect law. He is master of himself because he has found himself in this Master and Maker of us all,—God.

This self-mastery, as seen in trust in one's self, gives egoism. This self-mastery, as seen in work, gives altruism and a larger egoism. This self-mastery, as seen in loyalty to the highest, gives us religion.

This self-mastery never exists for itself. A part of the being of the individual man, it also holds relations to other individual men. It may be called a complex of self-masteries. All these self-masteries are to be adjusted each to the other. Each exists for all, and all exist for each. Every grain of star-dust has relation to all the worlds. Move it, and you change the centre of gravity of the universe. All the worlds have relation to the grain of star-dust. The worlds preserve it in its place and relations. Thus the universe, with its myriad stars, having infinite space to wander in, rolls on in perfect order, keeping time with the centuries and with the seconds. Each man, as he comes to his large selfhood, as he becomes master, has relations with humanity and divinity; and divinity and humanity have relations with him. He exists for all, and all exist for him. All of the component parts of humanity should move through the deathless ages in perfect harmony, in larger developments, in higher attainments of being. Israel came to his splendid zenith in Solomon, and then fell into the night of darkness and exile. But humanity in God should come, in the progress of the ages, to a zenith from which it should never decline, but whence it should seek a still higher and higher zenith, of which the limitations are to be found only in the infinite Godhead. Such, I do believe, is the destiny of humanity and of every worthy member of it. For this glorious consummation "the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain." Through all these struggles and trials and masteries the creation is reaching upward and onward to this glorious, infinite fulfilment. Such a consummation is the result of the adoption of sons into the love of God, is the recognition of the divine Fatherhood of the human spirit, is the making of all of love into law, and is the transmutation of all of law into love. All the disciplines of training, all the learning of scholarship, all the refinements of culture, are for the sublimation and extending of this self-mastery into God and into humanity.

INDIVIDUALITY.

BY REV. J. A. CHASE.

"But ye are a peculiar people."—1 PETER ii. 9.

Peter declares that the followers of Jesus are a peculiar people. Amid the millions who worshipped idols, they, a little company, worshipped God as Christ had declared him, as the loving Father of all human souls.

While even the Jew felt himself superior to other men, Peter rejoiced that in Christ Jesus "there is neither Jew nor Greek, neither bond nor free," but one common brotherhood; and so the followers of Jesus are called peculiar. They had besides certain distinctive traits of character that stamped them as peculiar.

Amid the degradation of pagan vice they at least sought to live pure, clean lives; and their noblest men, like the great apostle of the Gentiles, both preached and lived an ideal of self-sacrificing manhood that put to shame the worldly pride of the Roman and the spiritual pride of the Jew and the intellectual pride of the Greek. This new faith not only declared men, all men, no matter how poor or ignorant or vile, to be our brothers; not only united them in a common worship of the Father, not only purified morals and by its ideal of a noble discontent added a new and tremendous impulse to human progress, but in a very large and true sense developed a new and nobler individuality for all.

Individuality is that which individualizes one, those distinctive traits of character that mark a man as different from others. Individuality is not so much the mark of morality or immorality as of power. It gives positiveness and decision, and so also confidence and courage. It is that quality of character by which one resists the influence of circumstances and events, and makes these subordinate to the human will. It was that which enabled Grant to cut himself loose at Vicksburg from the timid Halleck and the government at Washington. It made Napoleon feel himself to be the man of destiny. It appears in the words ascribed to Cæsar: "The ship that carries Cæsar and his fortunes cannot sink." It distinguishes the moral hero everywhere, from the Roman Cincinnatus at his plough to Garrison and Phillips and Theodore Parker.

In literature and art and science individuality is the creative and organizing force that marks the difference between the man who can originate, who can think new thoughts and put them on paper, in marble, or on canvas, and the man who either unconsciously repeats or merely imitates and copies. Wherever you find creative and original force of mind, there also is individuality. The power that newly thinks, creates, originates, is always individual power.

Without the distinctive and positive traits that constitute individuality the mind is only a slate or sponge. It merely absorbs and registers its impressions.

Individuality is the transfusing and transforming power. Without it we are but mere harps played by every passing wind of circumstance, social influence, and opinion, docile enough, it may be, to learn from others, but with small power to think or act for ourselves.

Without some decided individuality our opinions are those of our party, our church, our neighborhood. They cannot be said properly to be our own. Without it one may still have a kind of religion, but it will be a borrowed one. He will think, feel, and act religiously after a certain fashion, but always as he is told.

Morally and intellectually, your man of feeble individuality is apt to be timid and conventional. It is not so much what is true as what is believed to be true that interests him. The mind of such a man until solidified from without is in a liquid state, and so can be run in any mould of custom, prejudice, belief, strong enough to grasp and hold it.

True individuality runs in no one invariable mould. It is that power that enables us to act on the thought, the customs, the opinions, the life of men about us, and to shape them anew and in accordance with our own will.

All really great and representative men are possessed of it. A man who has it seems often by a right, self-acquired and indisputable, to lay claim to the knowledge, the service, the skill, that others may yield him. Your man or woman of individuality, no matter how humble, stands out from his or her surroundings; and we seem to see the life about them reflected and intensified and magnified in them.

While people of strong individuality are apt to be decisive, positive, and aggressive, they are also sometimes narrow and conceited, egotistic and arrogant, disposed to imagine their own the most valuable type of character, and to measure other people by their own narrow standard. Success in life along any line, unless guarded against, may make a man fancy his own the highest type of superiority. The man of strong individuality often has the defects of his virtues. But, if narrow, conceited, arrogant, or egotistical, remember that he is strong not because of these weaknesses, but in spite of them. The strength of the arrogant man is not in his arrogance, but in the vigor and assertive force of character that sometimes goes with it. The strength of the conceited man is not in his conceit, but in the buoyant self-assurance and confidence that may accompany it.

The cure for these faults of individuality is not less, but a broader, nobler, more cultured individuality,—broad enough to show us not only our own strength, but our own weakness.

Individuality lies at the foundation of all solid and noble character. It is what puts us in possession of ourselves; and until we own ourselves what avails any other kind of ownership? How shall we best cultivate and develop individuality? We must learn to concentrate our forces, and not scatter ourselves. The man who aims at everything is likely to hit nothing. The foundation of individuality and of all else that is solid and enduring is "know thyself." We must know both our own strength and weakness, what we are and are not, what we can do and cannot do. The sooner we begin to find this out for ourselves, the better for us every way.

That is a good morality, that is a good religion, that is a good business for you, however it may be with others, that most helps you to be yourself. We want, then, to so train and educate ourselves as to acquire this self-knowledge.

Individuality demands of us a certain self-training and self-culture. What it chiefly requires is that we so think and so feel and so act that our thoughts, feelings, and actions be really our own. The church, the political party, society, our social set, all are continually asking us, either silently or openly, to agree with them; but, as we value our individuality, as we prize freedom and progress for ourselves and others, let us be careful how we suffer any agreement except it be an honest one. Said Goethe:—

"Self-contradiction is the only crime,
And by the laws of spirit in the right
Is every individual soul
That acts in strict accordance with itself."

The gospel, then, of individuality is this: think your own thoughts, and live your own, not another's life.

True individuality consists not in merely differing from others. It may quite as often, probably far more often, consist in agreeing with them. The two great forces of all progress, civilization, and society are self-interest and the interest of the many. Both, a narrow individualism and a narrow socialism, set these two forces in opposition. On the one hand, the man who measures everything by the standard of his own individuality is morally sure to sometimes mistake his own mere whim for absolute reason and prejudice for truth. Relying thus narrowly on himself, he is likely to treat with contempt the teachings of history and other men's experience, while he tries to measure everything by his own little one-inch rule. But there are ocean depths and infinite heights in humanity that his one-inch rule cannot fathom or explore.

Again, he who makes little of the individual, who fancies that a Moses, a Jesus, a Buddha, a Confucius, a Mohammed, and all great thinkers, heroes, and reformers, count for little or nothing in the unfolding of our race, makes the opposite mistake. The true philosophy of human society and human history recognizes both the force of individual men and also the logic of events.

And so we are led back to the thought with which we started. We saw how Christ and Christianity gave the world a new or Christian individualism, and that it did this by giving it also a new and Christian socialism. It taught the divinity of man as son of God. What truer foundation for a noble individuality than that? A divine nature shared in common by our whole human brotherhood. The law, therefore, of its use and development, not selfishness, but love. We are all part of one great living whole of God and humanity. The life we live is not our own separate and apart, but it is the life of God and of humanity flowing in our veins and welling up into thought and speaking forth in word and act. To try to isolate ourselves, then, means mental and spiritual weakness, paralysis and death.

AN ARMY CHAPLAIN.

At the thirtieth annual reunion of the 52d Massachusetts Regiment their chaplain, the late Rev. Dr. J. F. Moors of Greenfield, was constantly remembered. The principal paper was by Prof. Henry M. Whitney of Beloit College, Wis., read by Secretary Gere. Prof. Whitney was sergeant-major of the regiment, and messed with the chaplain during the regiment's campaigns, so that he, better than any one else, was fitted to write his memorial. Several short speeches of a reminiscent nature in memory of the chaplain were made; and resolutions expressive of the regiment's love and respect for him were adopted. We take the following from Prof. Whitney's paper:—

One day, among the many visitors to the camp, there appeared a man who became suddenly interesting when it was buzzed about that he had been appointed chaplain, and was arranging to go. He was the "pastor of the Unitarian church down town." He came in a buggy, driving a small black mare, whose name, we afterward learned, was Dolly. He was short and somewhat thick-set, but not fleshy. He had bristling black hair and beard, an olive complexion, a face that made you wonder whether he was not a Jew, an eye in which the white was somewhat conspicuous, but in which the principal things were brightness, directness, penetration, and a quickness to twinkle, a mouth firm, but mobile, and drawing easily into lines of either shrewdness or mirth. He seemed practical, observant, sagacious, responsive, with none of the far-away look or the abstracted manner of the scholarly recluse. Indeed, he might have been taken for a business man but for the color and the cut of his clothes. He seemed to know the language of scholars, but he spoke readily in the diction of every-day life. He laughed easily, heartily, and quite infectiously, but not noisily nor long. He had a good-humored word and a ready shake of the hand for every one. He had the manner of belonging with us in the democratic fashion. After glancing about and taking in the general situation, he went back to his home. Few of us had seen him, and few thought of the possibility of what he might be to us before our campaigning was done. It was only when we took that memorable train for our camp on Long Island that he really cast in his lot with us. Dolly came along with him, destined to seem an almost inseparable part of the chaplain's personality. Through the slow misery of cold and rain and snow and hunger and broken sleep in New York and on the Union race-course he was with us, but not in a way that especially helped us to know him. Then came the heavy voyage to New Orleans in the overloaded transport, with the gale off the South Carolina coast, the insufficient food and water, the nauseating condition of the interior of the ship, the burial of two of the men at sea, the passing of Key West, the stay at Ship Island, the anchorage at New Orleans, the landing at Baton Rouge December 17, and the entrance upon a winter of drill.

It was in this life at Baton Rouge that we began to find him out. At the age of forty-two he was in the full maturity of his physical, mental, and spiritual powers. He had brought along synopses of some of his most simple, practical, and moving sermons, with the idea of using them on Sunday afternoons; but he found few opportunities for work of that kind. One of my most vivid recollections of him is in connection with a sunset service in the grimy old foundry on the bank of the river. Here and there flickered a tallow candle, only making the darkness more weird. The sergeant-major lined off the hymns, all sang who had any voice, and the chaplain talked to us of God and duty. That was while we were still camping on the bank.

Then, you know, we moved back from the river some two miles to the field of the battle of the previous August. We were close to the cemetery; and beneath us were some of the dead of that fight, in burial so shallow that occasionally a bone would appear through the surface of the ground. The removal of men to the regimental hospital, the "Rainbow Saloon," became a frequent thing, so that there were sometimes fifty there, and sometimes the deaths were almost daily. The colonel was kind in taking time and strength to visit the sick, but to the chaplain it was a steady work. Sometimes he was not well himself; but he plodded on, and to many a wasted man the chaplain's visit was the one bright spot of the day. He was not merely sympathetic: he was shrewd sense incarnate. He had no illusions; and he told some men plainly that they were babies, and others that their sickness was largely or wholly their own fault. But he knew a brave man when he saw one; and his ministrations by the bedside were soothing, as his prayers were comforting and sustaining to the faith.

In this connection it would be foolish to conceal the fact that there were many prejudices against himself to overcome. It is true in all lines of life that we do not propose to like a new-comer unless we do; but he came to us under the disadvantage of not being the kind of a Christian on which we had fixed our minds. The regiment was made up in remarkable degree of people who were emphatic in their religious preferences, and those preferences in most cases not of the Unitarian kind. As long as people continue to care for their beliefs and to feel that character and destiny are affected by religious opinions, they will have very positive preferences as to the choice of their chaplain when they go out campaigning for a year.

Western Massachusetts is surely as positive as any part of the country in this respect, and Unitarianism has never been the faith of any large proportion of her people. Hence a clergyman of the Unitarian kind would have been the choice of very few of the men, or of those whose hearts went with us to the front.

Mr. Moors was, on the other hand, in his personal character peculiarly well qualified to be the compromising point, since not all could have exactly the kind of man that they preferred. His religion was to him a very genuine and simple thing, not perfunctory, not dwelling in abstractions or philosophizings, not regarding God from afar, not controversial in any primary way, with no touch of radicalism, and no fondness for making great discoveries that should call for the surrender of one's most fundamental and most cherished convictions. He cared a great deal about the Fatherhood of God, and showed it in every one of his talks to the men, and in the prayer with which the dress parade sometimes closed, or with which he committed to the earth some of our dead. He had very great worship for Christ. He was constantly constructive in his religious work, steadily seeking to ally himself with such good as he could find in men, and to help it to get control of their lives, leaving doctrinal attitudes to come out as they might. Hence, after we left Massachusetts, we remembered less and less that he was any particular kind of Christian, and thought more and more that he was a particularly godly and Christ-like man.

And this great victory he secured without any crafty silences or any effacement of his real self. If any candid person wanted to know what he thought on any subject, he was quite ready to speak. If any one showed a disposition to overbear the chaplain's right of private judgment, that man got a lesson, gentle but effective, that kept him from offending again. He shared the safeguards and the limitations of his school of thought: he could not be a sluggard; he could not be an evangelist. He just went along, thinking Christ-like thoughts and doing Christ-like deeds; and, if that worked slowly, it worked surely, quietly lifting up the men about him as the moon lifts up the tides of the sea.

Literature.

RHODES'S "HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES."*

Mr. Rhodes's third volume, taken as a whole, fully maintains for him the reputation which he had already earned. The introductory chapter is a general summary of the industrial and social progress during the decade 1850-60. To many of his readers we doubt not this will be the most interesting chapter in the volume; but we doubt whether such will be the most judicious among those whom he attracts. Something too much here of the spirit of Mr. Carnegie's "Triumphant Democracy," not in an aggravated shape, but tending to encourage what is least admirable in the temper of our American life. We should be glad to think the estimate of our moral progress and condition is substantially correct, but we fear it is too flattering. Quite the most interesting part of this chapter is the section, pages 18-45, which deals with the business prosperity of 1846-57, and with the relation to that prosperity of the tariff of 1846; also with the relation of this to the panic of 1857. Mr. Rhodes is too much of an historian, too little of a partisan, to ascribe all the prosperity from 1846 to 1857 to the low tariff of 1846 or to ascribe the panic of 1857 to the working of that tariff. But he argues carefully and conclusively that the tariff was one cause of

*HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES FROM THE COMPROMISE OF 1850. By James Ford Rhodes. Vol. III. New York: Harper & Brothers.

1 OF 400.

Consider the Chiffonnières, how they grow. We are showing this summer over four hundred different patterns, a veritable carnival of Chiffonnières in every word, size, style, and price.

At first thought it is almost an impossible task to examine so many designs. But omnia non pariter rerum sunt omnibus apta. Better an embarrassment of riches than a poverty of choice.

There is only one chance in four hundred that this is the Chiffonnière you will select. The realization of this fact makes a more minute description unnecessary. But it also emphasizes strongly the absolute necessity of your seeing our great Exhibition of All Styles instead of rashly accepting the first pattern you may chance to see in your search.

PAINÉ FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

the prosperity among many, and that with the panic of 1857 it had hardly anything to do. The Guthrie tariff of 1857, reducing the rate to some twenty per cent. on the average, was, he considers, one of the best tariffs ever enacted, but for its adherence of ad valorem duties. Owing to the panic of 1857, it did not have a fair trial. Perhaps the most instructive fact in the whole volume is the vote of both South Carolina and Massachusetts—the one solidly Democratic, the other solidly Republican—for the five per cent. reduction of a tariff already practically “for revenue only.” It is a fact that can be commended heartily to the unhappy few who honestly believe that a protective tariff has been Republican politics from the beginning, and that anti-slavery was an incidental matter. And how refreshing it would be to see once more Republicans and Democrats uniting for the furtherance of any object evidently tending to the public good!

Chapter II. of this volume—XIII. of the continuous work—deals with the winter of 1860-61 and the attempts to patch up some kind of a compromise that would stay the progress of secession. Here, as always in dealing with a political situation, Mr. Rhodes's method is that of discussion; and the outcome of his discussion at this point is that it was Lincoln who chose the dread arbitrament of war rather than make the concession of further territorial extension of slavery. A word from him would have determined Seward in favor of the Crittenden compromise, and the great body of the Republican politicians would have quickly fallen into line. Seward inevitably makes a very bad appearance all through the winter and a worse one in the spring following Lincoln's inauguration. One of Mr. Rhodes's critics thinks him too severe with Seward, begging us to remember that Lincoln was not known early in 1861 as we know him now. But this demurrer only covers Seward's offer to take the business of the government entirely out of Lincoln's hands. It does not cover his general attitude of indecision in dealing with the seceding States nor the imbecility of his scheme for making war with two or three European countries, in order to unite the North and South in a common war of defence. Lincoln's hesitations from his inauguration until the attack on Sumter are seen to have been all the hesitations of a policy resolved on saving the border States and putting those seceding on the offensive, in order to unite the North. In the second particular he succeeded perfectly, and in the first so far as to keep Maryland, Kentucky, and Missouri in the Union. The conduct of Buchanan during the last months of his administration is also very carefully considered, with the result of finding him not treacherous, but miserably weak. The popular conception of Floyd's treachery is very much abated by the facts which Mr. Rhodes sets forth.

In dealing with secession, Mr. Rhodes argues at length that it was a popular movement, into which the so-called leaders were dragged much faster than they liked. Correspondingly, he repudiates the doctrine of a conspiracy of the few precipitating the action of the many. Yet there were many signs of nervous haste on the part of the leaders and of a determination to stampede the reluctant and questioning into the secession ranks. The “Reminiscences” of Reuben Davis of Mississippi are particularly strong upon this side. Mr. Rhodes's argument, though able, is not convincing; and we shall not be surprised if his book excites more discussion at this point than at any other.

All that Mr. Rhodes has written of the Great Rebellion is resolutely bent on doing ample justice to the rebels. Evidently, he cherishes the hope that the persistent fairness and justice of his book will make it something of an eirenicon; and, though he may be disappointed to some extent, he cannot be altogether. But it must not be imagined that he has any monochromatic waste of indiscriminate complaisance for all the dramatis personæ and alike for all the tendencies and principles involved. Dealing with persons, he is extremely careful to do justice to their characters and motives; and here and there he qualifies considerably some of the conceptions that have been popularly entertained. Once, at least, his disposition to be kind and generous quite gets the better of his judicial mind. This in the case of Gen. Robert E. Lee, of whom he writes that “in all essential characteristics he resembled Washington; and, had the great work of his life been crowned with success, . . . the world would have acknowledged that Virginia could in a century produce two men who were the embodiment of public and private virtue.” But, surely, it must make a difference whether the cause in which a man enlists is one compact of justice and sincerity or one resolved on the perpetuation of a monstrous system of injustice, with which he allies himself in a miserable half-hearted way. If Washington, believing England in the wrong, had taken the chief command of her forces, no success that he might have achieved would have assured him the fame he now enjoys. And Lee falls short of such a fame not only by so much as he failed of making the Rebellion a success, but far more by so much as he joined himself to that side which was marshalled in defiance of the moral judgment of mankind.

But, however generously Mr. Rhodes may deal with individuals, there is no lack of sternness in his dealing with the causes of the war and with its moral character. The restoration of the Union was the formal object which Lincoln always kept in view; but that slavery might have freer course was the sole inspiration of secession, and the war logically tended to the destruction of slavery from the outbreak of hostilities. In his former volumes Mr. Rhodes, making a study of slavery, found it economically atrocious and morally degrading to both the master and the man. This being so, the cause that it inspired could not be otherwise than base, whatever elements of personal heroism and devotion were conspicuous as the war dragged its slow length along.

Mr. Rhodes concludes his volume with the rejoicings of the North over the military successes of the winter and the spring of 1862. Success had been the order of the day almost everywhere except in Virginia; and Grant's star is as clearly in the ascendant, as we close the book, as McClellan's is sinking in disastrous night. No abatement is made from McClellan's ability as an organizer or from the affection he inspired among his men. But the instrument he fashioned he had not the wit to use. His exaggeration of the enemy's strength was the absurdity of a monomaniac. Mr. Rhodes writes clearly of the battles and military combinations without undue amplification. In these parts he has availed himself of the criticism of Gen. J. D. Cox, thus insuring himself the utmost possible freedom from error or unfairness. The final judgment on the merits of Shiloh is somewhat less favorable to Grant than that of his own memoirs. Fremont's reputation is left in a bad shape. His emancipation business is exhibited as an attempt to blind the anti-slavery leaders to the abuses of his military department. None the less surely, step by step, we see the relations of the government to slavery tending to the inevitable proclamations of September, 1862, and January, 1863, and the Constitutional Amendment of February, 1865. To his treatment of the financial and foreign policy of the government Mr. Rhodes brings the same clearness and discrimination that he brings to all the rest of his impressive narrative of a great and stirring time.

J. W. C.

ETHICAL ADDRESSES. First Series. By the Lecturers of Ethical Societies. Philadelphia: S. Burns Weston.—With this volume easily accessible, there is no reason why any one who wishes to fully understand the spirit, purpose, and methods of the ethical societies should not do so. Indeed, the first address, by Dr. Adler, “What do We Stand for?” is a statement so admirable in its clearness and comprehensiveness that it leaves little to be desired except in the way of illustration. Dr. Adler has two other addresses,—one on “Prayer and Worship,” and the other on “The Modern Saint.” The former has a peculiar interest for those who know that at the outset of the ethical movement Dr. Adler drew the line between those who could and those who could not pray. It cannot be truly said that he has departed in the least from his original position. But he has come to the conclusion that “something is required to take the place of public prayers for those who do not pray, and who have no interest in religion.” Dr. Adler suggests “public statements of the great cardinal truths of ethics,” but adds that they cannot be manufactured out of hand. The objections to prayer are stated very seriously and respectfully, but an excessive literalness is their dominant characteristic. Many who substantially agree with Dr.

Adler still feel that prayer is a reality. But the absolute sincerity of Dr. Adler's procedure is in refreshing contrast with the subscription con amore, as one says, to the traditional creeds, while not believing anything they say in any obvious sense. Dr. Adler is pre-eminently the speaker of the ethical movement, and Mr. Salter as pre-eminently the writer. To read the former is always disappointing, so much we miss the vocal utterance. On the contrary, the fulness and richness of Mr. Salter's addresses can only be appreciated solus cum solo. He has three addresses in this volume, and they all invite us to an atmosphere of singular elevation. Mr. Sheldon's addresses are also two in number, and the one called “True Liberalism” is as well worth considering as any in the book. His ideal liberalism is no “mush of concession.” In Mr. Mangasarian we seem to find a much more sympathetic attitude toward Christianity than in the days when he first shook off the dust of his feet upon it. But the whole book is characterized by a breadth of sympathy that is more helpful and instructive than any particular doctrine or address.

TERMINATIONS. By Henry James. New York: Harper & Brothers.—An old proverb says, “Call no man happy until he is dead.” There is a hint of the same thought in the title of Mr. James's book, bidding us note the ending of a career before we claim to understand its significance. Two of the stories, “The Death of the Lion” and “The Middle Years,” show us each the death of a literary man,—the one ruined by recognition, taken from his protecting obscurity, and made a drawing-room sensation, the other longing on his death-bed for “another chance,” and yet understanding by the devotion of the man who gave up a fortune in order to be near him that “the thing is to have made somebody care.” “We work in the dark: we do what we can, we give what we have. Our doubt is our passion, and our passion is our task.” “Frustration is only life,” and life is what passes. “The Altar of the Dead” is a strange, appealing story, curiously mystical in its own analytical fashion; and “The Coxon Fund,” the one most expressive of Mr. James's subtle humor, tells the story of an intellectual parasite, magnificent in his dependence, who ceased to produce the day that he became able to publish.

THE FOAM OF THE SEA. By Gertrude Hall. Boston: Roberts Brothers. $1.—The ordinary summer reader will hardly be impressed by the opening story of this collection, finding it probably too mystical and elusive for one who wishes no mystics that are not comfortably explained at the end of the story, and preferring to fight shy of prose poems in general; but to many this will come as a strong bit of writing. The other tales are quite different. The spirit of “In Battlereagh House” is that of fashionable English life a hundred years ago,—the life of Beau Brummel and his friends, although no time nor place is given for the drama we are asked to witness. At the opposite pole of life and feeling is the story, “Powers of Darkness,” which shows a strength of thought we had not otherwise found. The stories are all well worth reading; though, if we could have but one, we would choose “Garden Deadly,” partly for its richness of language and description, partly for the originality and beauty of its conceptions. In it the old Circe is conquered again. Miss Hall is an adept in her chosen field of imaginative romance.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN: TRIBUTES FROM HIS ASSOCIATES. With Introduction by Rev. William Hayes Ward, D.D. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell.—The Lincoln number of the Independent has not been forgotten, and it was well to have the remarkable tributes printed at that time collected in book form. It forms a portfolio of portraits, each adding something to the delineation, and making together a noble tribute to the character, the many-sidedness, the nobility of the man we honor. The series of reminiscences extends from his early manhood up to the hour of his death. His private secretary, Mr. W. O. Stoddard, his law partner, Mr. Herndon, his early associates at the bar, Judge Welton and Mr. Littlefield, Mr. W. J. Ferguson, who was one of the players at Ford's Theatre on the fatal night, and many others unite in this testimony of respect and affection and faithful remembrance.

FOUR YEARS OF NOVEL-READING. By Richard G. Moulton. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co. 50 cents.—This is the record of university extension work in the direction of novel-reading, undertaken on the principle that literature is the science of life, and that the great classical novels are among its best text-books, to study which is the true antidote to trashy fiction. This is exactly the work that many of our Unity Clubs have been doing with programmes as carefully prepared and results as creditable; but this particular group of novel-readers live in a mining village of Northumberland, England. To an outline of the work done by the union is added four representative essays contributed during the four years since it was started; and an introduction to the book, written by Mr. Moulton, explains why cultivation of the novel-reading taste is desirable, and how it is to be attained.

HER MAJESTY. By Elizabeth Knight Tompkins. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.—This is a bright, interesting story, with no theory to expound, no cause to champion and desire to make converts, unless it be to the old credo that love is the best thing in the world, worth a kingdom, if need be. The reader has no inclination to study the maps of Europe to find in which quarter the domain of the royal Honoria may be situated. He will not even ask how it comes that a queen so truly a queen should occasionally use such purely American slang, or where she gained that American independence that led her to search out the wrongs of her subjects in the old-fashioned Haroun-al-Raschid manner. Perhaps she and Aline live together in Ruritania; but, if so, there are surely three delightful maids of high degree together.

CHRISTIAN CREEDS AND CONFESSIONS. By G. A. Gumlich, Ph.D. Translated from the German by L. A. Wheatley. New York and Toronto: Funk & Wagnalls.—This volume does not assume to be as elaborate as the volumes of Dr. Schaff on the same subject. It gives a short account of the symbolical books of the churches and sects of Christendom and of the doctrines dependent on them. The book has passed through three editions in the German, and will be found a very convenient handbook, presenting in a condensed form the most important doctrines of the various creeds. It will be necessary for the student to verify statements by referring to the original text, which is not given. The sketch of the doctrines of the most important sects is very brief,—too brief to give light and shade of opinion.

THE MUSICIAN'S YEAR-BOOK. Compiled by Margaret Reintzel. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.—The violet covers of this little book enclose quotations arranged for each day in the year, the general purport of which is sufficiently explained, perhaps, by the title. Poets, essayists, and musicians have written many noble words of inspiration or counsel for him who gives his heart to music, and it has evidently not been difficult to match the days with appropriate sentences. The dates of birth or death of many musicians are also given.

FORWARD HOUSE. By William Scoville Case. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.—Stories of adventure always find their readers, when written with any dash and spirit at all; and this one has enough mystery connected with its plot, at least in the beginning, to add that element of interest also. Mr. Case is a new writer, but one from whom we are likely to hear more. The fortunes of the Forward family were tragic and unusual, unrelieved by the lighter experiences that would find place in a longer story.

School Books.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co. have added to their Riverside Literature Series “The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table” and Hawthorne's “Twice-told Tales.” The Riverside Series constitute in themselves a valuable school library of English and American literature.

It makes light work of a heavy wash, does

Sunlight Soap

Possibly you are using it: if not, why not try it?

Brightens Homes Everywhere

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., New York.

The American Book Company publish White's "Outline Studies in the History of the United States" (30 cents). It is intended to supplement the Standard school history. The students are required to locate places, trace routes, follow lines of development, make pictures of objects, write opinions, and classify knowledge.

The American Book Company have issued an "Academic Edition of Webster's Dictionary" ($1.50). It is an entirely new book, abridged from Webster's International Dictionary, but following the plan of the form of Webster's Academic Dictionary. It contains a large amount of matter, a more complete method of indicating pronunciation; and the number of illustrations has been increased from three hundred and fifty to over eight hundred. It is excellently printed.

The new books that have appeared on psychology within the last two years show the place it has obtained in the academic and collegiate instruction. The American Book Company have just issued "Psychology in Education," by Ruric N. Roark, Dean of the Department of Pedagogy, Kentucky State College ($1). The book is written for the average teacher. It deals with psychology in education. The writer has wisely avoided the introduction of speculative metaphysics. Instead of finding this book a dry sheaf of definitions, the teacher will find it full of practical suggestion and useful precepts garnered from experience and observation. The teacher who studies this volume and seeks to apply the principles it expounds can hardly help becoming better fitted to deal with mind by knowing something of its laws.

Miscellaneous.

For over fifteen years Rev. Dr. Joseph Parker of London has been at work on the "People's Bible"; and Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls have just issued the twenty-eighth volume, which completes the undertaking. We have noticed from time to time the appearance of successive volumes, and need only add that the present volume is uniform in style, spirit, and method with its predecessors. It would be interesting to compare the later volumes of this work with the earlier ones, to see whether Dr. Parker has really grown in fifteen years. This is not, however, a critical or verbal commentary or one presenting the results of modern scholarship. It is a collection of sermons and prayers, covering the whole range of the Bible, and written in Dr. Parker's individual style.

The Magazines.

The number of Littell's Living Age issued August 31 is particularly rich in interesting articles. "Robert Burns," "At the Waterloo Banquet," and "The Defence of Fort Chitral" lead off. Then follows a description of "Old Italian Gardens," by Vernon Lee, and "My Native Salmon River," by Archibald Forbes. M. H. Spielman reviews "The Rivals of Punch," showing how many clever adversaries it has distanced. Banda Khuda writes of "Religious Movements in India"; and Beatrix L. Tollemache contributes an article on "Cranford Souvenirs," the chief fault of which is its brevity. There ought to be more of it.

There is nothing in the current number of St. Nicholas Magazine more fascinating for a child than the delightful picture of "The Kittens' Picnic," accompanied by rhymes for very little folk. "A Battle on Wheels," which opens the number, will be found amusing; and there are nearly a score of other poems or verses, most of them illustrated. The serials by Elbridge S. Brooks, Howard Pyle, and James Otis are continued. There are short stories by Candace Wheeler, James Baldwin, and Victor Mapes, and more serious articles by Dewitt C. Lockwood, Theodore Roosevelt, William T. Hornaday, and Jeanette L. Gilder, the last of these describing Antwerp and last year's exhibition there.

In the September number of Scribner's Magazine President Andrews continues his "History of the Last Quarter Century in the United States," with an account of the third term agitation of 1880, and the events that preceded and followed the nomination of Garfield, ending with the assassination. Parts of this are quite dramatic, and sum up in a few pages the meaning of events not yet forgotten by readers of to-day. Edward S. Martin writes of "Country Clubs and Hunt Clubs in America," and Henry Van Dyke uses the cry of the Canadian royaleurs, "Au Large," for the subject of a delightful article about the Lake St. John country. Abbe Carter Goodloe contributes a story of girls' college life, entitled "A Photograph." Robert Grant gives us another of his brilliant discussions on the art of living, considering "The Case of Man"; and there are several other articles of interest, including the conclusion of Anthony Hope's "comedy in narrative."

"Freemasonry in Boston" is a timely article in the September New England Magazine. It is written by Warren B. Ellis, and is almost wholly historical, though it appreciates the practical aims and work of the order, which was indeed an Ethical Culture society long before the term was ever formulated. As Mr. Ellis expresses it, "it is a system of ethics which helps us to believe in the 'fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.'" "Old-time Drinking Habits," by Charles Northend, and "License and No-license in Cambridge," by Frank Foxcroft, are two articles that supplement each other admirably, and show reason for encouragement to those who are working temperately for temperance. Winfield M. Thompson writes of the rich and undeveloped country of "The New North-east," meaning Aroostook County in Maine. There are several other articles of interest, including a fresh instalment of Helen Leab Reed's serial and short stories by Ada Marie Peck and David Lowry.

"Three Gringos in Central America," by Richard Harding Davis, "The German Struggle for Liberty," by Poultney Bigelow, and "Notes on Indian Art," by Edwin Lord Weeks, are the three important illustrated articles of the September Harper's. The last of these contains interesting views of the Taj Mahal and various beautiful mosques. "A Fifteenth Century Revival" describes the effect of Savonarola's preaching. David Graham Adey tells the story of the song, "Malbrouck s'en va-t-en guerre"; and Mark Twain narrates several personal experiences indicating mental telegraphy. Another group of seven searching poems by William Dean Howells is one of the most interesting features of this number. Mr. Howells means to force his readers to think, if he can; and he generally can, when he is in earnest. Ian Maclaren, Julian Ralph, and Thomas A. Janvier contribute short stories; and there is a leading poem by Julian Hawthorne, besides instalments of the serials and two articles by Owen Wister and Dr. William H. Thomson respectively.

Literary Notes.

A new edition of Miss Agnes Repplier's "Essays in Miniature" will be published soon by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. It will be enlarged by a new essay on "Ghosts." At the same time a new edition of her five volumes will appear in uniform binding.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co. will bring out shortly a "Whittier Year Book," a companion volume to the popular "Holmes Year Book" of 1894. The selections for this have been very carefully made, and the little volume will have a new portrait of Whittier.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From D. C. Heath & Co., Boston.
Le Voyage de Monsieur Perrichon. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by Benj. W. Wells.
From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.
Leighton Court, a Country-house Story. By Henry Kingsley. New Edition. Price $1.00.
From Macmillan & Co., New York.
A Ringby Lass, and Other Stories. By Mary Beaumont. Price 75 cents.
Mr. Isaacs. By F. Marion Crawford. Paper, price 50 cents.
Lyre and Lancet. A Story in Scenes. By F. Anstey. Price $1.25.
Maid Marian and Crotchet Castle. By Thomas Love Peacock. Price $1.25.
From the Open Court Publishing Company, Chicago.
The Gospel of Buddha, according to Old Records. Told by Paul Carus.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "A Year of Miracle," "Blessed be Drudgery," etc. Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. (In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents; 10 copies for 30 cents.)
CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."
In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition, on rich, tinted paper, silk-stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "tuck in with wedding-gifts."

[From The New Unity, May 2, 1895.]

The selection we give in another column from "The House Beautiful"—one of Mr. Gannett's uplifting studies which James H. West has just published—was not made because it was the most inspiring word the pamphlet contains. Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on "The dear Togetherness" is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. But this extract was selected simply because it was the shortest that could be made to stand by itself. By sending its publisher fifteen cents our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so.

* Sent postpaid on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, Boston.

Complete List of Published Books

BY EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

1848	*The Rosary (edited)
1850	*Margaret Percival in America
	*Scenes from Christian History
1852	*Letters on Irish Immigration
1854	*Kansas and Nebraska
1855	*Prize Essay on Juvenile Delinquency
1856	*America
1860	*Elements of Christian Doctrine. Sermons
1861	*Ninety Day's Worth of Europe
1863	The Man Without a Country. Cloth Ill. $1.50, Cloth Plain, School Edition, 50c. Boards, 25c., Paper 20c.
1865	*The President's Words
1868	If, Yes, and Perhaps; now called The Man Without a Country and other Stories
1869	*Puritan Politics in England and New England
	*Sybaris and other Homes	Cloth	$1.25
	The Ingham Papers	"	1.50
1870	Ten Times One is Ten	"	1.00	Paper .25
	Neither Scrip nor Money	"		.15
	Daily Bread and Other Stories	Cloth	.80
	Daily Bread	"	.40	" 20
	How to Do It	"	1.00
1871	Ups and Downs	"	1.50
1872	Christmas Eve and Christmas Day	"	1.25
	Six of One by Half a Dozen of the Other; with Miss L. F. Hale and others.	Cloth	1.50
	His Level Best and other Stories	"	1.25
1874	*Workingmen's Homes	"	1.25	Paper .75
	A Summer Vacation	"		.50
	In His Name	Cloth Ill. $1.25; Cloth	1.00	" .25
1875	Our New Crusade	"	1.00
	*One Hundred Years Ago	"		.25
1876	Philip Nolan's Friends	"	1.50
1877	G. T. T. or the Wonderful Adventures of a Pullman	Cloth	1.00
1878	What Career	Cloth	1.25
	Mrs. Merriam's Scholars	"	1.00
1879	*Life in Common and other Sermons	"	1.25
1880	*The Kingdom of God and other Sermons	"	1.25
	Crusoe in New York	"	1.00
	Stories of the War (edited)	"	1.00
1881	June to May. Sermons	"	1.25
	Stories of the Sea (edited)	"	1.00
	Stories of Adventure (edited)	"	1.00
	A Family Flight through France and Germany; with Miss Susan Hale.	Cloth	2.25	Boards 1.75
1882	A Family Flight over Egypt and Syria; with Miss Susan Hale	Cloth	2.25	Boards 1.75
1883	Stories of Discovery (edited)	"	1.00
	Seven Spanish Cities	"	1.25
	A Family Flight through Spain; with Miss Susan Hale	Cloth	2.25	Boards 1.75
	Story of Spain; with Miss Susan Hale	"	1.50
1884	A Family Flight Around Home; with Miss Susan Hale	cloth	2.25	Boards 1.75
	The Fortunes of Rachel	"	1.00
	Christmas in a Palace	"	1.00	Paper .25
1885	Christmas in Narragansett	"	1.00	" .25
	Stories of Invention (edited)	"	1.00
	What is the American People?	"		.20
1886	Easter (Sermons)	Cloth Gilt .75, Cloth Plain .50
	A Family Flight through Mexico; with Miss Susan Hale	Cloth	2.25	Boards 1.75
	Boys' Heroes	Cloth	1.00
1887	Franklin in France; with E. E. Hale, Jr.	2 Vols. Cloth, each	3.00
	Life of George Washington. Studied Anew	Cloth	1.75
	Lights of Two Centuries (edited)	"	1.40
	Chautauquan History of the United States	"	1.00
	Back to Back	"		Paper .25
1888	The Arabian Nights (edited)	"	.50	Boards .40
	Mr. Tangier's Vacation	"	1.00	Paper .50
	How They Lived in Hampton	"	1.00	" .25
	My Friend the Boss	"	1.00
	Red and White	"		.20
	Tom Torrey's Tariff Talks	"	.50	" .20
1889	Sunday School Stories (edited)	2 Vols. Cloth, each	1.00
1891	Four and Five	Cloth	1.00
	The Story of Christopher Columbus	"	1.25
	James Freeman Clarke, Autobiography, Diary, and Correspondence (edited)	Cloth	1.50
	Colonel Jack (edited)	"	.75	Paper .25
	The Story of Massachusetts	Half Morocco 2.00, Cloth	1.50	Boards .40
	Afloat and Ashore	"
1892	The New Harry and Lucy	Cloth	1.25
	Sybil Knox or Home Again	"	1.00
	East and West or the New Ohio	"	1.00
	*Maltese Cross	"		.10
1893	Every Day Sermons	Cloth	1.00	Paper .50
	A New England Boyhood	"	1.00
	Sermons of the Winter	"	1.50
	One Good Turn	"	.30	" .20
	Ralph Waldo Emerson	"		.10
	For Fifty Years. Poems	"	1.00
	If Jesus Came to Boston	"	.50

Books on the above list marked with a star (*) are out of print, but possibly may be picked up. We shall be pleased to try to fill such orders at lowest rates to the purchaser. Orders for the balance will be executed promptly from this office.

J. STILMAN SMITH & CO.
3 HAMILTON PLACE, BOSTON.

The Home.

For the Christian Register.

LIKE AS A FATHER.

BY MARY CURTIS BAIRD.

As when a child wakes trembling in the night,
And gropes for tender hands to draw it near,
Waits for the loving voice that soothes its fear,
Then sinks back, sighing, wholly eased from fright,
And all untroubled sleeps until the light,

So starts my soul from rest in faiths held dear,
Appalled at sudden loss of meaning clear;
Afraid to judge,—uncertain of the right,
Then, yearning still for one to hear and care,
In terror of the deepening gloom I cry.

The answer swift comes to my wordless prayer,
And all my doubts and anxious questionings fly.
For, having heard His voice and touched His hand,
I do not ask to know or understand.

For the Christian Register.

LITTLE GITANA.

BY L. J. SANDERSON.

Little Gitana is a Spanish gypsy girl, with thick black hair, and big, bright, dreamy eyes, with a graceful body which wriggles and turns and twists, as only the body of a little gypsy child can do.

She lives in the side of a mountain, where there are many caves in which many other little gypsies live. Little Gitana's home is in four caves cut into the rock. In the first cave is the living room, beyond it is the basket room, while on each side are the bedrooms. Pictures, images, flowers, tambourines, castanets, cymbals, and baskets adorn the wall and hang from the ceiling.

The entrance to the cave is shaded by the tall cactus plants, with bright blossoms of red and yellow. Here lives Gitana. When she was very small, her little fingers were taught to weave the little baskets which she sells to the visitors, and her tiny feet were taught to dance.

The day we saw her she balanced herself and performed the most wonderful tricks with her heels and toes; while her little body, gayly dressed in red and yellow, turned and swayed, and her little arms held up the cymbals which her tiny hands brought together with a clash and clang in time with the turn of her body and the steps of her toes. Her gypsy father played the tune upon his guitar, while the gypsy mother wove the bright-colored baskets.

The little Gitana dances and sings as the days go by.

When she was yet but a tiny child, she was taught to read the lines of the hand, so that by and by, when she was older, she could roam about the country, telling the good or ill fortunes which would come to the fair ladies whose hands were stretched out to her wise eyes. As soon as she could talk, she was taught to beg; for begging is a part of the gypsy life. After she danced for us that summer day, as we sat in the cave, she brought her little baskets to sell, asking us in the most winning, irresistible way to buy; and, as we stepped into the carriage, she jumped about the wheels, she ran alongside, always calling, "Propina! propina!" which means a present of money, and would not leave us until we shook some coins into her hands, notwithstanding that we had already paid to enter the cave and to see her dance. And thus little Gitana and hundreds of other gypsy children live in the caves in Southern Spain, where they work and dance and sing and beg, out among the sunny rocks and flowers, looking above to the bluest of blue skies, and across the tall palms to the purple hills and the snow-topped mountains, or in the cool shade of the mountain cave.

A PAIR OF SHOES.

Bertha sat on the floor, critically eying a pair of new shoes. Shaking her head, she said complacently:—

"Yes, they look pretty nice, very nice; but," she added with a sigh, "I would have liked a pair of red ones. Mamma, when I was at the store this morning with grandma, I saw a lovely pair of red shoes. I asked her to get them for me; but she said she thought you did not care for colored shoes, now don't you?"

"Why, I don't know, my dear," answered Mrs. Bartlett, laughing at something that had come to her mind with Bertha's question. "I guess grandma was thinking of a time when I did like colored shoes."

"Well, I think she was, too; for she laughed, and told me to ask you if you liked them. I guess it is one of grandma's jokes. Do tell me what it is, mamma. Did it happen when you were a little girl?"

After waiting a moment, her mother smilingly replied: "Yes, it was something when I was a little girl that made grandma laugh; but we didn't laugh at the time it happened, you may see. Get your work, and I will tell you.

"The shoes that grandma and I were thinking of were purple ones, brilliant purple, with little flat heels, laced up the front, and reaching just above the ankles."

"Oh, dear, how funny they must have been!" laughed Bertha.

"Yes, as I look at them now, they must have been queer little shoes; but at the time they were bought they were just as beautiful in my eyes as the red ones which grandma refused to buy for you this morning. When I was a little girl, I lived in a small town in Ohio, where my father was the physician. He had not grown rich, for it was an exceedingly healthy place. No one was very rich, no one was very poor. I had played all my life with little girls and boys brought up just as I was, caring more for a good time than for fine clothes.

"I had a playhouse built by a young uncle, but the furnishings were not such as children's playhouses have in these days. My dishes were broken bits of china and glass, and among them were some that were so fine in my childish eyes that they were only used upon state occasions. Well, as I said, I played, and was very happy with my little friends, never caring for anything different from what we had. But one day something new appeared to us. Hattie Ray, my particular friend, had a cousin come to visit her from New York. She astonished us all by her clothes. Never had we seen anything so gorgeous in all our small lives, such dainty dresses and silk aprons with tiny pockets and bows, such beautiful stockings and shoes,—colored shoes, red and yellow and brown. For very common wear she had black ones. These different articles of clothing pleased the different fancies of the children. Hattie told me in confidence she meant to coax her mother to give her a silk apron with pockets for her next Christmas present.

"But nothing pleased me as did the shoes. Every night when I went to bed my last thought was of those colored shoes, and I resolved to have some red ones myself when I was rich. It was the 14th of June, just two days before my birthday, that my mother called me into the kitchen where she was making pies, and said:—

"Lizzie, you had better go down to Mr. Stout's, and get a pair of shoes. These are too badly worn for Sunday. I intended to go myself, but I shall not have time. You have been alone before, and know what to do. Get the shoes a size larger and like those you have on. They are pretty heavy for summer, but they wear well," she added, more to herself than to me.

"Taking from its peg my little pink sunbonnet, I started down the path toward that part of the village where the few stores stood. It was a warm day, and I walked slowly along till I came to the little foot-bridge across a tiny stream. This was a resting-place where we children invariably stopped. Here the branches of a big willow tree overhung the little brook, making it a pleasant, shady place. Sitting on the edge of the bridge, with my feet dangling over the side, my glance fell upon the shoes I wore. Coarse and ugly but substantial shoes they were, bought for service, not for looks. Heretofore the prospect of a pair of new shoes had been quite enough to make me happy, but to-day the spirit of envy had taken hold of me. Why couldn't I have dainty shoes, like Mary Lester's? Why had my mother said I should get more just like these hateful old things?

"I rose impatiently from my seat on the bridge, giving the little feet in the coarse shoes an angry stamp as I did so. Going down the road, I grew crosser and naughtier until I reached the one long street where the stores were. Here I stopped to look in the windows to see the things that I had seen a 'hundred years,' I said to myself crossly. Suddenly my gaze fell upon a little china tea-set on exhibition. Now I had looked at this same little tea-set with its wild roses and pretty vines a great many times; but the mark, $1.00, had always made it seem far away. All the girls from Jennie Todd, four years old, up to big Mary Roberts, wanted that tea-set. They had longed for it ever since the designing store-keeper had put it in his window.

"I wonder who will get it?" I said to myself, with a sigh.

"Nowadays that tea-set costing a dollar would seem a small thing. But a dollar in those days was a great deal to spend for a child's plaything. I stood here some time, looking and thinking. I wondered if the tea-set would be sold before I was grown up and could buy it for myself. Finally, I walked down the street, forgetting about the fine shoes in the desire for the tea-set. Suddenly I stopped with a cry of astonishment. I had reached the shoe store; and, glancing up, what did I see among the same old men's boots with their long leather tops, and the boy's shoes with their thick soles and copper toes? Could I believe my eyes? There, like a dainty little princess, was a pair of red shoes,—yes, and further on a pair of purple shoes, too. Colored shoes! Red, purple, and brown! such beauties! A long time I stood there, looking at them, then hurried into the shop.

"How d'ye do, Missy?" cried the old shoe-maker, who had known me since I had worn my first pair of shoes. "Want a pair of shoes, do ye? Well, let me see, what kind does mother want?"

"Under my downcast eyes on the counter was a pair of shoes like the ones I wore. They seemed to read my thoughts, and look at me with reproach. I turned my eyes resolutely toward the window as I replied:—

"A pair of red ones, please." As the words left my lips, my heart gave a great bound, my boldness almost took away my breath.

"Did you say red ones, dearie? I am getting a little hard of hearing these days," putting his hand to his ear.

"Yes, sir, red ones," I answered loudly.

"U-m-yes, yes," doubtfully. "Did your mother say you should get red ones? These are only for show, just a few pairs. Still, they are for sale, too," he added quickly, as he saw the look of disappointment on my face.

"But I'm afraid I haven't the size," looking down at my old shoes, "have only a couple of pair; but the purple ones, guess they are about your size."

"Going to the window, he took out the purple shoes, placing them in my hands. As my fingers pressed the delicate leather, and I looked at the bright pretty things, my last good thought fled. I would have the shoes! Sitting on the old bench, Mr. Stout tried them on, and rather reluctantly said:

"They are all right," and added as he wrapped them up, "don't get the soles soiled, or I can't take them back; and it may be your mother won't want to keep them."

"No, sir," I said: "father will be in to-night to pay for them."

"That's all right, child, that's all right. Mind now, that you do not get those shoes dirty."

"I hurried down the street, only stopping once to take a look at the tea-set. Down the path I flew, with the precious shoes in my arms. When I reached the old willow,

I sat down, and wiped my hot little face and smiled. Those beautiful shoes! I would just take a little bit of a look at them. Breaking a tiny hole in the paper, I looked in. What a beautiful color they were! Slowly I untied the end, and took out first one, then the other. I turned them over, and wondered how I would look walking about in them. I unlaced one of my old shoes, took it off, and thrust my foot into the new one. Then I stood up on the paper with both feet close together. How ugly the foot in the old shoe looked! Sitting down again, I removed the obnoxious shoe, and put on the other purple one. How fine and handsome they were! It did not matter to me that my dress was an old and faded print. I had no eyes for anything but the purple shoes. What was it Mr. Stout had said about getting the soles soiled? He could not take them back. I would have to keep them. Softly I lifted one foot from the paper, and put it on the ground, then the other. In alarm at my naughtiness, I quickly stepped back on to the paper. Here I stood for a moment undecided, then with a firm step I walked back and forth several times to the bridge. The soles were soiled enough now! A naughty spirit within me said, "Wear them home, then your mother can't possibly take them back."

"Putting on my sunbonnet, which I had taken off that I might better see my feet, I started once more for home with my old shoes in my hand and my eyes fastened on the bright-colored ones upon my feet. As I neared home, I wondered what my mother would say, and if she would be very angry. Then I walked very slowly, and by the time I had reached the gate I had almost stopped. But I must go in some time. So, plucking up my courage, I entered by the kitchen. My mother was still busy with her baking. She did not look up as I entered, but said:—

"Why, child, how long you were gone. Did you get the same kind of shoes? Let me see."

"All my courage failed. Speechless and guilty, I stood in the doorway waiting. As my mother turned quickly at receiving no answer from me, her gaze fell upon the bright-colored shoes.

"Why, what in the world—where did you get those? Why don't you answer me? Lizzie, do you mean to say that Mr. Stout told you to take that kind of a shoe instead of those you have always worn?"

"No—no—mamma," I cried, finding my tongue at last. "It wasn't Mr. Stout's fault. He didn't want me to take them: it was just myself, my other ones were so ugly. I—I—I—O mamma, I didn't think you would care so much." The look of sorrow and reproof on my mother's face was too much for me. "I am sorry, indeed I am," I sobbed.

"My mother stood looking at me in silence for a moment, as I threw myself into the old rocking-chair, crying as though my heart would break.

"Take off those shoes, and put on your old ones," she finally said. Walking to the closet where she kept her best china, she took down an old blue sugar-bowl that had belonged to my great-grandmother. In this she often kept bits of change. She took from it now four quarters; and, laying them on the table beside me, she said:—

"Here is a dollar your grandmother gave me. With it I was to get the little tea-set

103 COOK BOOK

Remember these Directions for using Cottolene

108 COOK BOOK

For shortening never use more than two-thirds as much Cottolene as you would of lard. When frying with Cottolene always put it in a cold pan, heating it with the pan. Cottolene produces the best results when very hot, but as it reaches the cooking point much sooner than lard, care should be taken not to let it burn—when hot enough, it will delicately brown a bit of bread in half a minute. Follow these directions in using Cottolene and lard will never again be permitted in your kitchen or in your food. Genuine Cottolene is sold everywhere in tins with trade-marks—"Cottolene" and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY, Chicago, 224 State St., Boston, Portland, Me.

you liked so much. It is a great deal to use for such a purpose, but your grandmother thought she could afford to give you that on your birthday."

"My heart gave a great leap at the mention of the tea-set, but sank suddenly as my mother continued:—

"This dollar," putting down another, I had saved that you might buy some candy, nuts, and apples, and on your birthday enjoy your new tea-set with your little friends. Put on your old shoes, take this money, and go to Mr. Stout and ask him to give you a pair of shoes like the ones you are now wearing."

"There was a look of sternness in my mother's face I had never seen there before, a look that forbade any coaxing. Picking up the purple shoes from the floor, she carefully wiped them, saying,— "Purple shoes will hardly look well with your green muslin dress, so I think we will put these away. You could only have worn them once or twice anyhow, they are so frail."

"Once more I put on my little sunbonnet, and once more I travelled the old path across the bridge and under the willows,—a sadder, but a wiser little girl."

"But the tea-set, mamma the tea-set, didn't you get it afterwards?" eagerly asked Bertha.

Mamma laughingly shook her head.

"I don't think I ought to tell anything more," she said. Bertha, well knowing her own shortcomings, and the fact that they were so often overlooked by a fond and doting grandmother, looked so disappointed at this reply that Mrs. Bartlett hastened to add:—

"The next time I passed the china store the dear little tea-set was gone. If I cried over the discovery, no one knew it but the old willow, who knew and kept so many childish secrets. For a long time I mourned the fact that I might have had the pretty china. My punishment was hard; for my birthday came and went just like any other day, but I knew I deserved it."

"Oh, dear," said Bertha, "I was so in hopes that you got the tea-set after all."

"Well, dear, I did, after six months in which to think over my wrong-doing. Grandmothers of your day and grandmothers of mine were very much alike; for, when Christmas came around, my dear grandmother put the tea-set into my hands herself. Feeling sorry for me, but knowing I deserved the punishment, she had bought the little dishes, and kept them all that time."

"Well, I must say, I think you did very wrong, mamma, to get the shoes; but still I am glad you could have the tea-set. Purple shoes! I don't think I ever could have wanted shoes of that color."—Cornelia A. Donaldson, in the Interior.

HOW WILLIE AND I RODE PIG-BACK.

They were the sweetest pigs you ever saw; and Michael O'Dowd, the farm steward, had bought them for father at the fair of St. Anne's.

One was a little fat white pig, with a curly tail, and the other was a little fat black pig, with a straight tail; and they had the cunningest eyes, and were so smooth and clean that Willie and I agreed they were "perfect ducks of pigs."

I think we both rather preferred the black one,—he was so very black, and was such a sociable little fellow.

One night shortly after their arrival, when Willie and I had gone to bed, and nurse had carried away the lamps, Willie crept out of his cot, and hopped into mine.

He had been making a wonderful plan; and, as it was a dead secret, we had to talk about it under the bed-clothes.

He thought if we were to get up very early, before nurse came in, and go out doors, and mount those sweet new pigs, we could soon train them nicely; and what did I think of that for fun?

I squeaked with delight down under the blankets. Willie said he had told his plan to Micky O'Dowd, the steward's son, who was quite an old boy, about nine years of age, and that Micky had promised to help, and would meet us at the pig-sty as soon as it was light.

Morning came; and, oh, what a time we had dressing ourselves! Everything that tied on we tied in hard double-knots, and everything that buttoned on we buttoned before instead of behind, which made the armholes uncomfortable. We crept out by the study window, as the great front door was still bolted and barred.

Micky was on hand, and so were the pigs. I was a little disturbed to find that I must ride like a boy, for the pigs simply wouldn't be saddled.

Micky chased our steeds into a corner of the pen while we mounted; for mount we did, although they squealed enough to deafen us. A moment later, and we were off.

Shall I ever forget how those pigs did run? The black one led, with Will hanging on to its ears for dear life, his yellow curls streaming out straight behind him; the white pig close behind, yelling like mad, as I clung with both arms round his neck.

But, just as he reached the very roughest spot in the yard, the black pig stopped short, and stood on his head. The white one was too close behind to pull up in time, so he tumbled heels over head on top of the black one; and, when the terrified Micky reached the spot, the pigs were nowhere, but a very sober boy and girl sat upon the paving of the yard, the boy with a bump over his eye and the girl with a rapidly swelling nose. Micky picked us up, tied up Willie's head in a red cotton handkerchief, and gave me a cabbage leaf to hold to my nose. Then he "cleared," and no Micky was seen about the place for a week or more.

Willie and I started for the house, hand in hand. "We did have a lovely time, though, didn't we?" said Will, from under the red cotton handkerchief. "We did," I groaned from behind the cabbage-leaf.

But, between ourselves, little men and women, we have never ridden a piggy-wig, black or white, from that day to this.—Beatrice Harvey Dobbs, in Babyland.

DOT'S ADVENTURE.

Uncle Ned was really to blame for it, though he had not the least thought of such a thing when he said to Dot as she came up with her round music-box under her arm:—"Hello, little Dago! Where's your monkey?"

Now, Dot lives in the city winters, and knows all about the organ-men and their queer little beasts. She comes with mamma in summer to the bigish country town in which mamma herself was a little girl. She had always thought it would be a fine thing to have an organ and go about the streets, gathering pennies. As Uncle Ned sauntered off, she grew very thoughtful. Then her face brightened. She ran down the garden, calling excitedly to her little sister:—

"Mab, Mab! I want you! Aunt Sarah said yesterday you were one perfect monkey."

Dot was just turned five, and Mab three; but the two were almost of a size, since Dot was a mere mite, and Mab deliciously chubby. When lunch-time came without bringing them, Grandmother Allen began to fidget, and wonder what had become of those precious little dears. At first Dot's mamma only laughed, saying,—

"They will be here in a little while, bright as a new penny."

But, when three o'clock saw them still away, she, too, grew uneasy, and went to search for them.

So did Uncle Ned, but he chose another way. Somehow, he remembered Dot's face as he saw it last. "It would be just like her: she is the most original little morsel!" he muttered, as he took his way along the shady streets to a big hotel, much frequented by summer visitors.

About the same time Dot was saying a little tearfully: "It's your fault, Mab: you're too big. Nobody won't believe you're my monkey when I tell them so. And you don't hold your cap out right: you drop it just as soon as they don't put things in it."

You ought to keep holding it till they were sorry and gave you something."

"My arm gets tired. I'm hungry. I want to go home. We have got the five cents Cousin Anna gave us when she met us as we started," Mab whined disconsolately, tugging at the string that bound her to Dot's arm.

"Bah! old cry-face!" Dot said with dignity. "I want to get enough pennies, so we can have ice-cream soda and some pep'mints. Come! we'll try this place,—it looks nice and big, with heaps of people on the porch."

"I want mamma," Mab said disconsolately, but followed Dot up the piazza steps obediently, holding out her red fez, while Dot turned the crank of her music-box so vigorously that no sound of any sort came from it. People began to stare at them. One young woman bent and kissed Mab's hot cheek, saying: "You poor little angel! Have you got nobody belonging to you?"

Mab did not answer: her eyes were fast on some one coming up the steps. With one bound she broke from Dot's hold, and flung herself tempestuously into Uncle Ned's arms, crying out:—

"Uncle Ned! I want to go home. I won't ever be Dot's monkey any more."

"No, you shall be mine," Uncle Ned said, swinging her upon his shoulder and walking away in triumph.—Martha McCulloch Williams, in Outlook.

AN ELECTRIC CUP.

Some motormen working for a street-car company clubbed together to keep a large cooler of lemonade at the car depot. They at first put no restrictions upon its use. Other men found out where the lemonade was, and it was impossible to keep the cooler full. The men wanted the lemonade, and yet they could not afford to supply it free to all in the stable. Then they hit upon a plan. The electrician of the company came to the help of the men. The cup, chain, and cooler were connected with the lamp circuit in the stable, and the mat in front of the jar was kept damp. When a man not in the secret took the cup in his hand, he received a shock. The men in the secret—that is, those who contributed toward the lemonade—disconnected the current before touching the cup.—Outlook.

Typhoid

* Fever

That BOVININE is most indispensable in all cases of Typhoid Fever is attested by more than 7,000 physicians, whose letters describing each case we have on file.

Bovinine

which is the active principles of concentrated beef, and restores the strength more speedily than any other preparation known, when taken in milk, acts as a simple nourishment, especially adapted to the ulcerated condition of the bowels.

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every library and reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,
50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

"IF AT FIRST YOU DON'T SUCCEED,
TRY

SAPOLIO

See it sparkle—

every crystal perfect, like granulated sugar, and brilliant snow-white. The only pure salt. Compare Bradley's with what you are using. Which looks the best and tastes the saltiest? Bradley's "Yorkshire" won't harden, and is "nothing but salt." One person eats 12 cents' worth a year—you can afford to have the best. Send us your address for a free sample bag to compare.

"Yorkshire" Salt

BRADLEY SALT CO.,
49 Jay St., New York. 4 Commercial St., Boston.

Chauncy-Hall School.

(Established in 1828.)

For Boys and Girls of all ages. Especial care for health and for individual needs. Thorough preparation for the Mass. Institute of Technology, for business and for college. Special students received into all regular classes. Chemistry and Physics are taught by laboratory work. Instruction is given in Sloyd. There is Military Drill for boys. Upper classes begin Sept. 18.

593 Boylston Street, Copley Square, Boston.

Mr. HALE'S SCHOOL 86 BEACON ST., BOSTON.

The 13th year will begin September 25. Preparation for Harvard College and the Institute of Technology. Full Classical and Scientific Courses. Primary department for young boys nine or ten years of age. Fine situation, directly opposite the Public Garden. Large, sunny, high-studded rooms, open fireplaces, gymnasium, extensive laboratories, covered fire-escapes, lunch-room. Teachers: ALBERT HALE (Harv.), E. D. MARSH (Harv.), E. K. STEVENS (Harv.), C. S. STREET, Amherst. Address ALBERT HALE.

West Newton English and Classical School. ALLEN BROTHERS.

Family School. Both Sexes. Unsectarian. Prepares for College, Scientific Schools, Business, and for a useful life. Forty-third year begins Wednesday, September 18. Catalogue of ALLEN BROTHERS, WEST NEWTON, MASS.

THE JACOTOT SCHOOL.

A French and English Boarding and Day School for Girls.

No 11 West 86 St., New York. Adjacent to Central Park. Mlle. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals. Circulars on application.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. Rev. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

THE MORGAN SCHOOL, PORTSMOUTH.

N.H. This Home and Day School for Girls will reopen September 25 for its second year under the new management. College, Preparatory, and Finishing Courses. Address for circular Miss GEORGINA S. WOODBURY, Principal.

Rev. and Mrs. John A. Bellows'

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS will begin its seventh year Sept. 18, 1895. Number of boarding pupils limited to eight. Address 91 DANFORTH STREET, PORTLAND, ME.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL, Framingham, Mass.

Entrance examinations WEDNESDAY, Sept. 11, 1895. For circulars address ELLEN HYDE, Principal.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE Springfield, Mass.

Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN McDUFFIE, P.H.D.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. Mrs. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

THE HIGHLAND MILITARY ACADEMY.

WORCESTER, MASS., begins 40th year September 11. Classical, Scientific, Business, Preparatory Departments. Gymnasium. Athletics encouraged. Careful training. Home influences. JOSEPH ALDEN SHAW, A.M., Head Master.

Boston, 10 Ashburton Place. BOSTON UNIVERSITY Law School.

Full term opens Wednesday, October 2. For circulars address EDMUND H. BENNETT, Dean.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION

for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods; large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. R. W., Christian Register.

MRS. H. M. BROWN, 49 Oxford Street, Cambridge, wishes to take charge of two or three little girls. Instruction at home or at school. References: Rev. C. R. ELIOT, Boston; Prof. C. J. CHILDS, Cambridge; Mrs. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, Jamaica Plain.

ELLEN M. GRANT.

At the funeral services of Miss Grant at her late residence in Salem her pastor, Rev. Mr. Manchester, was assisted by her former pastor, Rev. F. B. Mott, and her friend, John W. Chadwick. Mr. Batchelor, another former pastor, whom she counted in the inner circle of her friends, was kept away by illness. Mr. Chadwick spoke as follows:—

"I am myself so much in need of comfort in this sorrow that I would gladly sit in pure passivity, and listen to such words as others might find it in their hearts to speak; and yet I crave the sweet and mournful privilege of testifying here to the tender grace and beauty of the life which has now reached its earthly term, and passed beyond it into the unfathomable mystery which lies beyond. There is one spot in Salem which henceforth will always have for me a special sacredness. There, with her sister, stood my friend less than a month ago, and waved me a farewell. Lingeringly, I looked back to her, and she to me, each fearing much that we might never meet again on earth. I shall think of her in many pleasant ways, but oftenest as she stood that afternoon on Chestnut Street and waved me her farewell.

"She was my friend for more than thirty years. Her friendship was the first-fruit of my ministry. A boy in the Divinity School, I came here to preach for Mr. Haskell; and she took pity on my formless youth, and showed me such kindness as I never could forget. A little later she said to me, 'I hope you will go to Brooklyn'; and that prophetic intimation was the first I had of a great happiness that was awaiting me, and is not ended yet. The kindness of those early days has suffered nothing from the lapse of time and the changes it has inevitably wrought. For many years she was so much in Brooklyn that I might dare to enter a parochial claim upon her loyalty and affection, and I was always met halfway. And how beautiful it has always been to come here to this house, where she was born and lived for seventy years,—Salem of Salem, Peace of Peace,—a quiet eddy in the rushing stream of my habitual life, and here rest my spirit and renew my early rows! How good to breathe this air of stainless purity, to see the flowers she loved, never more sumptuous than for her burial, and the dear familiar objects of her house, so expressive of her personality and taste, and to sit at table where, in truth,

'Every loaf and cup was mystic,
Wine and life-bread eucharistic,
Feeding body less than soul.'

"Those of us who knew Ellen Grant did not care to analyze our satisfaction and delight in her companionship. There by God's grace—by her own grace—they were; and we were content to have it so. But some things could not but be evident to us. If we had closed our eyes, we should have known them by some subtle intuition: her liking for the quiet side of life, and yet withal her keen delight in such excursions into the larger world as widened her experience of natural beauty; and most of all her loyal affection for her house and home, her garden, her Barton Square Church, her Unitarian faith and the congregation of its saints, her beloved city of Salem, any failure to appreciate which would have subjected any one to grave suspicion in her eyes. Loyalty was the most natural expression of her character, and its consummate flower was her loyalty to her friends and especially to those dearest ones and best whom God had given her to be her own by the most sacred of familiar ties, the companions of her mind and heart in the sweet habitudes of her domestic life.

"She has been spared what she so much dreaded,—the serious weakening of her bodily and mental powers. She went in and out among you with little obvious impairment of her proper personality, when suddenly she 'was not, for God took her.' It was best so for her and all of us. Her gracious image has not been defaced. Long will her quiet memory rebuke our noisy ways, and breed in us some earnest questioning whether her way of gentleness and peace is not more fraught than they with all that makes for life's most lasting good."

Here and There.

Dews are less abundant on islands and on ships in mid-ocean. Seamen nearing land can tell that fact by reason of the deposits of dew on the vessel.

In Minneapolis it is said that the gross receipts of every trolley road in the place have been reduced fully one-third by the craze for wheeling.

The Japanese are fond of bathing. In the city of Tokio there are eight hundred public bath-houses, in which a person can take a bath, hot or cold for a sum equal to one halfpenny.

Pop-corn pops because the essential oil in the corn is converted into gas by heat, and thus an explosion occurs which tears the kernel open, and causes a singular inversion of its contents.

It cost the United States government $1,848,000 to care for 2,200 Dakota Indians seven years, while they were savages. After they were Christianized, it cost for seven years $120,000, a saving of 1,728,000. Exchange.

The British Museum has been rearranging its Phœnician collection with great advantage. These valuable monuments of the ancient people are now housed in the second northern gallery, and form a perfect history of the race which played so great a part in the early history of the world.

One of the attractions of the Calcutta (India) Orphanage has lately died,—the interesting little girl who in her younger days is believed to have been nursed by a bear, and was captured while playing with bear cubs. She was in the institution for the last two years and a half, and made some progress in acquiring human habits except in the acquirement of the power of speech. She was amiable and affectionate, and was possessed of natural innocence. She has left a mark on the mind of all the inmates and friends of the institution, specially of the manager and his good wife. Her life is an interesting subject of study for scientific men.—Exchange.

Prof. Roth of Zürich is credited with having made experiments that have led him to believe that butter which has hitherto been considered a safeguard against tuberculosis is not seldom a vehicle of that disease. The professor says that twenty different samples of butter made of cow's milk, bought in as many different markets, contained, with only two exceptions, tubercle bacilli, and which, when inoculated in some guinea-pigs, caused the development of tuberculosis in them. Dr. Fevro of Turin is also credited by the Family Doctor with having made similar experiments with Italian butter with almost identical results; that is to say, eighty per cent. of the samples of butter examined by him contained tuberculosis infection.

Education.

Brown University offers a prize of $200, open to general competition, for the best essay on either of the three following subjects: (1) A critical comparison of the claims put forward on behalf of Rhode Island and Maryland, respectively, regarding the first establishment of religious liberty in America; (2) a critical history of the movement toward disestablishment and complete religious liberty in Connecticut; (3) a critical history of the movement toward disestablishment and complete religious liberty in Massachusetts. No essay can be received which is not founded upon original research. The prize will be awarded at Commencement, 1896. Essays must be placed in the hands of the president of the university on or before May 1, 1896.

ANOTHER INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL IN GEORGIA.—Mr. J. W. Davison of Fort Valley, Ga., principal of an industrial school for colored youths, is in the city. He comes for the purpose of seeking aid for his school. The school has been devoted to regular literary work until, about two years ago, a manual training-school was established in connection with the regular grammar course. The aim has been to train the boys in carpentry, truck-farming, and blacksmithing, and girls in needlework as far as the limited means of the institution would allow. Mr. Davison comes highly indorsed by two Worcester gentlemen,—Mr. Calvin L. Hartshorn and Mr. James Draper, who have been down there and seen his work. He has also a letter from Senator George F. Hoar and one from Rev. Samuel May of Leicester, vouching for the reputation and good character of Mr. Calvin L. Hartshorn and Mr. James Draper, both of Worcester. The school, which receives a small appropriation of State money, is in charge of a board of trustees, consisting of both white and colored citizens, and selected by the community, which is deeply interested.—Boston Transcript.

LOOK FOR
The Woman in Red

Make sure the figure of a woman as here indicated,

PRINTED in RED,

is on the label of every box of

Electro-Silicon

It's a mark of genuineness and a guarantee of the best SILVER Polish known. It's sold everywhere.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh
ANCHOR, Cincinnati.
ATLANTIC, New York.
BEYMER-BAUMAN, Pittsburgh.
BRADLEY, New York.
BROOKLYN, New York.
COLLIER, St. Louis.
CORNELL, Buffalo.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS, Pittsburgh.
ECKSTEIN, Cincinnati.
FAHNESTOCK, Pittsburgh.
JEWETT, New York.
KENTUCKY, Louisville.
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS. CO. Philadelphia.
MORLEY, Cleveland.
MISSOURI, St. Louis.
RED SEAL, St. Louis.
SALEM, Salem, Mass.
SHIPMAN, Chicago.
SOUTHERN, St. Louis and Chicago.
ULSTER, New York.
UNION, "

The Leading.

One of the leading and best known painters in this country says, "I cannot afford to use anything but Pure White Lead" (see list of brands). Every practical painter knows this. It is only those who haven't any reputation to lose who don't know it, or will use misleading brands of White Lead or unknown worthless mixtures. Although low-priced, they are not cheap. Pure White Lead is the cheapest, because it is the best.

If colors are required they are easily made by using the National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead tinting colors. Pamphlet and color-card sent free.

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,
1 Broadway, New York.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Poet-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

A College Town Pulpit.

MR. SUNDERLAND'S MONTHLY SERMONS.

50 Cents a Year. 5 Cents a Number. Reduced rates in quantities.

Series for 1894-95.

1. The Soul's Cry for God.
2. Jesus as Humanity's Ideal.
3. Sectarianism: Its Evils, Causes, and Cures.
4. The True Cross of Christ.
5. Was Jesus God? How he came to be worshipped.
6. Loyalty to Conviction.
7. Is Life a Blessing?
8. Robert Ingersoll's Treatment of the Bible.
9. A Religion for a Republic.
10. The Surest Way of Doing Good.

Order from Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND, Ann Arbor, Mich.

MESSAGES OF

Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of

JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Mozoomdar's
BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations.

By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William L. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
- No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 17. REMEDIES ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
- No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
- No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

THE LABORS OF THEODORE PARKER.

During each year he was heard discussing the most important religious and political questions in all the greater Northern cities; but his most lasting work was in throwing light upon our sacred Scriptures, and in this he was one of the forerunners of the movement now going on, not only in the United States, but throughout Christendom. Even before he was fairly out of college his translation of De Wette's "Introduction to the Old Testament" made an impression on many thoughtful men. His sermon in 1841 on "The Transient and Permanent in Christianity" marked the beginning of his great individual career. His speeches, his lectures, and especially his "Discourse on Matters pertaining to Religion," greatly extended his influence. His was a deeply devotional nature, and his public prayers exercised by their touching beauty a very strong religious influence upon his audiences. He had his reward. Beautiful and noble as were his life and his life-work, he was widely abhorred. On one occasion of public worship, in one of the more orthodox churches, news having been received that he was dangerously ill, a prayer was openly made by one of the zealous brethren present that this arch-enemy might be removed from earth. He was even driven out from the Unitarian body. But he was none the less steadfast and bold, and the great mass of men and women who thronged his audience-room at Boston and his lecture-rooms in other cities spread his ideas. His fate was pathetic. Full of faith and hope, but broken prematurely by his labors, he retired to Italy, and there died at the darkest period in the history of the United States, when slavery in the State and the older orthodoxy in the church seemed absolutely and forever triumphant. The death of Moses within sight of the promised land seems the only parallel to the death of Parker less than six months before the election of Abraham Lincoln and the publication of "Essays and Reviews."—From "The Divine Oracles to the Higher Criticism," by Andrew D. White, in the Popular Science Monthly for September.

Charities and Reforms.

The workers at Morgan Chapel are about to open again their sloyd school for boys as well as the industrial school for girls, where various branches of needlework and crochet are taught. They have a room where the babies are cared for while their sisters are at work with the needle. A printing-press will soon be in operation; and there is a room for making and mending shoes, a class for repairing men's and boys' clothing, a class in writing for young women and men, and a weekly sale of garments at the lowest possible price, so that the poor may come and buy, and keep themselves in comfort, while the few cents thus received are used for the sick and aged. The chapel workers would be glad to receive contributions of fruit and vegetables in this harvest season or, indeed, any help toward the furtherance of their work. Contributions may be sent to E. S. Emmons, Morgan Chapel, 87 Shawmut Avenue.

Temperance.

Finland has demonstrated that spirits are not necessary in cold countries, having become practically a total abstinence country. This change has been effected under local option and woman suffrage.

Another ban has been put upon the liquor traffic by the decision of the Junior Order of American Mechanics in Omaha that no one connected with the sale of liquors as a beverage shall hereafter be admitted to membership in that order.

The governor of Sierra Leone, addressing the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, strongly advocated prohibitive duties on spirits in Africa; for wherever there was a drunken chief there were signs of neglect and destitution. Spirituous liquors in Africa injured British commercial interests.

The medal struck in honor of the silver jubilee of the Catholic Temperance Association of America consists of a silver-plated bar, with suspended shield and red, white, and blue ribbon. On the front of the medal are engraved a fine cut of Father Mathew, the Catholic Temperance Association badge, with laurel cord and wreath. Appropriate inscriptions are found on the reverse side.

A duplicate of the Willard fountain, presented by the children of the world to Chicago in the Columbian year, and called "The Little Cold Water Girl," is to be placed on the Westminster Embankment, London, and called the Somerset fountain, in honor of Lady Henry Somerset. The children of Great Britain have aided in collecting the funds; and Mr. George Wade, the celebrated London sculptor, has executed the work, although the design was that of Miss Anna A. Gordon of Boston, superintendent of temperance work among children of the white ribbon army.—Woman's Column.

There is quite a little temperance wave in France. Alcoholism has been the prominent subject before the French House of Deputies; and a bill has passed, the purpose of which is to restrict by high taxes the sale of all distilled liquors, which are called "toxic," while fermented liquors are called "hygienic." Another step is the decision to introduce into the schools lessons which are intended to make clear to the eyes of the scholars the terrible dangers, physical and moral, of alcohol. Already, in the higher primary schools of Paris, physicians have been giving special instruction on the subject. The minister of instruction, M. Poincaré, has directed teachers generally in the primary schools to take up the topic; and even M. Henri Rochefort has, in his journal, been treating on this same subject of alcoholism.—The Independent.

Science.

"Practical experiments in electric ploughing," says the London Electrical Engineer, "have been made at Halle-on-the-Saale, Germany. Here a two-furrow tilting plough was used. The electric motor is fixed to the implement itself."

From recent tests at Royton, England, it appears that the heating value of dried refuse is only about one-seventh that of good coal. "The results," says the Electrical World, "show that the idea of burning town refuse at any sort of profit is erroneous: it cannot be imagined that refuse which gives on evaporation anything less than two or three pounds of water per pound of refuse would not pay for carting."

LONG-DISTANCE SEEING MACHINE.—It is said that Prof. Alexander Graham Bell is now engaged in experiments looking to the perfecting of a machine harnessing electricity to light, so to speak, so that it will be possible for one's vision to be extended to any distance desired. Prof. Bell insists that the fact has already been demonstrated, and that it only remains to construct the apparatus necessary to bring the possibilities of the discovery into actual and practical use.—Littell's Living Age.

It is the heart which is principally exercised during cycling. So soon as brisk cycling has commenced, the motions of the heart begin to increase. In this respect cycling differs from many other exercises. Rowing tells most on the breathing organs, dumb bells and other exercises where the muscles are moved without progression of the body tell most on the muscles, while in climbing and long pedestrian feats it is the nervous system that is most given to suffer. There is not a cycle rider of any age in whom the heart is not influenced so as to do more work; and, although in skilled cyclists and trained cyclists a certain balance is set up which equalizes the motion, such riders are not exempt from danger.—Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson, M.D., in North American Review.

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

Two large pies are made from each package of None-Such Mince Meat. For sale by all grocers. Be sure and get the None-Such.

MERRELL-SOULE CO.,
Syracuse, N.Y.

Imitation is the Sincerest Flattery.

Why is Pearline the mark for every soap powder, or so-called washing compound, which is brought out? Everything is called "the same as" or "as good as" Pearline.

None of them say "better" — they cannot. They should not say "as good as" — they are not. The simple fact that Pearline is so largely imitated would be enough to prove it the best. And when a poor washing compound can do so much damage, do you want anything but the best?

PEARLINE is manufactured only by 369

JAMES PYLE, New York.

Spiritual Life.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. Wm. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMAN-DIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

Wrestling and Waiting. Sermons by Rev. JOHN F. W. WARE. 340 pages. With portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

SOCIAL TOPICS.

Social Equilibrium, and Other Problems, Ethical and Religious. By Rev. GEORGE BATCHELOR. 286 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

The capacity for broad sight, the calmness of the judicial mind, the earnestness of the prophet, the sympathy of the humanitarian, ought certainly, when combined, to produce something of value in the way of the solution of tangled problems, whether social or religious. In this book we find manifested this broad sight, this calmness, this earnestness, and this sympathy; and in their product we are not disappointed, but inspired and helped.

Social Problems. By M. J. SAVAGE. 189 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Preliminary: Religion for this World; The Social Dream; Social Beginnings; Social Achievement; Social Barriers; The Rise of the Individual; Socialism; Social Responsibility; What is at Present Possible? Common School Education; Poverty, Personal and National; The Diminution of Evils.

Man, Woman and Child. By M. J. SAVAGE. 200 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Man; The Woman; The Evolution of Marriage; Marriage To-day; The Child; The Home; Society; Celibacy; Divorce; Woman's Sphere; Careers for our Daughters; The Transfiguration of Humanity.

How we made a Nine-cent Dinner. Explained in Full, with some other Economies.

By Mrs. E. S. TURNER, the New Century Cooking School of Philadelphia. Paper, 10 cts.

Coffee Houses and Coffee Palaces in England. Compiled by JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE from English pamphlets. Paper, 20 cts.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR SEPTEMBER.

The God we Serve. Rev. William M. Brundage, Ph.D.
I can Become but What thou Art. J. M. S.
Col. Ingersoll's Views about the Bible. H. Howard MacQuary.
The Ethical Value of Jesus. John M. Scott.
Richesse Oblige. George W. Cutter, M.D.
Responsibility. Hattie Tyng Griswold.
Prayer. Pastor Quiet.
The Religion of Jesus as a Creed.
Night. William Brunton.
The Ministry. Rev. John Page Hopps.
The Forward Movement. W. H. Lambelle.
Unitarianism a Rational Hope and Faith.
Ethical Culture and Unitarianism. Harry White.
The Real Redemption. H. Hayes Robbins.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; Guilds;
Literary Notes.

Children's Corner.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

. Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

26. EVOLUTION OF THE MECHANIC ARTS: Development of the human hand; earliest use of implements and tools; inventions; the laboring classes. By JAMES A. SKILTON.

27. EVOLUTION OF THE WAGES SYSTEM. The definition of wages; economic characteristics of the wages system; wages the outgrowth of slavery; development of the system. By PROF. GEORGE GUNTON.

28. EDUCATION AS A FACTOR IN CIVILIZATION: Early methods in Egypt, Persia, China, Greece, and Rome; early Christian ideas of education; Catholic and Protestant views; the common-school system. By MISS CAROLINE B. LE ROW.

29. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. I. The Theological Method. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

30. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. II. The Socialistic Method. By WILLIAM FOTTS.

31. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. III. The Anarchistic Method. By HUGH O. PENTECOST.

32. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. IV. The Scientific Method. By DANIEL GREEN-LEAF THOMPSON.

33. ASA GRAY: His life and work. By MRS. MARY TREAT.

34. EDWARD LIVINGSTON YOUMANS. The Man and his work. By PROF. JOHN FISKE.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Pleasantries.

A boy of three was in the garden. Going up to a rose-bush, he exclaimed, "Oh, grandma, these flowers have teeth!"—Harper's Round Table.

Charles Dudley Warner says that the difference between faith-cure and mind-cure is that mind-cure requires no faith and faith-cure requires no mind.—Exchange.

At the "Zoo."—Bertie: "You say that is the bird of freedom, mamma?" Mamma: "Yes, Bertie." Bertie: "Then why is it in a cage?"—Harper's Round Table.

Cora (on the hotel veranda): "You say that man is a geologist?" Merrill: "Yes. He is picking out stones for a patent medicine firm to plant advertisements on."—Judge.

She (on her voyage): "What is that place down there?" He: "Why, that is the steerage." She: "And does it take all those people to make the boat go straight?" Boston Traveller.

"Did you ever hear the joke about the village that had two skulls of Saint Paul, — one when he was a boy and one when he was a man?" "No, what was it?"—Youth's Companion.

"Tommie, your spelling report is very bad," said Mr. Hicks to his boy. "That's all right, papa," said Tommie. "When I grow up, I'm going to dictate all my letters, like you do. It's the typewriter that'll have to know spelling, not me."—Harper's Round Table.

Judge B. fell down a flight of stairs, recording his passage in a bump on every stair until he reached the bottom. A servant ran to his assistance, and, raising him up, said, "I hope your honor is not hurt?" "No," said the judge, sternly. "My honor is not hurt, but my head is."—Exchange.

Funny things are sometimes found in other examination papers than those of school boys and girls. A graduate of a military school, who was being examined to test his fitness for a certain rank in the service of the army, found the following question in his paper, "What condition is requisite before a man can be buried with military honors?" And he wrote the following answer, "He must be dead!"—Youth's Companion.

The teacher told the children how a wise man once said that we have only one mouth and two ears, so that we may listen and hear twice as much as we speak. Afterward, to see how much of the instruction was remembered, she asked, "Why is it that we have two ears and only one mouth, Frances?" "Because we would not have room in our face for two mouths, and we would look too crooked if we had only one ear." "No, that is not the reason. You know, do you, Rosie?" "Yes, ma'am. So that what we hear may go in at one ear and out at the other."—Philadelphia Times.

An English teacher in a Japanese school discovered, by giving out subjects for composition, that the pupils had been trained to find a moral in everything animate and inanimate. Mr. Hearn, in his "Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan," gives a few specimens. One boy thus wrote on "Mosquitoes": "On summer nights we hear the sound of faint voices, and little things come and sting our bodies very violently. We call them ka,—in English, 'mosquitoes.' I think the sting is useful for us, because, if we begin to sleep, the ka shall come and sting us, uttering a small voice: then we shall be brought back to study by the sting." To another pupil was assigned the botan (Japanese peony) for a composition, and he wrote: "The botan is large and beautiful to see, but it has a disagreeable smell. This should make us remember that what is only outwardly beautiful in human society should not attract us. To be attracted by beauty only may lead us into fearful and fatal misfortune."—Exchange.

CARLYLE AND THACKERAY.

Mrs. Wilson tells a story about Carlyle and Thackeray, which has been told before, but which may be new to some readers. Several artists at the Royal Academy dinner, sitting in the neighborhood of these great men, were expressing their enthusiasm about Titian. "His glorious coloring is a fact about Titian," said one. "And his glorious drawing is another fact about Titian," cried a second. So they went on till Carlyle, who had been listening in silence to their rhapsodies, interrupted them by saying, with a slow deliberation which had its own impressive emphasis, "And here I sit, a man made in the image of God, who knows nothing about Titian and cares nothing about Titian; and that's another fact about Titian." Thackeray was sipping claret at the moment. He paused, and bowed courteously to Carlyle. "Pardon me," he said, "that is not a fact about Titian. But it is a fact—and a lamentable fact—about Thomas Carlyle."—Westminster Gazette.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

The merits of the Palmer Woven Patent Hammocks have never been equalled. Their superiority of material, construction, and design has made them the Standard since first introduced. While there is a continual effort by imitators and infringers to produce something similar, it has all been without success, and the "Palmer Patent Hammocks" still stand pre-eminently superior to any of the imitations. They are produced in larger quantities and infinitely more varieties than the combined production of all others. Before purchasing, insist upon seeing the "Palmer Patent Hammocks." Remember, the name "Palmer" is a synonym for all that is best in Hammocks. If your dealer does not have them in stock, he can get them for you, but be sure that he does. I. E. Palmer, Middletown, Conn.

In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sell

CHURCH CARPETS

at manufacturers' prices.

John H. Pray, Sons & Co.,

Wholesale and Retail CARPETS and UPHOLSTERY,

658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston.

Correspondence Solicited.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin.

BLAKE BELL CO.,

Boston, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

You ask me WHY the MILLER Lamp

"Is Superior to All Others." I will tell you.

- 1st. In its SCREW and PLUNGE LIFT for regulating the Wick.
- 2d. In its Lift Attachment for Lighting Without Removing Chimney.
- 3d. In the SIMPLICITY of its Design for REWICKING.
- 4th. In its CLEANLINESS; Overdraft of Oil runs back to the Oil Pot.
- 5th. Absence of any DIRT POCKET prevents any Unpleasant Odor.
- 6th. All Parts INTERCHANGEABLE, any of them can be supplied.
- 7th. It costs no more than the ordinary Centre-Draft Lamp without these Patented Improvements. Illustrated Catalogue Sent Free.

EDWARD MILLER & CO., 63 Pearl St., Boston.

The MAGEE RANGES ARE THE BEST

Examine the patent OVEN THERMOMETER, Pronounced by ALL COOKS to be the GREATEST IMPROVEMENT of modern times.

No one can afford to keep house without a Magee Range and Furnace, because the saving in fuel and food will pay many times their cost over any others on the market.

The name MAGEE carries our Guarantee of PERFECT SATISFACTION with proper use.

Descriptive Circulars Free.

FOR SALE BY LEADING DEALERS EVERYWHERE.

MAGEE FURNACE COMPANY, Boston. New York. Chicago.

DURKEE'S SPICES

THE WELL KNOWN "GAUNTLET BRAND"

EXCEL IN PURITY, STRENGTH & FLAVOR.

GEO. H. ELLIS,
Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.
BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

- BOOKS
- PAMPHLETS
- NEWSPAPERS
- MAGAZINES
- SERMONS
- CATALOGUES
- REPORTS
- LAW WORK
- AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.
Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1895.

NUMBER 37.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes: Getting into Commission,	577
The Passion of Possession; The Bible,	578
MISINGS,	578
BREVITIES,	578
PRO AND CON.
Key at the Druggist's; Church Privileges; The Free Pew System,	579
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
A Little City in the Mountains, by J. Leonard Corning, Sr.; Up and Doing, by R. L. Bridgman; The Song of Suffering, by Miss E. P. Channing,	580
Science and the Holy Ghost, by W. A. Cram; Unity and Variety in Religion, by P. C. Mozoomdar,	581
"Whither will Art lead us?" by R. E. Whitman; An Acknowledgment; The Grave of Lafayette; The American Unitarian Association,	582
Christian Sociology,	585
A Tale of Rothschild,	586
A Faithful Policeman,	590
Liberalism in Kettle College; Pigeons and Postal Service,	591
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	582
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	583
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	583
THE PULPIT.
A Crown of Life, by Rev. Charles E. St. John,	584
SERMON GLEANINGS.
The Mastery of Life, by Rev. Charles J. Staples,	585
LITERATURE.
"Outlines of Social Theology"; Other Book Notices,	586
Magazines; Literary Notes; Books Received,	587
THE HOME.
In the Year 1853; Keeping a Secret,	588
Pass it on; A Bird's Nest; A Brave Poor Boy; The Baby's Nurse; Serenading Himself; Ruskin and his Servants; Jack's Lame Foot,	589
POETRY.
Their Influence, by Rev. William Brunton,	580
Song of Science, by Rev. Edward F. Hayward,	584
Sonnet,	588
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	590
HERE AND THERE,	590
TEMPERANCE,	591
SCIENCE,	591
PERSONALS,	591
PLEASANTRIES,	592

Editorial.

THE late H. O. Houghton fulfilled his debt to his profession. He made his contribution to the printing art and to the publishers' trade. "The Houghton face" is well known in the type foundries, and the workmanship of the Riverside Press speaks for itself. In reaching these artistic results, Mr. Houghton had the co-operation of able associates, and perhaps nothing better has been said of him than that the tears of his workmen showed how strong was the personal tie between them and him. The association was something more than that of a simple business relationship. It is impossible in such a relationship always to escape friction. But the number of men who have remained for many years in the employ of the firm shows how long and how well this relation may be sustained without rupture or alienation. But, though faithful to a profession of very large scope, Mr. Houghton's interests were not limited to it. He was a philanthropist, generous in gift and service, whether for the protection of animals or the protection of the Indian, the promotion of education, and the diffusion of charity. He had been for many years a faithful supporter and attendant of the Mohonk Indian Conference. He will be greatly missed there, as at other gatherings where his counsel and aid and cheerful presence will be gratefully remembered.

UNDOUBTEDLY all the Unitarian churches that have pastors will elect them delegates to the National Conference at Washington, and many ministers will be glad and able to go and pay their own expenses. On the whole, we believe there is no religious denomination that takes care of its ministers better than the Unitarian; and we believe we have only to make the suggestion that there are ministers who cannot well afford to go to the Conference in Washington at their own expense to hear that their parishes have generously decided to send them. The minister who goes as a representative from a church will feel that the vote is something more than a compliment if his people furnish him the means to go and return; and the churches will feel more interest in the Conference if they think it important enough to pay the expenses of their minister. Such a gathering is something more than a picnic. It is an occasion for counsel and inspiration. Its influence will react on the churches themselves. The healthiest churches to-day in the Unitarian body are not those which stand in independent isolation, but those which make most of their organic connection, and are joined together in the promotion of good works which no one can do alone, but which all can do together. Of course, a lay delegation will go with the minister; for the National Conference is not a purely clerical body, and then let as many of the church as possible join the throng.

THE Methodist Recorder comments on the editorial in the Christian Register on "The Supernatural," and says, in sympathy with that article: "The conception of the supernatural that modern thought is leading the world to is one that has in it the most perfect conciliation of law with divine control. Any view of the supernatural that loses sight of the fact that God operates through his universe in an orderly method, that is expressed by saying that it is in accordance with law, will have but little influence upon present thought. The one great achievement of modern science is the conception of the universe as dominated by law. We cannot share in the apprehension that the truths of evangelical Christianity have anything to fear from a conception of the divine government of the universe in harmony with the new knowledge of the universality of order and law that the world has reached. It has everything to gain. But, whatever revisions men may be compelled to make of their views, let the truth prevail. And there is no more important part of the truth than that to which the trend of modern thought is leading men; namely, a recognition of the presence and directing power of God's life over the affairs of men and the world."

THE question whether a church shall remain open all summer depends on circumstances. An open church has something to do with open ears. If there is no congregation to fill the pews, it may be questioned whether it is worth while to fill the pulpit. A minister may get a response from the echoes of an empty church, but it is not the response that he most needs. Where there is an audience, church and pulpit may well be kept open; but it does not follow indeed that the pastor should not have a vacation. The church may well supply his pulpit during his absence. There is no minister who will not do his work better forty-eight weeks in the year if he has rest during the other four, and many of the hard workers in the church need a rest as well as the minister. A correspondent who asks the question, "If you close a church for a month, why should it not be closed altogether?" might be asked, If it is worth while for a man to sleep eight hours at night, why shouldn't he sleep the whole twenty-four? If a man does his work all the better for sleeping a third of the day, it is possible that a church may do its work better if those who bear the heat and burden of the day take a needed rest. In cities it is but fair that a sufficient number of churches should be open to accommodate all who desire to attend; and, as a matter of fact, this is practically done. We know no reason why a dozen churches on the Back Bay should be kept open when the people who go to church in August in that section would not fill one of them.

MINISTERS and ministerial associations have fought the Sunday press, and tried to preach it out of existence, but without effect. The Sunday paper has continued to grow enormously in size and circulation. But now it has occurred to some sensible people that it might be a good idea to use the Sunday press to some extent as a mouth-piece of religion. An association has been formed called "The Newspaper Sermon Association." Mr. William E. Harmon of Boston is president; and on the advisory board are prominent clergymen, such as Rev. George Hodges, D.D., dean of the Cambridge Theological School, Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D., and others, and two of the leading journalists of New England, Charles H. Taylor, proprietor of the Boston Globe, and John H. Holmes, editor of the Boston Herald. The purpose of the association will be to secure from the pens of the ablest preachers short non-sectarian sermons addressed to non-church-going newspaper readers, to be published on or near the editorial page, and properly advertised in each Sunday paper in the United States. The central bureau of the association will be at 13 School Street, Boston, and will be conducted under the supervision of the advisory board. The experiment seems to be an excellent one; and we believe that, if the right kind of sermons are furnished, it will be successful. Sermons used for this purpose must be written for this century, not for the last. They need not be slangy or sensational, but they must have in them that element which the common people will hear gladly. With live editors as well as live ministers on the advisory board, and the support already assured of a large portion of the press throughout the country, the result ought not to be doubtful.

THE Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis has just issued a circular relating to a proposal set forth by its president in his annual address at Hartford, June 13, that an "American School for Oriental Research" be established in Palestine. "The object of the school would be to afford graduates of American theological seminaries and other similarly qualified persons opportunity to prosecute Biblical and linguistic investigations under more favorable conditions than can be secured at a distance from the Holy Land, to gather material for the illustration of the Biblical narratives, to settle doubtful points in Biblical topography, to identify historic localities, to explore, and, if possible, excavate sacred sites." The school is to be kept free from sectarian control, and its general administration will be under a board of managers. Beirut is suggested as the most eligible place for the headquarters of the school. To make the experiment possible, a score or more of institutions and of individuals are asked to pledge themselves to contribute not less than one hundred dollars annually for the term of five years. Names may be sent to Prof. James Henry Thayer, Cambridge, Mass. So much has been accomplished by the establishment of the French, German, English, and American schools at Athens in the study of Greek archaeology that with these examples before us there is every reason to believe that valuable results would follow the establishment of such a school in the Holy Land. We trust that the experiment will be made, and that the small amount of money required to try it will easily be forthcoming. The action of the society at its next meeting in New York in December will depend upon the number of favorable responses it receives by November 1.

GETTING INTO COMMISSION.

It is a nautical term, and the yacht races have made it tolerably familiar. It means to put a vessel into service after it has been laid up.

A good many churches have been laid up for the summer. They furled their sails and dropped anchor: they have been dismantled and boarded up or they have been drawn up on the dry dock for repairs. Passengers have gone, and the crew have scattered. We are far from agreeing with the critics who object to all this, and who would keep a church afloat with all sails set until she rots. There is something heroic in such a determination. But no vessel is worth much without a crew; and, when the crew scatters, as the crew of a Back Bay church invariably does every summer, it is just as well to declare it out of commission.

But, when the September breezes begin to blow, it is a signal to get into commission again, to float off the dry dock, repair the rigging, weigh anchor, and hoist sails. It is time to call all hands on deck, and give the pennant to the breeze. The success of every boat in this fishing fleet will depend upon the extent and thoroughness of the preparation. Not a single block or rope must be lacking, and every man must know his duty and his place.

The church that is to do the best work must be well organized. It must not be fitted up as a pleasure yacht for luxurious indulgence: it must not forget that it belongs to the fishing fleet, and that every man who comes aboard is expected to belong to the crew. In too many of our churches the crew is small and the passenger list too large. There are many people who do not object to making a voyage to heaven in a modern first-class ecclesiastical liner, on which they are well fed with regular courses of gospel, and are willing to pay a stipulated price for a sleeping berth and a seat at the cabin table. They will of course buy a programme for the charitable concert. But they never will go on a vessel on which they have to work their passage. It is a part of their religion to "Be carried to the skies

On flowery beds of ease,
While others fight to win the prize,
And sail through bloody seas."

Some of our fleet are splendid vessels; but there is no crew to man them, and so they float like phantoms on the deep, with aimless vacillation.

Then there are other churches that are fairly manned, but badly organized. They have within them the capacity for ten times as much power if the captain or the engineer could only command and apply it. It is not enough that the captain must tell his men to do something: he must tell them what to do and where. There are few of our churches in which there is not room for improvement in method.

It takes many of our city churches too long to get under way after the summer vacation. It is as if an Atlantic liner should be fitted up with an old-fashioned windlass instead of with a modern engine for drawing the anchor out of the mud. The winter season of our city churches is short enough. Sluggishness at the start makes it practically a good deal shorter.

In a few weeks roving pastors will be home, the children will be back to school, and their fathers to business. Let not the church be behind. If a church is to be simply a light-ship to anchor near a shoal and sound its fog-horn, its service will not be without utility; but, if it is to do some navigating itself, if it is to have a definite purpose and destination, to spread its nets as a fisher of men, or bring the best fruits of one zone of life to some other that needs it, it must have some motive power, whether the breezes of heaven or the sun power in its coal-bin, and it will need a good captain and a good working crew.

THE PASSION OF POSSESSION.

One of the subtlest and, in some respects, one of the most dangerous forms of selfishness often masquerades as devotion to another. The love which professes its own willingness to give all, and on that ground demands an equal return, often seeks in reality nothing less than the utter subjugation of another's will, and may thus easily bring about its own undoing. The love which will endure no separation from the beloved object, which construes every other interest as a disloyalty, which can brook no disagreement in opinion, is weakening, not strengthening, and is not improved by being labelled devotion. Every human soul must have leave to be itself, and no love which denies that right is anything more than the passion for possession.

One of the hardest lessons that some parents have to learn is the judicious letting alone of their own children. Their desire to decide every trifling question that presents itself, even for the child who has long since graduated from the nursery, may often be a timid love, that merely seeks to guard against every possible mistake and consequent hurt. Often, however, it is the failure to recognize that the child has become an individual being, thinking his own thoughts, impelled by desires that the parent may or may not understand, beginning to live his own life, and forced by nature itself to accept his own responsibilities. If the parents have made the most of the childhood years, when the little life was given over to their guardianship, and the awakening mind was eager to follow in the directions opened to it, and the impressionable heart was sensitive to each look and tone, then oftentimes the best thing is a wise disregard of the restlessness and impatience that are only indications of development and readjustment. We often need to learn to trust our children more and to guard ourselves from showing the anxiety that we inevitably feel at each new crisis in a child's life. Let not the passion of possession blind our eyes to the inalienable rights of every individual soul,—the right to think its thoughts naturally, to look forward to its own future, and to formulate certain of its own decisions.

A boy just entering manhood often does not understand his own attitude toward himself and the world. He could not express in words even to himself the feelings that bid him stand on his own feet, and seem somehow to conflict with the old dependence on the will of others. Old habits of obedience are strong; but the time comes when something more must be added to them, and when the volition to action must be not mainly from the outside, as heretofore, but from within. The old love for home is not weakened; but the old relations change insensibly, and must grow into something deeper and more steadfast. Now it is not always easy for parents to recognize the child's side of all this and to adjust themselves willingly to a certain change of relation,—in short, to give up the old feeling of possession for the co-operation and mutual freedom of friends.

Some parents, it is true, seem to have prepared for this time even from the birth of their children, keeping ever in mind the ideal of free, independent, earnest manhood or womanhood, trained to loving service for love's sake. These have led their children to depend always more and more upon their own sense of right, trusting them to make their own decisions whenever possible, guiding rather than commanding, influencing rather than ruling, always loving much even in times of uncertainty and mistakes; but there are also many parents who seem to know no difference between absolute lawlessness and lack of control on the one hand and the continual exercise of authority on the other, and who often confound their own wills with intrinsic principle.

It is in this passion for possession that the tragedy of a broken friendship or an unhappy marriage often lies; and this is most pitiful, because here it comes just where love seems to be most intense and true. Still, that love which seeks to be all-sufficient for happiness, and will willingly admit no other interests in life, must necessarily fail. Somebody has said that friendships are not glass threads or frost-work, but the solidest things we know. If that is true, it is when they are built on a mutual trust that can allow of wider and ever wider circles of interest without fearing overthrow. If they are anything less, even then permanence in a friend's heart can never be gained by seeking to limit his freedom and dominate his thoughts.

The desire to possess, to make our own, whatever we really love, is natural enough. It is an impulse that has helped us all the way through life, and given us much of what is worth having; but there are many ways in which we lose the thing we most desire, if we seek to hold it too strenuously or too exclusively for our own. Life is forever changing, and we can gain a new good only by exchanging for it something that we still hold precious and dear. The girl who goes forward to love and marriage must give up her beautiful girlhood. The mother who takes her baby into her arms takes with it the care and responsibility, never to be put aside again. Even then she cannot keep her little one, but must see it grow into a separate life, with separate sorrows, that she can neither bear nor take away. The passion for possession must gradually grow into a feeling selfless and more divine even than the dear delight of ownership. In this we may acquiesce and rejoice in the spiritual laws which will assert themselves, whether we will or not, or we may rebel, and make life harder for ourselves and for others.

THE BIBLE.

Modern human intelligence builds its philosophy of life, its authority for conduct, and its axioms of religion upon a large and comprehensive view of man's relationship to the rest of the universe in which he lives. That relationship, clearly recognized, is the foundation of reasonable, intelligent religious faith for to-day. The rich soil in which man finds himself planted, the world of which he finds himself a part, the universe of earth and sky, form and ideal,—these feed the powers of his living soul as well as his physical energy. Everything behind him has grown up into himself. He, therefore, naturally turns to the Bible as an invaluable record of the achievement of human nature in religious development, at least through a thousand years of its evolution. He discovers the growth of religious truth, sees the overthrow of one law to make way for a higher, the decay of one system in the production of a better, and recognizes in the Bible the expanding drama of human life, the upgrowth and branching out of the great living tree of truth. So unique, so impressive is the great book, in this historic sense alone that it is likely to remain for the faith of to-day, as for the faith of the past, at the heart of religion.

Progress in the highest things, progress is the first teaching of the Bible. As the wigwam gives place to the hut, the hut to the cabin, the cabin to the cottage, the cottage to the house, so Abraham's religious ideas were not good enough for Moses, nor Moses' rules of life noble enough for Isaiah, nor Isaiah's pure enough for Jesus. Systems must perish, creeds must die, that the spirit of faith may go on growing, bursting out of its old homes, shattering them as it goes in order to build newer resting-places with larger outlook and higher roofs.

This splendid intellectual religious progress is the chief inspiration of the Bible. It sweeps the gamut of human experience. Steadily rising all the way, through succeeding shocks of history, through the brooding influences of the great world forces about them, through the mighty moving of the eternal power within, the religious ideas of humanity became purer, more elevated, and more ennobling. As part of the vast procession of humanity, marching across the mighty fields of time, these Bible characters teach the very process by which men and women of to-day may develop natural religious faith. Moses had wisdom and experience: he was feeling after justice. David caught glimpses of justice flecked with mercy. The prophets yearned after true salvation, righteousness, and holiness for the life of the people. We watch the turmoil. Forsaking one path, trying another, finding this one wrong and that, from fierceness they advance to restraint, from revenge to resistance. They have faith. Hope comes and goes. Their tendency is progressive, they are pushing away the artificial, they are expanding the natural spirit. Jesus at last clears the air by the brilliant illuminating power of a divine love. The whole transformation is from the crude hieroglyphic effort of an undeveloped religious yearning, not knowing how to give itself expression, to the divine oratory of the liberated spirit proclaiming love to God and man as the goal of religious evolution. The Bible stands as the chief historical record in human life to which the "faith for to-day" refers for confirmation of its naturalness. The banner is raised above the shattered temples of the past, waves to-day above the larger temples of the broader faith,—the banner of a Christ-like love!

Flusings.

THE kodak is one of the best of diaries, providing the machine and the film work. Every click of the machine registers an impression made in less than a second of time. Measured in this way, the seventy-five views I have before me will only represent seventy seconds of time, or a little over a minute. But, as a matter of fact, their record of experiences runs over several weeks, and for the eye and for the memory may be prolonged to several years. Every one who has an eye and an eyelid has really a lens and a shutter; and, if his memory is properly sensitized, he will be able to take flash pictures on his brain. But it will help his mental film a great deal to recall with vividness the things he has seen, if, in addition to his note-book, he has them registered in a four by five camera. And then his friends have the privilege of seeing some of the pictures that he has seen himself, though a photograph can only be a suggestion: it cannot give colors, odors, atmosphere, and sounds.

A VOYAGE by photograph! It is not so cheap as it seems. These photographs have cost a good deal,—not so much in money as in time and experience. They are all colored, not with paint, but by that interest which comes from personal participation; and some of them are touched with emotion. I lay no great store by those shots taken on the steamer. Yet I would rather travel by fancy and photograph than by reality across the ocean. The photographic "Lucania" does not roll: there is no jar and no cinders. Here is a group playing shuffle-board. They do not know that they have been taken, and have been used simply to give a little life and reality to the picture. And here is a suggestion of the service in the steerage; and I can hear the earnest, eloquent pleadings of the Swedish Salvation Army lass and her melodious voice in the hymns. And there is the flock of sea-gulls that from a hundred miles out on the ocean convoyed us to Queenstown. Now they have settled down on the water, like an escort of soldiers who have come to parade rest, till we land the mail and a few passengers, and start again for Liverpool. With a strong glass I can count eighty, and can almost see them rise and fall on the waves. Here are enough pictures, if put together, to make a good panorama of the English lakes,—Derwentwater and the mountains beyond, the picturesque hotel at Keswick, placid Thirlmere with its sandy beach, and a charming view of Buttermere, with a long, wooded tongue of land stretching into the lake and the mountains rising beyond. Here are the sheep among the gorse, and the winding stream and the winding road through the valley; beautiful stretches of pasture, brown enough in the picture, but fresh and green in recollection. Here is the swell and curve of the barren hills,—a beautiful mingling of light and shadow, bringing up again the ride home from Thirlmere. Here is the old mill at Keswick, and a picture of the Crosssthaite church, where Southey is buried. Once more I can see Castle Crag and Cat Bells, the mountains guarding Derwentwater, and the great Bowder Stone with Mizippi on top. And now we pass to Sneinton Hermitage. In my early boyhood a little picture of this curious old suburb of Nottingham, with houses built into the side of a cliff, had been brought over by my grandfather as a souvenir of old England. The growth of Nottingham has surrounded the site of the old hermitage until there is only a piece of it left; but no sooner had our hansoms entered the street than I recognized the old houses built into the cliff, and some of the cliff-dwellers were kind enough to invite me in their quaint dwellings, with some of the chimneys running up through the rock, and with storerooms and larders cut back into it.

THIS soft, distant view of Salisbury, with the spire reflected in the waters of the river, is worthy of Millet. Now and then, at long focus, when the atmosphere is just right, a kodak gives you a bit of impressionism which is emotionally worth more than its scrupulously realistic detail at short range. But I value not less the picture of the cathedral taken from the north-east corner, and showing the full height of the spire. It was worth going back to get my camera to take the lovely picture of the bishop's garden, with the noble tree and the ivy covering the buildings. Grateful and refreshing, also, are the garden scenes and the view of the river and the lass in the boat, recalling the charming days of housekeeping at Salisbury. And now we have our own pictures of Stonehenge, authenticated by the presence of the pastor of All Souls' Church, Roxbury, and a real English barrow, with an American Barrow on top of it,—a live, animated specimen of the nineteenth century, much more interesting than the bones and relics we might have found if we had dug into its depths beneath. If one wants to see a picturesque English village house, I would show him the houses of Amesbury, with the overhanging straw thatch and the vines creeping on the side. But here are two pictures that are misplaced. They belong in the lake region. One is Rydal Mount, with its magnificent beeches, where for a time Wordsworth lived, and the other a picture of the old graveyard at Grasmere, where he is buried. The sun is shining only on the back of the tombstone, and I regret that I could not take the modest inscription on the other side. But it is time to stop for refreshments,—let us say a week, at least.

Brevities.

Last week, when the "Defender" won, everybody thought it was glorious to be an American: now that the "Valkyrie" has won the second race, there are many who are willing to claim an English ancestry.

Rev. J. L. Corning of Munich is to give ten lectures during November at the Meadville Theological School on "Art Studies in Comparative Religion," with nearly three hundred and fifty stereopticon illustrations.

Vegetarians in England and in this country are such mild, peace-loving creatures that it is a little odd to hear the vegetarian movement in China charged with the blood-thirstiness which resulted in the recent outrages. It is possible that the Chinese have been feeding on something stronger than the kindly fruits of the earth.

Prof. J. W. Jenks of Cornell University thinks we shall never have a paper thoroughly independent in stating its views until we have one that is first independent of its circulation and advertising; and he adds that no greater service could be done the country than to endow a paper with a sum so large that it would be a matter of indifference whether the people subscribed to it or not.

The friends and admirers of Dr. Brooke Herford will soon have a chance to see and hear him again in this country. That is another inducement to go to the National Conference at Washington. The students of Harvard, where he held the honorable office of preacher, and which gave him his degree, will have a chance to hear him in the "Dudley Lecture." The date will be announced later.

Hereafter round dances are not to be tolerated at Catholic excursions or sociables in the diocese of Pittsburg. Any pastor in that diocese who permits them to have place at any entertainment held by his parish is to be suspended. It is interesting to see the Catholic Church becoming Puritanic in its strictness. But we suppose a waltz introduced in a quadrille, which is a Terpsichorean way of squaring the circle, will not be counted.

The Watchman (Baptist) says: "It is hardly possible to expend too much care in making the church building and surroundings in every detail as clean, neat, and orderly as possible. Sometimes we have wondered if it would not be a good thing to interest the boys and girls of a congregation in keeping the grass plots and side-walks of the church in the trimmest condition." A good suggestion. But will our Baptist neighbor agree that church lawns shall be sprinkled?

The following incident may be and is probably apocryphal, but it is told of the new canon of Westminster: "Having been terribly interrupted by the incessant coughing of his congregation, he suddenly paused in his sermon, and interjected the remark, 'Last night I was dining with the Prince of Wales!' The effect was miraculous; and a solemn silence reigned, as the preacher continued: 'As a matter of fact, my dear brethren, I was not dining with the Prince of Wales last night, but with my own family. I am glad, however, to find that I have at last secured your attention.'"

Rev. E. P. Marvin furnishes a new argument against woman's suffrage, for which Dr. Bulkeley ought to be grateful; "The new woman is simply a modernized edition of the old woman who sinned in the garden because she was led to believe that she hadn't rights enough as things were." To call Eve an old woman is too bad; but Mr. Marvin ought to have added that she not only voted herself, but got Adam to vote her way. By casting this ballot, she succeeded in bringing the knowledge of good and evil in the world. The trouble with the modern politician and a good many other people is that they do not always choose rightly between them.

Those who are planning to attend the National Conference should send to Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street, Boston, and get a little pamphlet of fourteen pages, giving eight different itineraries of journeys to Washington and return. These itineraries are especially arranged for New England travellers; and some of them provide for excursions to Gettysburg, Blue Ridge, or to Old Point Comfort. They will be personally conducted, and include transportation, hotel accommodation, and care of baggage; or tickets may be obtained for the round trip, including transportation only. Delegates or others who intend to avail themselves of this opportunity should register as early as convenient. All tickets for the personally conducted excursions must be taken on or before October 16.

A writer in the Congregationalist, commending the historical pilgrimage as a factor in education, describes the experience of a party of young people who, knowing the general facts about the battle, "obtained much that history cannot give when, starting from Cambridge Common, where the president of Harvard College offered the prayer before the battle, they followed on foot the line of the night march over Charlestown Neck, noted from Charlestown Heights the conformation of the peninsula and the position of the British ships on whose decks the unsuspecting watchmen called out their hourly 'All's well' within sound of the patriots' shovels, formed in line where Stark's brigade lay behind the rail fence where the most of the fighting was done, and then explored Bunker Hill and Copp's Hill opposite."

Rev. Dr. Theodore Cuyler, writing from Mohonk to the Evangelist, tells of the catholicity of a Sunday evening praise meeting: "At these Sunday evening services of praise I have been struck with the beautiful catholicity of the hymn-book. The lions and the lambs lie down together in the hymnological pasture-grounds: Calvinist and Arminian forget all their controversies when they both join in shouting, 'All hail the power of Jesus' name!' Protestant and Baptist alike can chant the old hymn that Saint Stephen of Saba first chanted eleven centuries ago. Two of our grandest hymns have a Unitarian parentage,—'In the Cross of Christ I glory,' by Sir John Bowring, and 'Nearer, my God, to thee,' by Mrs. Sarah Flower Adams. The father of English hymnology, Dr. Watts, was a Congregationalist; and the devout old blind lady, who has furnished over two thousand hymns (of the Sankey school of music), Mrs. Fanny Crosby Vanalstyne, is a fervent Methodist. 'Just as I am, without one Plea,' was composed by an English Episcopalian; and 'My Jesus, as thou wilt,' by a German Lutheran."

Pro and Con.

KEY AT THE DRUGGIST'S.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The Appalachian Mountain Club have been making a trip, via the Canadian Pacific, to the Pacific Coast. This morning the city of Tacoma might have been edified by the unusual sight of thirteen Appalachians going in a body to church. Think of it! We were intending to encourage the Unitarian faith, to rejoice the heart of the minister, Mr. Alfred Martin, who is said to be an ultra-liberal, calling his church undenominational. The hotel clerk said it was only about six blocks off,—a short walk. So we set forth quite properly, not because all were Unitarians, but for the sake of going somewhere; and the Unitarian element predominated. Well, we walked and walked, asking directions now and again, till, after over a mile of up hill and down, we came to the unpretending little vine-covered edifice with a hospitable notice on the closed door, "Key at the Druggist's." It had not occurred to any of us that the minister's summer vacation might be in progress, as was evidently the case.

The walk had been through some of the prettiest streets, which we were glad to see, so we personally did not regret the failure of the church-going plan, and went contentedly back to the hotel; while the rest of the folks, undaunted, went into the next church they came to that was open.

PHYLLA.

CHURCH PRIVILEGES.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I have read with much interest the articles on the "free pew system." Having had an experience of eleven or twelve years in collecting the money to pay the bills of a society supported by the voluntary contribution system, I wish to add a few words to what has already been said.

It is true that we have not really free churches,—not until we all bring of our most precious things, as did the Israelites of old, and build a church on which there is no debt, and the preacher preaches from a pure love of souls, and the congregation can sing with a religious fervor that is a divine harmony, and the sexton and other officers work for the pleasure it gives them, and we hold our meetings by daylight, and run our own risks of fire: not until then, I say, can we have a church really free.

But, next to the common blessings of air and sunlight,—blessings that we do not realize until we are deprived of them,—I believe there is nothing we prize so much as the things we pay for. If we make sacrifices for them willingly, they become doubly dear to us. We desire the success of our object. We have a pride in it, and are not willing to see our efforts come to naught. This, I am aware, is not the highest motive; but I am not speaking of the highest church, only the outward and visible form of our outward and visible worship. To our church services all are welcome. But I notice it is those who pay—even if it is only a small sum, if their means do not admit of a larger one—to whom we look for interest, for attendance, and for help in carrying on the work of the parish. Strangers who come to live among us, and who give at first because they are asked, perhaps, will grow to have an interest, and will cast in their lot with us in that way.

And, while it is right and proper for the richer members to be willing to give freely of their abundance, I believe it is wrong to say that they should bear the whole burden. I have not had to do with the very poorest; but I believe that, generally speaking, there is no one, except perhaps in the time of some unusually hard pinch, who could not give something and feel the better for it. I believe it pauperizes people as much to receive their church privileges free as to receive their food free. I am always sorry to hear the remark, made usually as an excuse for not giving, Mr. A. or Mr. Z. could pay all the expenses of the church, and not feel it. That is the very thing: we need to feel it. The rich people cast of their abundance into the treasury of the temple, and it was looked upon as a matter of course; but, when the poor widow cast in her two mites, which represented toil and sacrifice, she was immediately made an example of for all coming generations.

B.

THE FREE PEW SYSTEM.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

The free seat does not always mean the same thing. It should. A free seat assigned, or claimed, with or without compensation, is not free, and should not be so classed. A free seat means a seat without cost to the sitter, and is any seat in the church not filled at the time of one's entering the church for worship to be assigned for that hour, or, if there is no usher, to be taken, no one having any claim upon the seat thus to be occupied but the sitter.

There are two distinct kinds of churches to be considered in connection with the free seat system,—the missionary church, purely as such, carried on by some church or a syndicate of churches, and the ordinary self-supporting church.

It is expected that the first class shall be free absolutely to the people attending worship. It might be consistent with such a church to take collections occasionally or regularly for the use of the church or even for charity. I should say that it would be advisable, as it would stimulate the helpful feeling that even through poverty it is possible to contribute toward charity. But, at best, a mission church puts a poverty label upon each attendant or member, and has an effect to lower the tone of the church and the character, just as, in another direction, there is something degrading and injurious to character to be recorded as a member of a reform school. Of course, I want to believe in the mission church, and I have to accept reformatories; but there is a danger line in glorifying either. There is a better way of dealing with both than is encouraged. The fewest possible, surely, of the latter, the better. Too many thus get a smirch they never outgrow.

The second class, the regular church free seat system, has its advantages and its disadvantages. I have already defined what a free seat is. We must hold to that. A seat held as one's own for use, paid for or free, is no free seat. The majority of pews and seats in so-called free churches are thus held,—not all absolutely, but by a sort of right of possession, when not actually assigned; and these people feel troubled to find the seat or pew occupied by others, strangers or regular worshippers. A way of settling the question of seat tenure would be to assign a seat to all who pay anything regularly toward the support of the church, and all others to have any, any time, not occupied when they enter the church. But that is practically the pew-rental system, and should not be dignified or degraded with a false label.

If the gospel, as the Salvation Army practically testifies, is for the lost and the poor, then moral, intelligent, and well-to-do people should take a hint from this increasingly popular institution. But that is run on a business basis, and every member is a contributor of service or of cash. Dead-headism there lasts only as long as it takes to get its members cleanly and self-respecting, sober and consecrated to the work. The tendency, on the other hand, of the regular church mission, is to pauperize its members temporarily and spiritually, and to make them scarcely any better than they were when they had the old surroundings. Some of the arguments used in favor of free seats are: (1) The gospel should be free, without money and without price. (2) The true church is democratic, and knows no caste or distinction; and so all seats at church should be equally free and available to all,—the first comers selecting the seats desired by them. (3) The humanitarian versus the mercantile spirit is the true church idea. (4) The doctrine that all men are brethren and God the common Father demands the common seat system of first come, first served. (5) Wealth and culture should both be consecrated to the religious training of the poor and ignorant. (6) The Golden Rule and the spirit of Christ's teachings and example seem to warrant this method. (7) The benefit spiritually of the better classes is a reason why these people should devote their money and their service—to say nothing of the saving of these lost people—to securing a free gospel, free churches, and free pews.

The arguments against the free seat system are briefly these: (1) The more in number that pay what they are able, the better for the finances of the church. Who ever knew a church whose expenses were met by one man or a few, with no effort or self-sacrifice by the many, to succeed? (2) The more the individual members of a congregation can be induced to contribute to the church of work or money, the better for these people in all respects, since it teaches industry, economy, sobriety, self-dependence, self-respect, and takes away the deadening effect of deadheadism, and being beneficiaries instead of aiders to the best of all causes. It lessens expensive outgoes for vicious tastes and appetites to have a high moral purpose to work out. (3) People who pay for pew or seat occupy them more, become more interested and devoted to the church, are happier in feeling that they perhaps pinch to pay for so much good. They ought to be educated to feel meanly to steal anything, or to feed at free soup or seat at church. The free seat lessens the possibility of doing the very best to develop the manly character, or the high-minded religious temper of mind, even in the poorest. (4) The tone of the church goes down with the tone of character developed. The free seat brings in to this second class of well-to-do churches bummers, the mean and stingy; and, if it is said they are just the ones who need the gospel, yes, but the very fact that it ministers to miserliness shuts them off from the possibility of benefit. (5) The church is ideally a democracy: nations, society, should be, provided it is a levelling upward; and yet there is such a thing as natural caste. Nature has set the lines of mutual friendship and all associated life, family, church, like to like. There cannot well be, save artificially and forced and for the hour, one social centre for the church and another for society at large. To try to be all alike one hour a week will be to patronize or be patronized, and to act the hypocrite and bring reproach upon religion. (6) It is a mistake that so many are too poor to pay something toward the church. I have excepted purely, yet hesitatingly, missionary churches; but any one who really wants to go to church and pay for a seat will find a way to do it, as they do to buy bread or beer or bicycles or excursion tickets. Train these people to value highest the best things, and not take away the sense of worth in them by flinging them patronizingly or pompously at their feet. And, then, I believe that fewer poor people will attend a church with free seats than where they cost something. The thrifty poor will choose to go to the church which demands pay for its seats. They are found there. Even the poorest protest inwardly against free anything, for soul or body. And that sense needs to be encouraged. (7) The spirit of the new charity is "Science versus sentiment," "Not alms, but a friend." Keep close to that modern method, adding, "Help the poor to help themselves," and you will be so careful how you overdo charity and philanthropy. That is the imminent danger in the modern church. I am a bit afraid of an institutional church craze. It has its dangers.

The free seat system breaks up or greatly disturbs the worshipper. The sense of having a seat with its old associations and surroundings, and its angle of vision in the same direction toward the pulpit, is worth much. But to sit here to-day and there to-morrow, for father to sit here and mother there and children there, because some one has come early and rightfully taken the seat, is to irritate, disturb, unfit, one for meditation, repose, and aspiration, which true worship is supposed to inspire. The poor need all this just as much as the rich, and, instead of free pews, let the money be raised by subscription, a part of which shall be given to the really poor to be invested by them in seats, all to be assigned and be occupied, if possible; and transient comers, rich or poor, can usually have seats furnished them.

The popular cry is free seats, and perhaps it is the thing to encourage; but a serious responsibility will be thus incurred, and work damage in many directions.

A. JUDSON RICH.

For the Christian Register.

THEIR INFLUENCE.

BY REV. WILLIAM BRUNTON.

She bore red roses out of church,
Where they had been a pleasure sweet;
And, while she walked before our path,
They breathed their perfume in the street.
Ah! so, I said, the Christian lives,
In prayer and song and love complete,
And then to other souls he gives
Like greeting in the common street!

A LITTLE CITY IN THE MOUNTAINS.

BY J. LEONARD CORNING, SR.

The mountain ranges of the Tyrol are within easy access from Munich, and a half hour's ride by rail on a clear day will bring us within sight of some of its snow-capped peaks. The mountain nests of Bavaria overlooking the Austrian frontier are many, and it is our habit to select a new one every year for our summer outing. This time we fixed upon the little city of Füssen, on the river Lech, close under the shadows of the Julian Alps,—“ad fauces Julias,” as the old Romans were wont to designate its locality; that is, at the feet of the Julian. The Germans only translated the Latin name in calling the little old Swabian city Füssen; and they have made sure of their philology by painting upon the local escutcheon on the façade of the city council house three feet kicking wildly in the air, with fractions of legs as accessories.

Our simple rustic nest is a farm-house about ten minutes' walk from the city and about five or six minutes' walk from the Austrian frontier, which we occasionally cross just for the novelty of taking dinner in a foreign country.

Perhaps no town of its size in Europe has within its limits and in its environs so many notable sights and memories as our little city in the mountains. The Emperor Maximilian I. used to call it his “little Augsburg”; and one of his favorite past-times was to hunt in its neighboring forests, in which, tradition relates, he killed a great many bears with his own hand.

Far away in the valley approaching our little mountain nest one can locate it by the walls and towers of the ancient castle, overtopping all adjacent architectures from its rocky throne, much as Heidelberg Castle looks proudly down upon the farms and buildings of the Neckar valley. This mountain fastness dates from the beginning of the fourteenth century, and was built for a summer residence by Bishop Friedrich I. of Augsburg. Towering aloft from its rocky base and frowning gloomily down upon the city and surrounding landscape, it is an almost imperishable memorial of the proud usurpations of the old ecclesiasticism, some remnants of which still survive in this region of the earth. We have made the long circuitous journey through the halls and corridors of this mighty and mouldy pile, and have selected the rooms which we would like to occupy during the next season, should our fancy incline the path of our summer outing in this direction. For you must know that the glory of that grand old episcopal castle long since departed, and the poor peasants who have it now in charge are glad to rent its rooms to transient lodgers at twenty-five cents a day. I think I would pay that much to sleep for a single night in the chamber occupied by his grace the bishop of Augsburg more than five hundred years ago. Who can tell but in such surroundings I might in dreams live over again the ecclesiastical ambitions and satisfactions of my youth, all of which have long ago been remanded to the period of intellectual whooping-cough and measles?

The Benedictine monks were a very wealthy order up to the beginning of the present century, and they have left here an architectural monument which in its splendor partly atones for the usurpations that occasioned the suppression of the order by royal edict. This monument is the church of St. Magnus, whose foundations date from the eighth century, the superstructure, with its present rich accessories, however, being not yet two centuries old. Here are conserved the mortal remains of Saint Magnus, the founder of the Benedictine monastery, who, tradition relates, walked over the foaming waters of the Lech, and with his episcopal staff drove out the wild beasts from the neighboring forests, and thus made the land habitable. A piece of this wonder-working staff is on exhibition in the crypt of the sacred edifice; and, as I stood and contemplated its inherent power (for which privilege I paid the sum of ten cents), I could not repress a wish that I might get the loan of it, and hand it over to the new police commissioners of the city of New York, that they might try its virtues on the wild beasts which stalk abroad in human shape through the streets of that devoted city.

In one of the chapels of this magnificent church I saw twenty painted tablets, copied from Holbein's “Dance of Death” by an obscure painter at the beginning of the seventeenth century. Perhaps we are indebted to his unskilled hand for making this painted sermon of mortality more gruesome than the original itself. Within a few minutes' walk of this memorable sanctuary is the Church of the Holy Spirit, a small structure showing the pedantic rococo style of architecture and internal decoration to full advantage. Nearly the entire front is taken up with two enormous paintings of Saint George and Saint Christopher, the latter with the child Jesus on his shoulders, whom our rustic landlady individualized as Saint Columbus,—a piece of information for which, I confess, I was not quite prepared. In the triangular space enclosed by the gable is the Trinitarian dogma in the conventional style of painted Trinities, the Father an old man with white flowing beard, the Son a vigorous youth with the cross, and the Third Person at the top of the triangle in the form of a dove. I have seen and exhibited many painted Trinities, and this one is neither better nor worse than the average. Truth to tell, dogma is hard to paint; and, of all dogmas illustrating the difficulty of the task, the arithmetical paradox of the Trinity is perhaps the chief.

Crossing the bridge over the Lech, and taking an ascending path due south-east, a walk of less than an hour conducts us to the mediæval architectural folly of Hohenschwangau, a stately mass of walls and towers and pinnacles, dating from the eleventh century. Perhaps I should beg pardon for calling this memorable pile an architectural folly. I certainly do not intend to criticise it as a work of art. As such, it is a noble relic, and challenges admiration. But the moral meaning of a princely residence perched high in the air, as if it were a vulture ready to swoop down and devour the dwellers of the valley, is not to be admired; and this is what royalty and princely rank meant when this architectural relic was built, and for long centuries thereafter. Perhaps the most creditable memory which lingers about the walls of Hohenschwangau is the pretty authentic tradition that they once offered a night's shelter to Martin Luther on his departure from Augsburg after his famous disputation with Cardinal Cajetan concerning the doctrines of the reformed faith.

But the crowning architectural glory of Füssen is the magnificent castle of Neuschwanstein, built in the Romanesque style of the twelfth century by the late eccentric and unhappy King Ludwig II., who, you will remember, drowned himself some years ago in the lake of Starnberg. Dr. Gsell Fels calls this edifice “the noblest mountain castle of modern times,” and such it undoubtedly is. The cost of it was seven and a half million dollars, and a third of it yet remains uncompleted. Its massive walls look as if they could rival the Pyramids in indestructibility, and its interior splendors baffle description. On the lower floor is a long series of bedrooms for the accommodation of the royal servants; but on the floor intended for royal lodgment there is only one bedroom, a wonder of Gothic beauty and splendor, and this designed for the king himself. On that magnificent gold-canopied couch he slept, the custodian informed me, but a night or two before his tragical death. In that music-hall of more than Oriental splendor choirs of singers and players on instruments used to render the masterpieces of music, he himself being the only listener. Alas! when eccentricity of mind takes on moral aberrations, what a melancholy spectacle is the result! Yet art owes a debt to the unfortunate Ludwig II. which the world will not easily forget. He it was who found out Wagner, and introduced him to the reluctant recognition of our time. This one service to modern culture balances a good many scores.

In a few days the people of our little city in the mountains and the rustic dwellers of the valley far and near will drop their wonted industries for a few hours, and gather in the churches to commemorate the Ascension of the Virgin Mary. As for ourselves, we have had our earthly ascensions for the year; and on the anniversary of Mary's mounting into cloud-land we shall be rattling downward to the grime and smoke of the Bavarian capital.

Faulenbach, bei Füssen, Bavaria, August, 1895.

UP AND DOING.

BY R. L. BRIDGMAN.

It has been demonstrated to the satisfaction of spectators that Pennsylvania is held firmly in the grasp of a political boss. Senator Quay has resisted triumphantly an attempt to overthrow him, which had many elements of success in its favor. Against him was the Republican governor, Hastings, elected by a great majority last year, who used his large powers to defeat him. Many of his old political friends and associates were this year in the ranks of his opponents. In Philadelphia and Pittsburg the Republican leaders of most prestige and most familiar with political manipulation were allied with his enemies. In his own party were the daily papers and the men who were most vigorous in denouncing him. Yet he carried a safe majority of the State convention, and both sides united at his feet in harmonious demonstrations. Apparently, it was a contest of selfish and unselfish forces in politics; and apparently the former won, or there was no significance which we, at this distance, can extract from the events.

Coincidentally with this significant event comes the publication of a letter written from Europe by Rev. Dr. Parkhurst, attacking the New York police vigorously, and making it plain that the struggle there is by no means ended, and that “there is no discharge in that war.” A convention of Good Government Clubs of New York City has just been held, giving promise that the anti-Tammany movement of last year, headed by the Committee of Seventy, will be continued in strong hands this year. Joseph Larocque, late chairman of the Committee of Seventy, was temporary chairman of this convention; and one of the resolutions adopted was that the purpose to secure good government “can best be carried out by the nomination and election of municipal officers upon strictly non-partisan lines.” What was done by the Committee of Seventy and by its reform associates, as Dr. Parkhurst said in his Music Hall address, was but a beginning. That committee has formally dissolved; but the men who made it what it was, who were its vigor and its wisdom, see that they can defeat Tammany permanently only by uniting all honest men against it and by constant agitation. It will not do at all for men who want honest and competent government to bestir themselves only once a year, leaving the men whose living is in their office-holding to scheme and to manipulate during the entire twelvemonth. The contest for good government is as constant as the struggle for existence.

It is one of the fortunate things for Massachusetts that the State has no political boss. Not a man has ever had that distinction. Not a man has been so prominent that the people have turned instinctively to him alone. Not a man has been able to carry either party at his will, one way or another. There has been a constant jealousy of political bossism and constant freedom from it. One reason for this freedom is found in the frequency with which the people can express their opinion at the polls. In Massachusetts there is no long term of years during which the politicians can plan and manipulate, while business men go on accumulating money and thoughtless people pursue their frivolities, making no account of the serious concerns of government. Before any political manipulator can get his power well established, the people have an opportunity to express their will; and often is it proved that they are the masters, not the servants or tools, of the men who are at the front in political matters. Their judgment is well trained. They are familiar with political questions, and are accustomed to political action. Hence they keep control of their own affairs, and, as a rule, manage them so that either great abuses do not arise or are of short duration.

One of the demonstrations of the last year, of the fight with Tammany (not yet certain in outcome), of the resistance to Plattism in New York, to Gormanism in Maryland, and to Quayism in Pennsylvania, is that “eternal vigilance” on the part of the people is imperative if they are to have a safe popular government, in which the public good is the chief end, and in which offices are held by men on their merits. Our government is the prime concern we have to attend to, actually standing, in importance, before the duty of providing for one's self. It cannot and must not be neglected. The old idea that government will run itself and be all right will not do in our day. Constant watchfulness, personal interest in political questions, personal share in the nomination of officers, and personal attendance at the polls,—all these are imperative upon every good citizen.

Ours is a government by the people; and it is a problem of the times to cultivate and to develop in the mass of the people that disposition to attend first of all to public matters, to attain that quickness and soundness of judgment in passing upon public questions and that unselfishness of service which only will make the government efficient and stable. Cultivation of our political sense is an urgent need of our times. We must have, if we prosper, a realization of our functions as government-makers so keen that the mass of the people will take a lively interest in public affairs, and will attend to them promptly and competently, with no dictation from any party boss, and with no blind attachment to any party organization. We love the sentiment, “Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori”; but, while we are waiting for the opportunity to die dulcely and decorously for country, we ought to attend to the public business faithfully, so that there may be no bosses, no plundering of the public treasury, no corrupt judiciary, no rotten police force, no domination by the saloon, no ring of any sort ruling and fattening at the expense of the people.

THE SONG OF SUFFERING.

BY MISS E. P. CHANNING.

In some moods perhaps none of us is free from the teasing reiteration of a phrase, pleasant or otherwise, as once grateful sleep eluded me as I was pestered by the question “Under which king, Bassanio?

Speak, or die.”

Sometimes a suggestive quotation haunts the mind, as the following, which was written of Vittoria Colonna, but is equally applicable to the large sisterhood of consolation:—

“She learned in suffering
What she taught in song.”

She, not he; for, whatever other monopoly man craves, as a rule, he is content that woman should have the monopoly of suffering. Physically and spiritually, it is hers. The divine man was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, but he is the great exception to the general rule. How well woman learns the lesson! Think what the world would be, with its individual and its family distress, if that lesson were not by her well learned. As a woman grows older, whatever she may do with her own heartache, her consciousness of the widening and deepening universal sorrow fills her heart with pity for her fellow-creatures, some of whom are not so strong to bear as she. With such a deep sense of the prevailing woe, how can she teach in song what she has learned in suffering? The how may puzzle, but that she does thus teach is as true as that the inward sun shines on the prepared soil. The song may not be in rhyme or even in words. A tone, a look, or a smile can teach the lesson. Poor is the home that has not such a teacher. More than the minister or the set precept, she goes on her animated way, lifting one little burden after another, or, better still, teaching the burden-bearer to lift it for himself. One asks, Is she exempt from trial? Whence that tranquil brow, that reassuring voice, that unflagging zeal? In spite of the delicacy of her nerves, by her sympathy she is eminently fitted to console. If one wonder at the strength with which she bears the suffering which leans so heavily on her, and fancy it is because her own lot is exceptionally bright, read rather the true lesson of her courage. She has "learned to mend a broken heart with other people's interests, so that the marks should show little. There may be some souls whose brave and bitter lot it is to conquer comfortless." There is not one man in a hundred who has as much courage as a woman. Whence her courage? From her religious faith. I rejoice to believe that the following petition, written by some one, consciously or unconsciously goes up from quiet hearts, unknown of men: "Grant me with loving hand to bring refreshment to his weary ones. Verily, I should know how to speak to sick hearts, for I have greatly suffered, and therefore I can speak to those who suffer, too; for, if I dare say it, before any can open the kingdom of heaven to another, he must first have overcome the sharpness of death himself."

Dr. Dewey said: "Sorrow holds the keys of our mortal life. She ushered us into it. She opens all the passage to another life. . . . I have seen an old man on his bier; and I said: Hath he done the work of many years faithfully? Hath he come to his end, like a shock of corn fully ripe? Then all is well. There is no evil in death but what life makes." Phillips Brooks said: "The greater part of any one's life was generally passed in suffering. . . . Pain may be called a sort of universal sacrament, the outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual disorder."

"Art thou weary, tender heart?
Be glad of pain.
In sorrow sweeter things will grow,
As flowers in rain.
God watches, and thou wilt have sun
When clouds their perfect work have done."

"Why art thou so cast down? Thou hast good reason to be so, but one must never be as sad as one's fate." T. T. Munger says, "It should be the first question with one who in any way suffers, as it is nearly always the first impulse, To what service of ministering pity am I called?" And another says: "I never knew one who worked among the suffering to complain of his own lot. It makes men dumb to see what others have to endure."

SCIENCE AND THE HOLY GHOST.

BY W. A. CRAM.

In the Christian Church the Holy Spirit has been widely believed and taught as the third member in the triune Godhead. In another form it was accepted and revered as a miraculous manifestation of God. Yet, again, it has been believed to be a supernatural gift, a special kind of heavenly providence, endowing favored mortals with miraculous powers.

Science and reason have commonly ignored it as outside their legitimate domain, or smilingly offered the passing bow to it as "half child's play, half God in the heart." In the later growth of science a new phase of thought and belief seems to be arising concerning the reality and meaning of what is called the Holy Spirit; namely, that it is a part of nature, a manifestation of soul in and through forms and life of this world, just as natural and common as the falling of rain, the flow of electric currents, the blossoming of trees and singing of birds. How shall we present this growing thought, this new faith?

Here is the crystal or mineral world. Natural science presents it to us as one degree in the evolution of forms and life of our earth. The next degree above is the vegetable, above the vegetable the animal. These three constitute the body and life development of our earth, so far as our common senses reach. We may consider them interconnecting links of an endless chain of being,—below, the mineral, invisible links up through which the elements and energies of the crystal world have come into our earth being; above, the animal degree, invisible degrees of higher, more perfected bodies and lives, reaching upward into the unseen realms of the universe infinitely beyond all ken of our senses. Three degrees appear, then, of bodies and lives in our common-sense world: below, an invisible realm, from which our visible world arose; above, an invisible into which all things seen are moving. On the great highway of evolution the soul of the crystal is striving upward to plant, the plant to animal life, and man whither? Does the soul's ascending way stop at man or at the upper borders of this world? Has man ever reached the serenest heights of perfected love, of goodness and beauty, that he could say hope and desire reach no farther? Has the crystal all the elements and energies within its own form and degree to evolve, to lift itself into plant, with no life or will to feed and draw from above? Nature is quite plain in her answer. The crystal would never rise above its own degree, were there no soul, no power of higher life to feed and draw. The plant breathes forth its own spirit and energy upon the rock. It reaches out its hands of higher life, dissolves, leads up, moulds and quickens the crystal into tree trunk, into leaf and blossom. In other words, it feeds and helps the soul of the crystal to climb up to the plant degree. Has the plant the will or energy, unaided, to transform itself into animal? We cannot see, we do not know that it ever does; but everywhere the animal world draws and moulds the vegetable into its own degree and life. So far as we can discover, no lower degree of being has power or will sufficient in itself to grow and give itself birth into a higher. Nature says through rock and plant to rise there is ever needed the power and will from above to aid. Is man an exception? Does nature work by a new law in her evolution of man or by the same old law in more perfected ways? Science and reason answer, The same old law, only higher up. But what higher degree over man that shall feed and draw him? The unseen universe. Our earth is being discovered to be a little island world, infolded and overflowed by a boundless realm, an invisible ocean of being. Now, this infinite unseen is related to our seen, much as our atmosphere to the grosser earth-crust, or in life as the plant is related to the crystal and the animal to the plant. Each higher in nature partly borders and partly interblends with the next lower. The next upper kingdom of matter and life bordering ours is almost unknown to us, never directly visible, as we may suppose the vegetable kingdom unknown to the mineral or the animal to the vegetal. Yet each lower in turn is life dependent upon the next higher. It appears that always from above are the chief sources of all organization and life. We are dependent for all the higher elements and forces of growth and evolution upon the life and energy of this vast invisible spiritual universe that infolds us, just as naturally as the mineral is dependent on the plant, and the plant on the animal.

Why have we so little consciousness or knowledge through our senses of this great invisible world and life that surrounds us, if we are so dependent upon it? It appears to be nature's way through all ascending degrees of being. The worm has little or no sense or knowledge of the butterfly life so close above his earth-clod way. The reptile can know but little of our homes and work. Conscious life reaches but little above its own degree of organization, however much it may depend upon a higher for its growth and upleading. All the while, however, organs may be growing, senses developing within or upon the body of lower degree, preparatory for birth into a higher. Thus the grub cannot enter into conscious possession of butterfly life through its worm organs and senses; yet within the worm body is developing the embryo organism of eyes, wings, etc., through which the insect soul shall rise into the conscious life of the butterfly's world, casting off in death the outgrown body of the lower state. Science is discovering the same law in the human. We cannot attain to the consciousness of the upper, invisible world and life through the organs and senses of our present state. We must first possess hands, feet, eyes, brain, a whole developed organism, constituted of the elements and energies of the spiritual world, one that responds to the higher invisible life, ere we can see and know it in its richness and fulness. As well may the insect soul possess and know the sunshine and beauty, the sweetness and delight of the butterfly life, when it has attained only to the worm body, as that we can possess and know the reality and beauty, the wisdom and delight, of the higher invisible that borders ours of to-day through these earth bodies that answer only to this lower world of sense. But whence and when, our bodies answering to this higher world and life, if so be we are to attain it? Shall we look this side death or only beyond for them? Shall we ask of miracle or nature concerning them? Has science thus far no vision, no knowledge, to answer us in part? The seers and prophets of the higher science of to-day tell us that we hold a body in embryo, growing for the new life. They assure us that the greater and more essential part of all our organs of life are constituted of the invisible elements and energies of the unseen or spiritual world that surrounds us; that our seen form of hands, feet, eyes, brain, etc., is only a gross, rude framework, a temporary staging, in and over which the invisible spiritual body of us is being grown and moulded. Why not consciously live in and through these spiritual bodies now? We do in fact live to-day more essentially and really in the invisible part of our organisms than in the grosser forms of matter we see and know each other by. But it appears under nature's law that our conscious active lives here must be possessed and expressed more through the hands, feet, eyes, and brain of this world's matter, so long as we abide in this degree.

To state this natural fact in another way. So long as we live in our bodies of this world, all the most real and essential life of our souls that is fed and arises in and through our embryo spiritual bodies must needs be translated and toned down into the sense and consciousness of the earth degree. Keeping this clearly in mind, we say that we are constantly in touch and communion with the upper spiritual world and life, though commonly so little conscious of it. We mark this same fact and natural law of the unconscious response and interaction of seen and unseen, the inner and outer, all about us.

The embryo child is infolded by and holds fast to the mother's organism. All the while it is in touch and communion with the great outer world; for the beauty, hope, joy, and grief, the sunshine and shadow, that flow and consciously live in the mother's loves and strivings, through her flow on and minister to her unborn babe, not to awaken and lead it forth at once, but to feed, to mould, and develop the embryo organs and senses through which the child soul is at length to be born into outer life. We are discovering more and more clearly that nature's way is much the same for us one degree higher up.

The beauty and power, the knowledge, art, love, and striving of worlds and life, that unseen border us above, move before us as a Holy Spirit from unseen heavens, descend for us, feeding and developing our spiritual bodies for new and higher birth than this earth gives.

As the unborn child touches and communes, unconsciously lives with us through his growing embryo limbs, brain, and organs of sense, that feel and respond to the mother's life, so we feel and grow through our embryo spiritual bodies, that are in natural touch and response with the spiritual world, unconsciously communing and living with beings of that world.

In this way of nature's ministering Holy Ghost the ascended prophets and priests give back a measure of their higher life beyond death to the prophets and priests who still abide on earth. So the scholars, artists, inventors, statesmen, and reformers, who have risen through death into the larger, richer light and love, touch and commune with kindred here.

So the friends and lovers that have passed from our homes and fields through death's way over this world's borders are not lost or separated from us, but from thence reach back, aid, and inspire us with the spirit and power of their upper homes and fields.

This inward and higher life of ours, awakened and rising responsive to the call and touch of the higher spiritual world and life, finds little conscious expression in this lower world's organs and senses of matter. It abides within, unfolding and ripening its organism to be, awaiting decay and death of hands, eyes, and brain of these grosser earth forms, for its birth and resurrection into the homes beyond death.

Meantime are we altogether deaf and blind to the soul's higher life that we see not, hear not, feel not, through these common earthly senses? In life's better moments we experience hopes, loves, and aspirations of beauty, of knowledge and delight, we know not realizable here. Yet they arise and abide with us as the divinest revelations and assurances we know.

Are they not the first faint foregleams of the coming day, the new life, answering to the touch and call of the Holy Ghost that lives and works over all?

Everywhere this seems nature's way. So the soul of the pine forests touch and commune with the mountain rocks and stones of the field, bidding them come up higher. In this way the souls of the animal world touch and commune with the forests and flowers, bidding them come up higher.

So the spiritual and unseen higher world descends as a Holy Spirit, touching and communing with us, bidding us "come up higher." Is it not nature's constant way, even as the sunshine and falling rain, the songs of birds and the mother's love?

UNITY AND VARIETY IN RELIGION.

BY P. C. MOZOUMDAR.

Since the holding of the Parliament of Religions, a great deal of talk has taken place on the subject of the future religion. Some years ago a very enthusiastic missionary, who had been to India, complimented me, and said I was quite an advanced man, and that I was waiting for the day when all the great religious books of my country were heaped up and made into a bonfire for the warning and illumination of the world. I was obliged to contradict such an idea of the ultimate religion of the world. I saw that the great books of my country had a great field; that in the past they had taught, and that in the future they shall still teach. I do not believe that the future religion, when it shall come to pass, will be at the expense of any great religion or any great national spiritual life. The history of religion in the past points to what the future is likely to be. Whatever be the origin of religion, whether the sense of the Infinite or an instinct of dependence upon a Higher Power, or a search for the unseen from the seen or from the known after the unknown, whether it be an intimation of Being much like human nature, whatever the originating instinct might be, no one can doubt that such an instinct is common and universal. No nation in any stage of barbarism could get rid of some kind or other of religious faith. Not only is the instinct common and universal, but we find that its product has always been based upon certain common truths and principles. Every religion, from the grossest to the most refined and sublime, has taught the principles of faith and love and purity. This faith, love, and purity always depend upon culture, upon development, and their accompanying graces; but no religion has ever been known which inculcated hatred in place of love, or uncleanness in place of purity, or scepticism in place of belief. If there is faith, in what is that faith? You say in God.

But some one will point out one or two systems of religion in which there is no God, and, after all, God in the dictionary of religion has always amounted to a relative idea; but, whether it mean a man like Buddha, in whom the Buddhists believe, or Mohammed, in whom the Mohammedans believe, or a tree or a stone or a snake, we conclude, whatever the concrete form was, it was undoubtedly a Supreme Being who deserved worship and the trust of the human soul. As man rises from the low to the high, and from the high to the higher, still his ideas of a Divine Being grow also, until they expand into wisdom, love, truth, and holiness, before whom we bow our heads, and say, "Our heavenly Father." Nay, more: not only are the principles common, but the processes are also common.

Every great religion of which I have any knowledge has worshipped God, either through the forces of nature or in the form of heroes and great men, or through their own spiritual instincts. No religion, however idolatrous, has been able to shake off this threefold medium. The Vedas have worshipped God through the forces of nature. David and Elias also saw the manifestations of God's power and wisdom in natural objects so glorious that no argument, no logic, no sophistry, could overcome the simplicity of their natural religion. Behold the incarnation of the Sonship of Christ as God in man! Behold, also, God's attributes in the different deities worshipped in the Hindu Pantheon! Thus you cannot escape the conclusion that processes of religious development have been universal.

Still further, every religion has its symbols, its rites, its organizations, and its authorities. Speaking generally, you will find that these are rather the sacred vessels in which men have placed their faith in God, their love for mankind, their worship, their hopes, their ideas. But here comes the great principle of variety. Oftentimes the rites and the symbols and authorities and organizations of religions differ. Every nation has had its different surrounding circumstances. Its climate is different; its geography, its bodily constitution, its mental temperament, its history, all different. That these differences should have deeply affected the principles of the religious development is not at all wonderful. But the sense of trust, love, and holiness in all religions is the same or similar, only the forms disagree.

Yet I declare that even in the midst of all this variety there is so much in common that the student is wonder-struck at the fact of unity. The unity of great religious books, prophets,—nay, even religious ceremonies and ordinances,—stands out so prominently before you now and then that it seems either the books must have been written in collusion and by mutual agreement, that the prophets must have acted in some kind of mutual conspiracy, or that the same spirit should have inspired what is best and deepest in all religions. In the midst of all the controversies and conflicts that afflict the religious world, you come across the fundamental truths which are so similar that you are struck by the thought that they must have a common soul, a common impulse, a common origin, and a common aim. The differences almost disappear in the agreements. Variety in religious doctrines, dissimilarity in church organizations and Scriptures, characteristic developments, and peculiar growths are things which ought never to be got rid of. Variety means progress: it means life. It means the flavor of national life: it means the subterranean vitalities in which every nation is as original, inspired, stands out before God as his own beloved. For, when variety is knocked out of religious systems, everything leads to a dead level, to a monotonous hue, to uninteresting uniformity. Why, even the most sanguine eclectics would be surprised and shocked at the consequences. Therefore, as these circumstances arose, as various needs arose, and the impulses of variously constructed minds arose, these varieties in religion grew also, until they became so large, so prominent, that the primitive unity seemed to be lost. Yet it was not lost, and the evidence of that is clear at the present time.

"WHITHER WILL ART LEAD US?"

BY R. E. WHITMAN.

In your issue of May 30, under the caption of the "Spirit of the Press," you print without comment an article by Charles Dudley Warner on "Whither will Art lead us?" in which Mr. Warner, clever and well equipped as he is, seems to have fallen into a careless, mildly pessimistic, and unphilosophical conclusion.

Whatever foundation there may be in the divine mathematics for the law of cycles, this may safely be said of it,—that it leads thought out into broader fields of conception than does Solomon's declaration that there is nothing new under the sun, and whatever has been shall be, or Mr. Warner's "coincidence." The idea of cyclic recurrences is in accord with celestial phenomena, and the "spiral ascent" of Swedenborg and Emerson is quite in accord with the law as well as that of the higher evolution. This concept—that man is coming now again into the awakening light of his perihelion, as he seemed to do four hundred years ago, but certainly and surely on a higher plane—inspires the heart of man with hope.

It would be quite impossible for the most comprehensive mind to compute the present amount of debt the human race owes to that disturbance of the stagnant and fetid pool of Western thought produced by the Renaissance of the fifteenth century. Theologically, the earth was flat, hell beneath its thin crust. This incomprehensible plane among far-distant and attendant subordinate spheres was the stage upon which men were enslaved to their own ignorance and superstition, dominated by ecclesiastical authority, which claimed for its cause of being these same Ten Commandments itself had selected from the great number of "thus saith the Lords" recorded as having been delivered to the Israelitish people by their first great leader and teacher, Moses. That which was and is divine and eternal in man was struggling to come into recognition with groanings terrible to be uttered. The thinking principle could no longer be held in universal bondage, neither by the anathemas of the Church nor the soft lullaby of the safety and comfort of the sleeping statu quo. Men would think, though they died for it. The martyr roll we will not repeat; but, if that shaking of the dry bones of assumption resulted in the birth of such forces as Galileo, Bruno, Dante, Columbus, Copernicus, Raphael, Michel Angelo, Machiavelli, Wyclif, Huss, Luther, Bacon, and Shakspeare, and scores of like men, then we may hope that we are indeed on the eve of a like "coincidence," though that former one failed to bring heaven to earth or to make all men agree as to the true relation of art and morals. If the thought of the great world mind has subsisted for four centuries on the manna distributed by these emancipated thinkers, is it not quite time that its digestive power should be stimulated by some new pabulum? Earth thought of as the centre of the universe, and discovered to be and generally accepted to be but a very inconsiderable planet in one of the innumerable star systems, has wrought great changes in thought, though, to my knowledge, never officially accepted as a fact bearing the most remote relation to the fundamental status of theology. Yet even this stupendous rediscovery of four centuries ago was of vastly less importance than the acceptance of the great law of creation by evolution,—that creation ever is, not was, that man was not made out of the dust of the earth, but is being so made.

Is it not quite possible that this quarto-centennial "coincidence" is another occasion for the declaration of the independence of thought, and may result in the abrogation of any fixed law regarding morals that is not forever made subject to the moral consciousness of the individual and in accord with reason ever influenced by conditions? If one is conscious of having departed from the line of law involved in the Mosaic Code, then it would be well to return to that law as a measure of safety to himself and the community, unless he is able to perceive that higher law written by the finger of God in his own consciousness, of which the written code of Moses was only the objective sign and symbol. But how can we return and "sit squarely on the Ten Commandments, and let the world go round"? That same world seems to continue to go round and forward in its orbit, and never seems to think it necessary to turn backward in its flight to oblige any retrogressionist. Neither does it return to its former conditions. If the heavens declare the glory of God, the earth does in fact show his handiwork; and men have studied that handiwork and find the law of progress written on tables of stone much too ponderous for Moses's hands to bring down the mountain. When the earth was the home of the giant reptile and the tangled mass of monstrous herbage, was not the law of God then in its full, unchanging force? Was not that law then being written, in order that the mind of man should some day begin a full and free translation of that law? Where, then, was the "code," as Moses saw it and delivered it to his ignorant and stiff-necked brethren? And can we suppose that the conditions of creation ever moved in any more rapid way than they are now moving? If earth and air by gradual and constant change made it at last possible for man to subsist and breathe, is it not likely that those changes are still going on? And, as reptile became bird and fish became amphibian, because of implanted desire in organism and change of environment, is it not to be supposed that man as man is ever changing in accord with that inevitable, continuous change of conditions?

If those Ten Commandments are the only safe rallying-ground for hopeless, distraught humanity, then is it supposed we are to accept the Jehovah of the Jewish tribes for our own Lord God, whom only we are to serve? This we most assuredly cannot do and keep sacred the divine reason within us. If, then, time and conditions change the image of God in the collective mind of peoples, races, and civilizations, then, as there are no two minds alike in all the millions that live and have lived, consequently no two human souls, no two living organisms, can have the same Lord God, unless we still go back to the idol which might be owned as common property by two or more or by a community. As we are forbidden by this very code to make to ourselves or bow down to any image of anything in heaven above or earth beneath or the waters under the earth, may it not be idolatrous and sacrilegious for one man, or body of men, or even banded ecclesiasticism, to present its mental conception or image for the worship of any soul? Let us hope, then, that this "coincidence" may awaken again the dormant mind and heart of Christendom to the realization of the indwelling God, and that men may find the Ten Commandments and the true cross within their own souls, and cease forever to look back into darkness for light.

Washington, D. C.

AN ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

Mrs. Chaney returns thanks to the following-named ministers who have sent to her their photographs for the Atlanta Exhibit: Rev. Messrs. E. J. Young, C. D. Bradlee, E. E. Hale, H. N. Brown, George Batchelor, M. J. Savage, H. G. Putnam, A. N. Somers, Stephen Peebles, G. F. Clark, E. M. Wilbur, M. A. Safford, E. E. Gordon, J. V. Blake, J. H. Long, Herman Snow, S. B. Flagg, E. B. Payne, D. W. Morehouse, J. F. Dutton, J. B. Morrison, O. J. Fairchild, H. F. Bond, George F. Piper, C. C. Hussey, James De Normandie, C. G. Howland.

Excellent as this list is, every minister whose name is not on the list and who reads this acknowledgment will see that it is not complete. Although the Exposition opens on September 18, these pictures may be sent after that date; and they will form part of the collection of photographs of living Unitarian ministers which is to be kept at the Unitarian Building in Boston.

Mr. and Mrs. Chaney may hereafter be addressed at Atlanta until January, 1896, Post-office Box 643.

THE GRAVE OF LAFAYETTE.

The grave is situated in old Paris, within the grounds of a convent that the ancestors of Lafayette founded, and where repose the remains of many of the French nobility. Above the hero's tomb floats a silken flag, bearing the stars and stripes. A good many years ago an American gentleman left in his will a sum of money to be used for the special purpose of keeping an American flag forever flying over the grave of Lafayette. It has done so without intermission from the day the will went into effect; and whenever, through the wear of the elements, one flag becomes unserviceable, a new one straightway takes its place. Through untold centuries the emblem of the country which in its early struggles for liberty had his beneficent aid will wave above his ashes.—Washington Post.

Spiritual Life.

The crosses which we make for ourselves by a restless anxiety as to the future are not crosses which come from God.—Fénelon.

Many a one can say: I am a man that hath griefs, but the Spirit comforteth me. I am a man that oft knoweth not the way, but the Spirit leadeth me.—W. M. Bicknell.

After all, the kind of world one carries about in one's self is the important thing; and the world outside takes all its grace, color, and value from that.—Letters of Lowell.

If you want to be miserable, think about yourself, about what you want, what you like, what respect people ought to pay to you, and what people think of you.—Charles Kingsley.

The world stands on ideas, and not on iron or cotton; and the iron of iron, the fire of fire, the ether and source of all the elements, is moral force.—Emerson.

Do not take overmuch thought for to-morrow. God, who has led you safely on so far, will lead you on to the end. Be altogether at rest in the loving, holy confidence which you ought to have in his heavenly providence.—Francis de Sales.

Wherever that spiritual greatness that was in Jesus has become known, it has operated like a second conscience in the world, on the one hand making men conscious of their own weaknesses, and on the other hand filling them with a profound realization of the infinite possibilities that lie within each human soul.—A. W. Martin.

Doubtless it is true that only by the cross will any of us ever be saved. But the cross that can save us will not be Christ's: it must be our own. From Christ we may learn how noble and glorious a thing a cross rightly borne may become, and thus draw incentive and strength from his example. But the example must awaken in us the same faith in truth, the same devotion to duty, the same love of our fellow-men, the same willing obedience to God, or else it will avail us naught.—J. T. Sunderland.

THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

BOOK-ROOM CHAT.

What about the Conference at Washington? is the question most frequently asked nowadays at our rooms. The programme for this meeting is nearly completed. The plans for getting to and from Washington are already perfected. In addition to the regular excursion rates arranged for by the secretary and treasurer of the Council of the National Conference, Messrs. Raymond and Whitcomb announce eight itineraries, all of which include Washington during the entire Conference, and also present several attractive excursions in addition to the Conference,—Gettysburg, Old Point Comfort, Va., and Richmond. The cost of these excursions is very reasonable. Some of the advertisements of these excursions, giving the itineraries and cost, have been left at these rooms; and we shall be glad to send them to any of our friends who may wish to see them.

We have a new book this week, "From Jerusalem to Nicæa: The Church in the First Three Centuries," by Rev. Philip Stafford Moxom. The book contains eight lectures delivered under the auspices of the Lowell Institute, Boston, last spring. The lectures are printed as delivered, with the addition of many illustrative quotations from the early fathers which had to be omitted in delivery, but appear in the book. The subjects treated are familiar to ministers generally; but the general reader will find in the book much to interest and instruct him. The high standing of the author is a sufficient guarantee that whatever he says will be worthy of the most careful consideration. Price $1.13.

We have some more books, written by our staunch and vigorous Unitarian writers, that ought to be spread abroad in the world to build up and confirm the reverent faith our Church stands for, among them four books by Rev. J. H. Crooker of Helena, Mont.; namely, "Jesus Brought Back," 214 pages, "The New Bible and its Uses," 286 pages, "Problems in American Society," 292 pages. These books are 75 cents each; also a small volume by the same author, "Different New Testament Views of Jesus," 80 pages, cloth 30 cents, in paper 15 cents. We have also a small volume of 84 pages, entitled "The Essential Man," by Rev. George Crosswell Cressey, Ph.D., of Salem, Mass. Price 56 cents. Prices given are all net prices.

COLLECTIONS.

The question of "Free Pews" versus "Rented Pews" has been so freely and ably discussed in the columns of the Register that the treasurer is longing to see somebody stir up the thoughtful men in our churches on the subject of how to raise money for the missionary work of the Church. In order to start such a discussion, will not somebody please to submit a plan? That will be enough. There can be no plan suggested that some other body cannot improve. At least, the probabilities are that such is the case. The Unitarian idea is to unite the best features of all plans. By all means let us have the benefit of a full discussion of all the methods that have been tried, and as many more as any one can suggest.

A WORD TO THE CHURCHES ABOUT WASHINGTON.

The meeting at Washington is almost sure to be a very important one,—perhaps in some respects the most important one ever held. Every minister in the denomination ought to be there for the sake of the churches under his charge; but the fact is many of these ministers, while perhaps they might not like to have me or any one else say it, are not able to spare from their salaries the money it will take to go, and many of them will be compelled to remain at home unless the church over which they are settled sends them. There are two excursions from Boston, both leaving Boston Friday P.M., October 18, and, returning, leave Washington Friday A.M., October 25, reaching Boston Saturday, the 26th, in the forenoon. This makes an eight-day trip. The entire cost for the whole, including everything, is, in one case, Raymond & Whitcomb, $40, and Nason & Durgin, $30. The tours are not exactly the same. We have the advertisements of both at these rooms, and will be glad to send them on application.

VISITS.

Continuing the record of visits, the treasurer had the pleasure of meeting the Unitarians of the old Second Parish of Worcester, Mass., last Sunday,—the "First Unitarian Church" of the "Second Parish," a combination of numbers quite unusual, and also quite curious to those not familiar with the early laws of New England, when the parish was as much a legal division as the town, and when the parishes were supported by a regular tax. This old church has been in existence over a century, and in a town claiming a population now of one hundred thousand people, and with the most glorious gospel ever proclaimed to men,—a gospel that has always been faithfully proclaimed from this pulpit. One would, therefore, naturally expect to find the lower floor filled and the galleries packed; but, alas for the popular discrimination! it is a sad fact that the glorious gospel we preach has no chance in competition with the sanguinary insurance theory against eternal fires that characterizes the business and bargain spirit which at present monopolizes mankind. But we must not let this discourage us. The processes of evolution are slow, but sure. "A thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is passed, and as a watch in the night." We have only to do our part, and not worry about results.

Worcester has one institution that it surely has reason to be proud of,—a free library, that was a revelation to the treasurer of what such an institution could be made to be and to do; and not the least satisfactory of its features is the one that opens its doors to the public seven days in every week. This splendid institution is under the charge of a thoroughly educated and skilful Unitarian, who is doing splendid work with it. GEORGE W. STONE.

The Sunday School.

The Channing Hall "Talks" at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, begin again for the season on next Saturday, September 14, at 2 P.M. The Primary lectures will be merged with the ones given by Rev. Mr. Pulsford on the Intermediate and Advanced lessons. Those who have been accustomed to attend will take notice that the hour for Mr. Pulsford's "Talk" is two o'clock instead of three, as heretofore, and that there will be no separate session for the Primary. It is hoped and planned that Mr. Pulsford, who has been so very inspiring and helpful in his past addresses, will be able to furnish the primary teachers, as well as those of the other grades, with many suggestions and practical aids for their departments. These "Talks" are free. A cordial invitation is extended to the public at large, and all interested in such matters, as well as to Sunday-school workers, to attend.

The first three leaflet lessons, Primary, Intermediate, and Advanced, in the one-topic graded course for the current year on "The Teaching of Jesus," are out. The subjects are "The Kingdom of Heaven," "The Pearl of Great Price," and "The House on the Rock." The Intermediate and Advanced are printed together on a four-page leaflet. Price 50 cents per hundred leaflets. The Primary, with picture, is also a four-page leaflet. Price 50 cents per hundred. The present three numbers cover September 15, 22, and 29.

A new catalogue has just been issued by the Unitarian Sunday School Society, containing a full list of all its publications. Copies will be sent to any one applying or writing for the same.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning: announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

REV. JAMES HARWOOD, formerly of the High Pavement Church, Nottingham, England, and now of London, is making a brief visit to this city, with Mr. De Normandie, and will preach for the First Church in Roxbury, Sunday next, September 15, at eleven o'clock.

If secretaries of the various organizations calling meetings at the Unitarian Building will regularly send, with their other notices, one to the American Unitarian Association, 25 Beacon Street, it will be a convenience to the American Unitarian Association, as well as enabling them to give information that is frequently called for by members of the different committees.

DR. BROOKE HERFORD sailed the 5th of September by the "Gallia" to Boston. He will go direct, on landing, to Rev. John Cuckson's at Wayland; and then, after a few days, to Manchester-by-the-Sea, preaching in the new church there September 22, and visiting among old friends at Manchester, Beverly, Swampscott, etc. From October 6 to 20 he will be in Cambridge and Boston, preaching, October 13, at Brookline in the morning, and in the College Chapel, Cambridge, in the evening. October 20 he preaches at Arlington Street morning and afternoon, and then goes on to Washington for the National Conference. Thence, on the 25th, he returns to Boston to take the "Gallia" on the 26th for his return to England. Letters, etc., may be addressed to the American Unitarian Association Rooms, 25 Beacon Street.

Boston.—Church of the Unity: Services will begin again September 22; and Rev. M. J. Savage, the pastor, will preach.

Boston Common: Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D., and Rev. Ida C. Hultin of Moline, Ill., were the speakers under the cottonwood-tree at the open-air service last Sunday. The attendance was larger, if anything, than usual. Dr. Hale spoke on "The Creation of a Better American Character," and Miss Hultin's subject was "The Naturalness of Religion." The speakers for next Sunday, September 15, at 5 P.M., will be Rev. John M. Pullman, D.D. (Universalist), of Lynn, Mass., and Rev. Albert Walkley of Boston.

Dorchester: The Sunday-school connected with Christ Church reopened Sunday, September 8; and in preparation for the opening a circular had been distributed which outlined the work of the coming year, and invited the co-operation of parents and all interested. The main school will use the lessons on "The Teachings of Jesus" and "The Beginnings of Christianity." The "Research Class," open to all young men and young women, will devote the season to "A Study of the Sects." Edwin J. Lewis, Jr., is the superintendent.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.—Rev. Thomas Jay Horner opened his pastorate here Sunday, taking for his text, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God." The congregation was variously estimated at between five and six hundred, and both pastor and people expressed themselves as well pleased with the prospect for the winter. The Lecture Committee, having in charge the "People's Popular Lecture Course," connected with the Independent Church, have arranged for a series of entertainments for the winter which will cost about $1,400. The course will be opened by Theodore Thomas's orchestra, to be followed by Rev. W. D. Simonds, Max O'Rell, Rev. J. J. Lewis ("Passion Play of Oberammergau"), Rev. Henry Elliott Mott of Buffalo, and "Boston Rivals."

NEWBURG, N.Y.—Services were resumed Sunday morning, September 1, at the Church of Our Father, by its pastor, Rev. Arthur H. Grant, who was greeted by the largest morning congregation, with perhaps one exception, that had ever gathered to hear him. This encouraging circumstance was due to a card, printed by order of the board of trustees, and mailed in due time to every church member. It read as follows: "The Church of Our Father will resume its regular morning services on Sunday, September 1. It would be a great encouragement to the pastor to be greeted at this first service by a large congregation. We hope, therefore, that all of the congregation who are in town will make a special effort to be present at this time. The Sunday-school will reopen September 8. Evening services will not be resumed until a later date." A falling-off in congregations during the summer vacation is not an uncommon event in many of our churches. Many attendants lose their ephemeral interest in the services, while often the more stable element are attacked by a sort of Unitarian inertia. In all such cases the card method of the Church of Our Father may be resorted to with a possible great advantage.

PATERSON, N.J.—Under the title "Plain Sermons for Practical People," Unitarian services were resumed last Sunday in this new field. They are in charge of the neighboring ministers, Rev. George H. Badger of Rutherford and Rev. F. S. C. Wicks of Passaic, and are held Sunday afternoons, at 3.30 o'clock, in Odd Fellows'

Hall. Following is the programme: September 8, "Retribution and Reward," Rev. F. S. C. Wicks; September 15, "Good People who don't go to Church," Rev. George H. Badger; September 22, "Pure Religion and Undeified," Rev. Mr. Wicks; September 29, "A Parable of the Bicycle," Rev. Mr. Badger; October 6, "God and Cyclones," Rev. Mr. Wicks; October 13, "Why Common People heard Jesus gladly," Rev. Mr. Badger.

ROSLINDALE, MASS.—The Unitarian church was the scene of an unusually interesting ceremony on Wednesday evening, when Richard Wilson Boynton and his wife, Harriet Barton Boynton, recent graduates of the Meadville Theological School of Meadville, Pa., were ordained and installed as ministers of the Unitarian society of Roslindale. The ceremonies of a husband and wife being ordained and installed as teachers of the gospel in connection with the same society were sufficiently novel to attract an audience which filled the little church on South Street. The flower committee had transformed the interior of the edifice by the use of beautiful plants and blooms in great variety. The service opened with an organ voluntary and the singing of "How Lovely are the Messengers!" from Mendelssohn's "Saint Paul," by a quartette. Invocation was offered by Rev. Alfred R. Hussey of West Roxbury, and readings from the Scriptures by Rev. William H. Savary, Green Harbor, Mass. The sermon was delivered by Rev. Edward A. Horton of Boston, from the text, "Able ministers, not of the letter, but of the spirit." Rev. Abraham W. Jackson of Concord, Mass., made the prayer of ordination, the quartette responding. Mr. Solomon B. Stebbins, a member of the society since its organization, made a brief address of welcome; and the charge to the ministers was given by Prof. George R. Freeman, Meadville, Pa. Rev. Christopher R. Eliot of Boston, a close friend of Mr. Boynton, extended the right hand of fellowship. Rev. Joel H. Metcalf of Burlington, Vt., a former pastor of this society, gave the charge to the people, the closing prayer being offered by Rev. William L. Walsh of Brookfield, Mass. The exercises closed with the benediction by the pastor.

SHELBYVILLE, ILL.—The Daily Union gives an account of an interesting service which was held at the Unitarian church of which Rev. J. L. Douthit is pastor, September 1: "The Unitarian church was well filled last evening, many from the country being present. At the close of the sermon, and during the singing of that beautiful hymn written by the Catholic Father Tabor,—

"There's a wideness in God's mercy
Like the wideness of the sea,"—

Col. John Sobieski came forward, and gave his hand as a token of his desire to become a member of the congregation. The pastor took his confession as follows: "My brother, is it your solemn purpose to live a Christian life, taking Jesus as your teacher in morals and religion, that you may get good, be good, and do all the good you can by the grace of God?" The answer came, "That is my purpose." "Now," said the pastor, "all present who will clasp our brother's hand on this simple confession are invited to do so while we sing 'God be with you till we meet again.'" Nearly every one present, including those of other congregations, came forward, and gave Col. Sobieski the hand of fellowship during the singing. Then Brother Douthit spoke of how, as a boy at school, he was thrilled with the story of Poland's struggle for liberty, and how, later in life, he had been interested in the story of the Polish brethren who were a body of heroic Unitarian noblemen three hundred years ago. He expressed his joy and gratitude that God had sent a man to-day of the truly royal line of Poland's patriots and benefactors to be a communicant of this congregation and help them in their Christian endeavors. By request, Col. Sobieski would now make such remarks as the spirit moved him.

"I was born and brought up," said the colonel, "in the Roman Catholic Church, and held to that faith till Pope Pius IX. excommunicated King Victor Emanuel of Italy. I was in such strong sympathy with Victor Emanuel in his effort to free Italy that I concluded I would rather go to hades with him than to go to heaven with the pope. So I left that communion, but with no unkind feeling toward the old Mother Church or any member of it. I knew then and know to-day a great many of the most saintly men and women who are connected with the Romish Church. Indeed, I can never hope to be half as good a Christian as my own dear mother was, who lived and died a member of that Church. Latterly I united with the Episcopal Church; but I found, as I became more acquainted with many peoples, and began to investigate these things, that I was not at all in harmony with the special tenets of that Church, and so, for honesty's sake, I withdrew from it a few months ago. The more I thought about it, the more I wanted to belong to a body of communicants that would allow me independence of thought and full liberty of opinion as a disciple of the Great Master. I wanted also to be identified with a body of Christian believers that recognizes the equal rights and privileges of all men and women of all races and colors. I wanted a church that would allow our wives and mothers and sisters an equal voice and vote in the government of the Church and the State. I found to my joy that this congregation was established on just such a broad basis of Christian freedom, brotherhood, and unity. And, in joining this congregation, I am glad to feel that I have not really separated from any of the good people of the congregations whose creeds I cannot indorse, but have rather united with the larger brotherhood of all humanity. I ask your prayers, brothers and sisters, that I may be and do something worthy of this, I esteem, great privilege."

TOLEDO, OHIO.—Rev. A. G. Jennings, pastor of the Church of Our Father, announces the subjects of his sermons through September as follows: September 1, "Beginnings"; September 8, "The Man who waits"; September 15, "Another Consideration of Life after Death"; September 22, "Restlessness"; September 29, "A Jealous God."

WISCONSIN CONFERENCE.—The annual meeting of the Wisconsin Conference of Unitarian and Independent Societies will be held October 1-3 at Madison.

Business Notices.

If you value your eyesight, and wish to preserve it as long as possible, avoid reading or sewing by gas or electric light, and use only the Miller Lamp.

An Interesting Custom.—It is peculiarly interesting to note the sentiment which has always attached to one piece of furniture in every household,—namely, the dining-room table. There are many families who would economize in any direction who, nevertheless, would be unwilling to put up with a poorly made or cheaply finished table. Speaking of tables, there is shown in another column of this paper a pattern of dining-table which is sure to be admired. It costs $45 at the Paine warerooms on Canal Street, but it has all the appearance of a $100 pattern.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder
Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Deaths.

In Topsham, Me., 6th inst., Woodbury B. Purlinton, in his eighty-first year.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE

OF

Unitarian and Other Christian Churches

AT WASHINGTON, D.C.,

October 21, 22, 23, and 24.

Messrs. RAYMOND & WHITCOMB have arranged for the accommodation of delegates and others who may wish to attend the National Conference an Attractive Series of Excursions at Very Low Rates.

Parties will leave BOSTON Friday, October 18, and Monday, October 21, under special escort. A choice of routes by boat and rail.

Additional Excursions to

GETTYSBURG, OLD POINT COMFORT, Etc.

Send for special circular.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,

296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

Unitarian Excursion

—TO—

WASHINGTON, D.C.

A party will leave Boston on Friday, October 18, returning Friday, October 25, using Hotel Vendome on Penn. Ave.

Drive of three hours through residential part of the city and to Arlington Heights.

Trip to Mt. Vernon.

Guide at service of the party at all times. J. HOWARD NASON, who accompanies this party, has been very successful in managing Washington Excursions, and is always at the service of the party.

Price of tickets $30.00, including all expenses. For full information apply to

NASON & DURGIN, 228 Washington Street.

We refer by permission to Rev. GEORGE BATCHELOR, Chairman of the Council.

Rooms To Let.

Single or in suite, with bath. House occupied by owner. Apply at 36 RUTLAND SQUARE.

JAMES KAY APPLEBEE

is open to engagements for PREACHING or LECTURING. Address: ALLSTON, MASS.

For the Christian Register.

SONS OF SCIENCE.

BY REV. EDWARD F. HAYWARD.

Mighty blows the men are dealing,
In that new world far away;
Forest hewers, skies unsealing,
As their axes glint and play.
They are dull with righteous blindness
To the beauties of the wood,
And no milk of human kindness
Stays their hand of hardihood.

Men unhonored, howe'er strong then,
Toiled they at their cruel task;
Comes a later time along, then
Glory more than they could ask.
Smiling valleys, cities teeming
With gay life, their work attest;
O'er their names a nation, dreaming,
Rises up to call them blest.

Sons of science thus degrading
Tall tradition to the ground,
How the light pours in, pervading
Truth's dominion newly found!
God was lost within the fastness,
Old time growths of darkening thought:
Now he looms with nearer vastness
From the ruin you have wrought.

Other hands shall build the city
Where the temple spires shine forth;
But 'twas you who without pity
Toiled to clear the cumbered earth.
Spare not, nor with hand unsteady
Error's ancient work undo,
Till at last a world grown ready
Finds a saintship e'en for you.

The Pulpit.

A CROWN OF LIFE.

BY REV. CHARLES E. ST. JOHN.

"Fear none of these things which thou shalt suffer. . . . Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."—REV. II. 10.

The finest heroism is that of ordinary life. Steadfastness in hard times is a far nobler manifestation of moral strength than the most dashing valor which souls display under the joyous impulse of great success. For instance, the greatness of Gen. Washington is shown by the magnificent hopefulness and steadiness with which he held his poor little army together through long months of retreat and suffering far more than by his consummate ability in the guidance of actual battle. Yet it is chiefly for conspicuous victories, shining deeds of valor, that popular praise is given; and our average idea of a just reward for human achievement is that of immediate honors, public praise, and gain in wealth. Many persons after they have done well in an enterprise think they have received no reward unless they have obtained fame or riches. Yet comparatively few do receive such rewards as these, and we hear a continual outcry that justice does not rule between God and man. It is asserted by those who thus criticize the order of the universe that the starving poet, Chatterton, stands in the sad annals of history as an unanswerable accusation against the divine justice. It would be easy to give a long list of scholars, poets, novelists, high-minded reformers, self-sacrificing toilers for pure ideals in society, who have gained none of the rewards that are commonly desired. Their fame has only come after they have long passed away, and can no longer care for it; and they have suffered in a lifelong battle against actual privation. Is it just that a Palissy should be reduced to the verge of starvation while slowly developing his marvellous skill as an inventor in the manufacture of glazed pottery, and should die without a worldly reward for his final success? Is it just that the world's multitude of sufferers includes not merely the idle, inefficient, and vicious, but in large numbers those whose troubles are not from their own fault, those to whom poverty clings in spite of their devoted labors, and those who are kept down by constant illness or other unavoidable weakness? Out of the sorrows of earth the bitter sufferings, the centuries of labor, that hardly win bread and shelter, there rises, like a baleful mist between man and God, the vast, fierce doubt of God's justice. Why has God denied to all the multitudes of the unfortunate all adequate reward to their efforts?

The sufficient answer to these doubting questions is the pointing out of the fact that those who ask them have set up a wrong standard of rewards, and so have overlooked the most important things God is doing in human souls. Who told you, my doubting friend, that the only just reward for writing a noble book is immediate fame, or that wealth ought always to be showered upon the most diligent workers? I do not see any necessary connection between such deeds and those specific rewards; but I do see a necessity that the good Creator of our souls shall give to each mortal the just fulfillment of every earnest endeavor. Therefore, when I meet a case in which injustice seems to beat upon a human soul, I am constrained to believe in God's justice rather than in my present judgment. I am clearly not in possession of all the facts, and must study the life before me more deeply, and also revise my theory of what constitute just rewards before I come to a conclusion. My knowledge of God convinces me that just rewards are invariably given; and, if I cannot understand them, there shows my need of deeper thought.

In trying to understand the justice of God, we must discard the imperfect conception that goodness ought always to win prizes of money and prosperity. God is not a magnified committee of award, who examines the records of earth, and metes out to men as rewards for good conduct the things they most desire to possess. Abundant resources, delightful pleasures, gratifying honors, enrich some lives and fail to reach others by causes that are not intended, in my belief, to make of them arbitrary rewards. They fall to the share of evil men and good alike, and are missed by myriads of the most virtuous persons. Divine rewards must therefore be a different sort of thing; and, inasmuch as God can do no wrong, we ought to be able to discover his marks of approval in every life we know to be a noble one. This search inevitably becomes a religious one. Our trust in God is our chief guide; and by this we are led to see, as Jesus and his group of teachers did, that the deepening of life itself is the divine reward to all excellent deeds or hopes. In various places in the New Testament it is more or less distinctly taught that the first outcome of a good life is simply more life. It seems to me that Jesus gave the noblest utterance to his mission when he said, "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." He was not speaking of a salvation after death, but of life then and there. The author of the book of Revelation makes his crown of life that is to be given to the faithful a matter to come after death. They who are faithful unto death shall receive only a larger, richer life. But the thought of Jesus is a broader one even than that. They who are faithful, pure in heart, noble, do receive at once more abundant life; and life is but one thing before or after death.

This, I think, brings us to a knowledge of the perfect justice of God in extending rewards. Life is the great gift of God to man; and every helpful influence from God, every sacred teacher, every event of life rightly used, serves to enlarge, to broaden or deepen our life. The one continuous reward of right conduct is the blessed advance of character or life which such conduct brings. There is something which no evil heart can enjoy, but which no righteous soul ever for an instant fails to receive as the immediate reward of his good qualities. That gracious reward is life with its uncounted possibilities, to be your deepest joy at the present time and your eternal field for high surprise. The ancient Greeks gave a crown of wild olive to the victors in their athletic or poetic contests, and the modern world gives crowns of wealth and conspicuous leadership to those who win in its competitions. But there is a lovelier crown than these. The many souls that seem to lose in their competitions with others are in reality gaining much of permanent value while they strive with noble aims. To all who work thus, whether they seem to win or not, there is given life as a crown. Be faithful unto death; and you receive that crown,—simply life. It is not that you are given a triumphal entry into some heavenly city, whose golden streets are lined with crowds of cheering angels, who praise you as you march in behind a herald who proclaims your valiant deed. There has been too much of this worldliness in human expectations of heaven. You simply enter into life with a freedom of spirit and a purity of feeling which reveal to you anew and more clearly than you ever saw it before that the purest joy, the greatest victory of life, is just the living of it. The hero makes his greatest sacrifice at the place of perilous duty, loses all his joys and treasures because honor bids him die, only to awake and find that life is still his, but brighter, dearer, than ever, because now ennobled by his faithful heroism. Once a mere existence full of mingled joy and sorrow, life has now been by his own act transformed into a crown, a reward sufficient for all goodness. It may well be that heaven is simply the discovery by an immortal soul of the divine joy it is to be alive. If so, then, surely, life can be transformed into a crown, a measureless joy, at any moment by any sterling act of worthiness in the midst of the trials that make goodness difficult. To be faithful unto death is required but once of any man; but to be faithful up to the full requirement of every situation is demanded of us all at every moment, so that we can at any instant discover the real sublimity of this life of ours. As the immensity of space waits for our growing science to penetrate its distant mysteries, so the immensity of life's beauty and delight waits all around us and within us for us to arouse our half-exerted faculties and understand it. Our life is an incessant growth when we are doing our best with it; and the most delightful, most satisfying truths about this growth of ours is that the blossom of it, the beautiful result of our endeavors, our tribulations, and our hopes, is not any mere reward of a day, any praise or gift which might dazzle a child, but more life, a crown of life. That is a blossom so rare in its loveliness that to appreciate it is to possess it; and to possess it, to know that life is the soul's highest blessing, is to understand God's dealings with man in most noble faith. I trust God in perceiving that the only direct reward he ever gives, the crown of life, is the sweetest, highest possible outcome of any excellence of conduct.

Many are slow in attaining this grand confidence in life; and I suppose that nearly all of my hearers have sometimes a despondent mood, when they doubt if life is such a desirable thing, after all. But these are not your wisest moods, and very few yield to them permanently. Despair about your own life will keep God at arm's length from you almost as surely as sin will. To feel God's reality deeply and gladly, you must first know yourself; for 'tis in your own life that you must chiefly search for grounds of faith in God. It is a fact, I think, that, although there is a good deal of youthful pessimistic talk, and bitter words are often heard, discontent with life does not sink very deep into any soul. There are very few who actually and completely tire of life. Multitudes chafe against their limitations, and complain of their hardships, and seem to feel that their desired happiness is far away from them; but 'tis the trials, not life itself, which they denounce. Life is clung to passionately and selfishly by the ignorant, trustfully and bravely by those who feel its eternal nature. They who believe most strongly that life is everlasting are learning more and more to find in the present time all the blessed things they feel the future heaven will maintain.

The wiser we grow, therefore, and the better we become, the more surely do we understand the holy joy of being alive, inasmuch as life even now brings to all the faithful the true reward for all their efforts.

Life may seem nothing rare to one who idly, selfishly, squanders its precious hours; but to every diligent man life is a treasure beyond estimation, and such natures find in the opportunities of each new day the ample reward for faithfulness in the day before. The true scholar's reward does not lie in the fame he may or may not receive for his book, nor in the financial returns it secures. His joy is in the doing of the work itself, in the eager search for truth, in the knowledge he is acquiring, in the actual labor of his literary art. The artist Turner cared so little for public praise and for the selling of his famous works that when he died there were in his possession hundreds of his paintings, which by a little worldly wisdom he might have turned into gold. His joy was in the art itself, in the painting of pictures; that is, in life rather than in common rewards. Life was his crown, as is that of every worker who honors his occupation. Activity calls for more and larger activity to be its sweet reward. "When I have achieved something," prays every great soul, "mock me with no crowns of laurel or gold. Grant me a crown of life, something more to achieve, time and courage for mightier deeds."

The divineness of this crown of life is made evident by its universality. Every good deed, every pure thought, broadens into finer life. If any man of an earnest mind understands what earnestness is worth, he has already the one divine reward of earnestness, and need not care to be popularly known as an example of zeal.

See life in this light, my friend, and, so far as you are concerned, the sting is taken away from all your failures and difficulties. The deepening, broadening, enriching, of your nature, is your reward for your faithfulness through your long years of toil, hardship, loss, and grief. The merry child may be the happiest of mortals in a sense, but he has yet to earn the greatest blessings of life. He has only made a beginning in life itself. Not till he has faced the sternest discipline of toil and disappointment will he be capable of knowing what good things life bestows upon them that are faithful. Therefore, I say to every young and untried soul, "Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer"; for not even God can bestow real life upon you until you have laid foundations for it by loyal struggles under hard conditions." We know that restricted resources call out a man's own mental resources, and that a Robinson Crusoe with only a jack-knife to depend upon accomplishes more with it than another can with a whole kit of tools. We know that the gravest anxieties of business or private life give rise to our firmest courage, our grandest moral strength. We know how the trials and bitter, searching things of life take hold of careless youths and silly girls, and change their mood from vanity to beauty and strength, as the flames that burn out the iron's impurities and give forth the royal steel. In all such moral developments we see the gift of larger life coming to those that have earned it by desert; and, what is of most immediate interest to us, we see it coming without weary delay while yet the fierce struggle goes on.

The most significant thing in the matter is that the crown of life—that is, life in its aspect of moral success and self-reliance—does not come to any one class of men more than to others. It comes in the very midst of anxiety, poverty, and physical weakness; and it blossoms forth also in souls that have easier careers. The only places where it does not appear are the wastes of vice and selfishness. No wicked person can know the depths of life until he changes his course, and begins by moral struggle to develop his soul. To all such it was truly said, "Except ye turn, and become as little children,—that is, pure in heart, sincere, truthful,—ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven." But so merciful is our God, so gracious his work upon us, that the instant any soul does turn, does feel a noble aim, and begin to obey its guidance, that instant life takes on a new and lovelier aspect. Our life gains in value and interest as fast as we press on with our moral growth. The miserly think to grasp the good things of life. The selfish and the crafty dream of making the most of life by fraud and injustice. 'Tis a horrible delusion, a living death. Life throbs only in goodness. It grows rich as the soul grows excellent. In no other way than by long-continued, valiant moral endeavor can any soul gain heaven here or hereafter.

Would you know what life is? Probe its very depths, and be able to distinguish good from evil? Then do not tamper with vice or study men's evil deeds. There is nothing of life there. Go right onward in the boundless patience of necessary toil, in the sterling honor of doing everything as well as you can, in the high-spirited faith-

Solved!—The Sunday Evening Problem.

A new plan has been introduced for the Sunday evening service, and it is successful. Wherever used, churches are crowded, the people delighted and instructed in Divine truth; spiritual results are secured and finances helped.

Write for pamphlet, "Solved; or, The Sunday Evening Problem." Read its hints, and the actual experience of pastors who have tried the new plan. It is mailed for the asking. Illustrated catalogue 20 cents.

RILEY BROTHERS,

Branches: 16 Beekman St., New York.
BOSTON: 244 Washington St. CHICAGO: 196 La Salle St.
KANSAS CITY (Mo.): 515 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS: 1504
Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA: 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO: 430 Kearney St.

fulness that honors little duties as much as conspicuous ones, and you shall know life in all its depth and length and breadth and beauty.

The crown of life which settles upon us as we hold ourselves faithfully in the front rank of duty is in the first place intelligence, perception, understanding. It is the power of knowing; and with it come the fine joys of mental growth as the mind grapples with deep problems, and watches the facts which the great laws of God marshal around each observant mind. This gift of thought is a marvellous thing; for it makes man the master over everything he studies, and fills every moment with intense interest. If you can think connectedly, soberly, hopefully, your life is free from nine-tenths of the self-inflicted sorrows that afflict mankind. "Knowledge always grows from more to more," making you better able to cope with the difficulties of your occupation and the mysteries of human thought. Again, life is a crown in bringing to us refined feelings, the power to appreciate noble motives, to read the better traits that lie beneath some men's roughness, and to honor gladly delicate emotions which rude and untrained souls do not comprehend. Life has grown very rich to you, if you are deeply sensitive about giving pain to others and quick to see and answer every appeal to your sympathy. You gain a purity that dares to look all evil in the face, to lend a hand to any one who seeks your assistance in the battle against it, and yet serves to make you shrink from doing evil as from utter dishonor.

Best of all, life brings you the mighty traits of character that fit you to do the work of the world in noble fashion. As life deepens in you, you gain hope that sustains you through all delays and dangers, love that teaches you how to treat your fellow-men in helpful spirit, faith that makes God a reality to you more precious than all other truth. Thus, when human souls are on the upward march, that movement is invariably one of winning dearer treasures of the life with God. Upon all the faithful life bestows—that is to say, God, who made life the thing it is, bestows—the ever-increasing power to think, the deepening refinement of feeling, and the broadening ability to act with righteous efficiency in all the affairs of earth and heaven.

And yet there are careless observers who ask if God does not unjustly neglect to reward virtue!

"I say to thee, do thou repeat
To the first man thou mayest meet

"That he and we and all men move
Under a canopy of love
As broad as the blue sky above;

"That doubt and trouble, fear and pain
And anguish, all are shadows vain,
That death itself shall not remain;

"That weary deserts we may tread,
A dreary labyrinth may thread,
Through dark ways underground be led;

"Yet, if we will one Guide obey,
The dreariest path, the darkest way,
Shall issue out in heavenly day."

Sermon Gleanings.

THE MASTERY OF LIFE.

BY REV. CHARLES J. STAPLES.

German handicraftsmen in the last century were accustomed to divide their lives into the three periods of the "learning years," the "wandering years," and the "master years." We have here a rough division of the process of the soul's education. Each of us must pass in succession through each of these stages. Each furnishes a necessary element in that which is the goal and crown of human existence,—the mastery of life.

Learning is not the accumulation of facts most of which will be forgotten and a very few remembered in after years. Its valuable product is a certain acquaintance with the experience of humanity in the past. The difference between the educated and the uneducated is a familiarity with what has been already said and done by human-kind. To have this knowledge is to stand on a vantage-ground in dealing with life. It is a noble heritage. It makes a man the larger and the richer spiritually his life long. Learning puts a man into possession of the large outline of life. Just as the child imitates the great rich words of his mother tongue, and makes them his instruments without fully realizing their power and meaning, so instruction furnishes us only the symbols of what we may be.

The second element in the divine education is contact and personal touch with present realities. This is a valuable result of travel, but it does not need wide travel in order to attain it. God plants a natural impulse in the heart of youth to move out from the smaller and fixed horizon of childhood into the wider. Youth is the period of the wandering years in mind and spirit. It is the time of personal test and trial, when the boy and the girl seek to prove all things. We must have patience with this, and take it as the leading of God. Fain would the parent and teacher keep youth as it leaves the school in the old ways, but it is impossible. They can no longer hide their pupils from the training that comes by experience. Every human soul must come into possession of itself, and this it must do by going out and away from its early shelter. Trust them to God, keeping the welcome of the home and school for their returning feet when buffeted and weary.

The third element, the stage of mastery, comes by exercise of one's own will. We learn and are learning all along, by trying to manage the things of life. Even the child plays with his sticks and straws, shaping them into the forms that suit his purpose. Life is empty unless we have some purpose in it, some desire of mastery over men and things. This is the stature of the full-grown man. We need not interpret this mastery in any narrow sense. By the attempt to realize his vision of what can be done, man shows what power of mastery he has won through instruction and experience. If he cannot, through timidity or nervousness, rise to the rule of some little corner of God's world, he is but half a man. In the effort to create that on this earth which has not been before, he takes his ordained position as a son of God.

Finally, there is a mastery of the earth which is not a ministry of God. The strong arm, unconsecrated to the service of the highest, works only a narrow selfishness. So instruction and experience, untouched by any sense of our accountability to the Father, wreak in the end only wider desolations. In going about the Father's business the human animal becomes a son or daughter of God. The man of Nazareth knew not the learning of the schools. His wandering years were spent in an obscure corner of the earth. But what a master of life he was! This is the calling of God to all souls everywhere. They can and must do his work. They must tame the wilderness, bring light into darkness, order into chaos, and wholesomeness into all foul places of earth.

CHRISTIAN SOCIOLOGY.

There is but one way to the apprehension of the teachings of Jesus, whether religious or social; and that is the patient study of the Gospels with the aid of all modern and critical and exegetical methods. The only thoroughly safe method is the inductive gathering of teachings from the gospel sources, and their subsequent classification into a system. Here, as in all scientific processes, the aim of the investigator must be the discovery of what is, not the substantiation of some notion as to what ought to be. It is even unsafe, as a first step, to gather only such passages as may serve as the basis of a particular doctrine. The first question is not what sociology did Jesus teach, but whether he taught anything that may properly be called sociological. Classification must logically, and generally chronologically, succeed discovery and interpretation. Let all the materials for a social teaching first be gathered. Then, whether they be few or many, let them be shaped into a system.

Such a method is not peculiar to the study of the New Testament. It is that by which one may gain the system of any writer who has himself not arranged his thoughts in a logical system. To such a method the words of Jesus are as the words of Plato. The greatest reverence that may be shown them is to treat them as if they needed no exegetical odds, but were both intelligible and capable of enduring rigid scrutiny.

But in such a method the words of Christ have more than an archaeological or devotional import. No man's teaching has equalled his in the magnitude of its social results, and there are messages in his words yet to be heard. The sociologist who disregards the teachings of Christ is as unscientific as he who in the history of philosophy should neglect Plato and Kant, or in the history of the United States of America should disregard the Constitution. But quotation is not exegesis, and rhetoric is not classification. If Jesus is to figure among sociologists, before he is cited as an authority let him at least be understood; and, if he is to be debarred from the class of social teachers, let it first be remembered that much which is put forth as his is no more from him than the schoolman's gloss was from Aristotle.

The sources from which it is possible to draw the social teachings of Jesus are primarily, though not exclusively, his own words. At first glance, therefore, no problem could seem easier than the process of gaining such teachings. With most theologians of the past, with many of to-day, the ipsissima verba of the Master are an end of all discussion; but, even if we disregard the possible changes incident to one or more processes of translation, it is a prime necessity that the interpreter remember that thought is superior to word, and that a sentence wrenched from its context may be quite as misleading as a similarly detached word. The thought of Jesus is sometimes so genuinely Oriental as to elude any process of interpretation that is purely verbal. His style is so concrete and his similes so perfect that there is a constant temptation to forget that a parable, after all, can teach only an analogy, and that the real teaching of its author lies not in its form, but in the analogy. Further than this Jesus seldom combined complementary or mutually modifying thoughts. He was not a systematic lecturer, but a creator of impulses. He sometimes puts forth a proposition so categorically as to make it appear that it exhausts his teachings upon the subject, and yet under some other circumstances its modification is expressed with equal absoluteness. The two superficially appear contradictory. In reality, they are the two hemispheres of the truth. To claim either of them alone as his teaching is to do Jesus injustice. His real teaching can be gained only through their combination. For this reason, so far as a systematized and complete statement is concerned, outside of the magnificent summaries into which Jesus has compressed the essentials of religion and morals, no one can claim to have mastered Christian teaching until he has mastered its entirety. The failure to observe this simple caution lies at the bottom of much of the heresy and sectarianism of the centuries and of no little crude religious teaching to-day.

It is, therefore, above all, necessary to study the words of Jesus, not only as detached maxims, but as the scattered parts of a complete system.

At this point one naturally meets the question, Are the teachings of Jesus commensurate with the teachings of the entire New Testament? In a certain sense it is perhaps true that Christian doctrine is thus commensurate. Waiving in this discussion the question of the inspiration of the apostolic writers, it is yet reasonable to hold that in the teachings that emanated from the companions of Jesus we have that which must be regarded as expressive of the spirit and purpose of Christ. Nevertheless, it would be contrary, not only to the most ordinary processes of historical study, but also to the testimony of Christian consciousness, to make no distinction between the social teachings of the Gospels and those of the Epistles. In the latter we have the application of the former to the needs of the growing Christian societies of the first century. In some cases these applications are clearly adapted only to the peculiar circumstances of those early years. At all events, it is very apparent that in the passage from the social teachings of the four Gospels to those of the other New Testament writings we are passing from a constitution to statutory law, from principle to attempted realization of principle, from philosophy to conduct. For this reason, following the historical method of the recent science of Biblical theology, it is better to confine the search for the data of Christian sociology, as it is defined above, to the gospel narrative and its brief continuation in the opening section of the Acts.

Yet even here the circle whence these data are to come must be slightly restricted. Wholly apart from the question as to the origin and mutual relations of the four Gospels, it is beyond dispute that in their present form the accounts they contain are the work of writers who lived in at least the second generation after the death of Jesus. The component parts of each Gospel may be shown to date from the contemporaries of Jesus, and it is possible that at least three of the accounts were brought into their present literary form by these contemporaries themselves. Yet, however this may be, the Gospels now clearly contain two elements,—the teachings of Jesus and the editorial material added to them by their writers.

This second element is considerable in the Fourth Gospel, but by no means wanting in the Synoptics. It is of various sorts, but may be mostly classified as introductions, transpositions, explanations, reflections, prophetic antitypes, and verbal changes. Many of these are self-evident to the careful reader, and most are easily separated from the teachings of Jesus by simple processes of criticism. Their value is considerable, however, for the understanding of Jesus' own positions, upon which they form a sort of commentary or scholium. In few cases will their separation affect the force of the passage from which they are taken, but it is evident that such a separation might at times be of service in appreciating the teaching of Jesus himself.

One form of editorial work not specified above is, however, of the utmost value as a source of the social teachings of Jesus,—the narrative of his life. In most cases such narrative is demonstrably from eye-witnesses, and in its essential elements is beyond suspicion. From such narrative data may be drawn of equal importance with those contained in the words of Jesus. His example and life, quite as much as his spoken teachings, have universally been accepted as a basis for Christian doctrine; but nowhere are they of more importance than in the sphere of his sociology. No student of the life of Jesus would venture to predicate inconsistency between his outward act and his inward belief. It is impossible to think of him simply as an honest man, practising that which he would forbid his followers. In certain cases, it is true, he did accommodate himself to circumstances and demands that he regarded as Stability and Beauty.

If you can reach up to an expenditure of $45 for a Dining Table, here is a pattern that will, in Oriental language, "make the heart fat and the eye glad."

A superb top of the richest quartered oak, 54 by 48 inches in size; five massive pedestal legs, each 8 inches in diameter, with fluted and carved acanthus decoration; steel-bearing concealed castors; and last, but not least, a design which places this among the most beautiful tables ever constructed.

Remember that a good Dining Table lasts easily for half a century, and becomes every day more precious because of the daily gatherings and conversations which it has witnessed.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

peculiar and even unjust, but seldom without specific explanation or comment. Speaking generally, the doings of Jesus, when once viewed in the light of their attending circumstances, quite as much as his words, are materials from which to construct a systematized statement of his social teachings.

There is another source of such teaching, which, though negative, is not to be disregarded,—the silence of Jesus on many points upon which the age in which he lived was interested quite as much as is our own. For example, such social evils as slavery, gambling, prostitution, are unsailed in the gospel narrative. So far as many deeper social and political questions are concerned, Jesus was also silent. This fact is not only remarkable. It is significant of a distinct element in what we venture to call his social philosophy. Just what this element was does not concern us here. It is enough to call attention to the fact, and to suggest that a vocalization of this silence, be it with never so eloquent a philosophy or never so ingenious play upon words and texts, is to make exposition presuppose, if not dangerously resemble, imposition.

If one adopts the conventional division of the study of sociology, descriptive, static, and dynamic, it at once becomes evident that little that can be termed descriptive sociology is to be found within the Gospels. Jesus was not a student of society in the technical use of the term. His interest in publicans and sinners was not simply scientific. His work was not that of the investigator, but of the revealer and inspirer. It is impossible to think of him as laboriously gathering material for a treatise upon social phenomena, a measurer of foreheads, and a compiler of statistics. Not only was the age in which he lived innocent of any such scientific processes, but the whole career of Jesus makes it evident that, while no man, not even Socrates, ever possessed a keener perception of human nature alike in its strength and weakness, his main effort was the presentation of ideals and the gift of spiritual powers through which they might be attained. For this reason any systematized presentation of his teachings must content itself with a very incomplete and incidental presentation of his views of humanity as it is, and devote itself almost exclusively to his conceptions of what society may become, and the means and process through which its desired consummation may be reached.

In the present series of papers a pioneering attempt will be made to set forth (1) the Christian ideal of man, society, the family, the state, social life (in the narrower sense), wealth, the church, and (2) the dynamics of progress; that is, the forces, the means, and the process that make these ideals realizable.—Shailer Mathews, in the American Journal of Sociology.

A TALE OF ROTHSCHILD.

Dining on one occasion with Baron James de Rothschild, Eugene Delacroix, the famous French painter, confessed that for some time past he had vainly sought a head to serve as a model for that of a beggar in a painting on which he was then engaged, and that, as he gazed at his host's features, the idea suddenly struck him that the very head he desired was before him. Rothschild, being a great admirer of art, readily consented to sit for him as a beggar. The next day at the studio Delacroix placed a tunic round his shoulders, put a stout staff in his hand, and made him pose as if he were resting on the steps of an ancient Roman temple. In this attitude he was discovered by one of the artist's favorite pupils, who, struck by the surpassing excellence of the model, congratulated his master on having at last found exactly what he wanted. Naturally concluding the model had only just been brought in from some church porch, he seized an opportunity, when his master's eyes were turned, to slip a piece of money into the beggar's hand. Baron Rothschild thanked him with a look, and kept the money. The pupil soon quitted the studio. In answer to inquiries made, Delacroix told the baron that this young man possessed talent, but no means. Shortly afterward the young fellow received a letter stating that charity bears interest, and that the accumulated interest on the amount he had so generously given to one whom he supposed to be a beggar was represented by the sum of ten thousand francs which was lying at his disposal at the Rothschild offices.—American Hebrew.

Literature.

"OUTLINES OF SOCIAL THEOLOGY."*

Dr. Hyde has written a very interesting and amusing book. It is, moreover, extremely significant. It has much of the real orthodox strut, and yet it develops a system of theology which is as different from the traditional Orthodoxy as a hawk from a hand-saw. Here are things said of the Bible, of Jesus, of miracles, which in many orthodox circles will to-day receive a cordial welcome, but which a few years ago would have been scouted as the rankest heresy. When the first gun of the amalgamated societies of Christian Endeavor is fired by Mr. Moody, and he assures the faithful that the Bible is all of a piece, and that, if they accept any part, they must accept every other, the fish story about Jonah included,—for "God could make a fish that would swallow the whole world,"—it is evident that the old Orthodoxy will not abdicate to-morrow nor the next day after that; but that the Orthodoxy of a near future will be much more like the attenuated thing of Dr. Hyde's imagination than like the frozen rock of Calvin's Institutes there are many reasons for believing. In the mean time it is highly important for the working of this business that the appearance of Orthodoxy should be well kept up. Dr. Hyde's artifice for doing this is to disapprove the Unitarians because they have not a sufficiently definite body of religious truth. Yet there is hardly an item of his own doctrine which, stripped of its verbiage, and stated in language deliberately resolved to be not elusive, but expressive, the Unitarians would not accept; and it does not seem impossible that Unitarians may yet find themselves visited with the severe displeasure of a new Orthodoxy for no greater fault, if fault it be, than that of declining to state in an inarticulate and bewildering jargon truths which it has expressed for half a century in the most simple and straightforward speech at its command.

Dr. Hyde's exposition is strongly tinged with Hegelian metaphysic; and that, no doubt, is one reason why he so revels in putting new wine into old bottles. Hegel was the first-born of many brethren who have rejoiced with a peculiar joy in this kind of transubstantiation. Dr. Hyde's book is in three parts; and the first part, "Theological," is in three chapters, one of which develops a doctrine of the Father, a second a doctrine of the Son, and the third a doctrine of the Holy Spirit. There is first-rate thinking in these chapters. Each doctrine is a good doctrine in its turn; but, ghosts of Athanasius and Augustine and Calvin and Edwards, what would your living counterparts have said of these surprising transformations?

Incidentally, the second chapter contains a valid criticism upon Kidd's doctrine of ultra-rational religion. "If the appetites are the man and intelligence is his adjunct and instrument, then, indeed, the antagonism between such an individual and society is, as Mr. Kidd tells us, hopeless and irreconcilable; and the only hope of getting social conduct out of him is some 'ultra-rational sanction,' which shall startle him into a wholesome fear of penalties or shock him into a prudent concern for his fate in the hereafter." But, continues Dr. Hyde, "such an abstract individual, such an animal in human form, nowhere exists. It is a fiction of the imagination to which no real being corresponds. Unus homo, nullus homo. One man alone is no man at all. . . . Reason is not, as Mr. Kidd represents it, the most profoundly individualistic, anti-social, anti-evolutionary, and disintegrating of all human qualities. Reason is the common bond that binds humanity together." The whole passage is admirable and effective, and we should like to quote it unabridged. It embodies the Hegelian criticism of Kidd's preposterous "ultra-rational religion," than which criticism nothing better has appeared or can; and it is quite enough.

*OUTLINES OF SOCIAL THEOLOGY. By William De Witt Hyde, D.D., President of Bowdoin College. New York: Macmillan & Co.

The chapter containing this criticism develops Dr. Hyde's doctrine of the second person of the Trinity: "Sonship consists in the perception of the Divine Ideal in every concrete situation and the striving to realize that ideal even in the most unideal conditions." Having developed what he calls "the a priori conception of what the Son of God should be," Dr. Hyde proceeds to assure us that "this a priori conception and the gospel account of Jesus of Nazareth exactly coincide." But in sorry truth his "a priori conception" is not a priori. It is shaped on the New Testament account of Jesus to just the extent that it is found to agree with that conception. Like Omar Khayyám, he "comes out at the same door wherein he went." All that he writes in this connection is loose, uncritical, and so shamefully lacking in intellectual seriousness as to be thoroughly immoral. For example, "Jesus was tested at all the vital points. The lust of the flesh, the fascination of power, the pride of life, all presented themselves to his youthful ambition." This is a free paraphrase of the story of the temptation; but, even if that story were known to be a clear reflection of the spiritual experience of Jesus, what would such an experience of imaginary temptation amount to in comparison with the storm and stress to which hundreds and thousands of men and women are subjected every day?

The looseness of Dr. Hyde's thinking is so pervasive that particular examples fail to show how gross it is; but one other may be given: "By virtue of his perfect obedience Christ is God in humanity." He then goes on to speak of Unitarians as rejecting "the divinity of Christ," as if they, as such, rejected such divinity as is implied in his "perfect obedience." But Channing and all the Unitarians of his generation, and of the next for the most part, believed in such divinity, which is no divinity in the traditional sense, as much as their orthodox contemporaries. Many Unitarians of the present time believe in such divinity (i. e., perfect obedience); and all might do so, and at the same time believe that Jesus was as entirely human as Shakspeare or Luther or the next man that they might meet.

This is the way in which Dr. Hyde condones his heretical offences, which are many, and makes himself solid with an Orthodoxy which, so long as the old distinctions can be kept up, cares very little whether they denote any difference: "Unitarianism has been of immense service as a critic of the extravagances and excrescences of orthodox tradition. In performing this service, it has, in great measure, made the fatal mistake of accepting the deistic conception of God. Unitarianism has helped to save others. Itself it cannot save. Between acceptance of the incarnation and agnosticism there are several way stations where the practical worker may tarry and the devout spirit may rest."

But what is there in such an "incarnation" as that of Dr. Hyde's conception that might not easily be accepted by any Unitarian without a moment's coquetry with any Orthodoxy, new or old? What is there in such an "incarnation" which affords a particle of justification for the isolated and unique position which he assigns to Jesus? Such isolation is irrational and immoral. And, as for "way stations between the incarnation and agnosticism," Dr. Hyde's position is much farther from the former, much nearer to the latter, than that of the Unitarian who believes in the incarnation of God in humanity. As compared with this, a doctrine that confines his incarnation to the personality of Jesus is pitiful in the narrowness of its implication.

Dr. Hyde's doctrine of the Holy Spirit is as remote from the traditional Orthodoxy as his doctrine of the Father and the Son. "The spirit of social service is the Holy Spirit." Good; but, so interpreted, what Unitarian is there who does not believe in the Holy Spirit? Has not "the spirit of social service" been pre-eminently the Unitarian spirit? But, when Dr. Hyde attempts to show us how "the spirit proceeds from the Son," he again becomes ingenious and indirect, and confines to Jesus an operation in which all good men and women have taken great and honorable parts.

It is impossible for us to follow Dr. Hyde through his Part II. and Part III., the first anthropological, the second sociological. They are better than Part I., but they play fast and loose with damaged phraseology in a manner only a little less reckless than that which we have already seen. At the same time they abound in sentences and passages, in criticisms and comments, that are admirable in their justice and their penetration and their sympathy with the highest thought and the most noble living. Dr. Hyde's meaning and purpose are far in advance of his expression from the first page to the last. Because of his ingenious mixing up of traditional phraseology and rational thinking, he has written one more book for the encouragement of theological dishonesty; and of such there was little need. His fundamental doctrine is so excellent that we are bound to hope that it will not be strangled in the traditional rags and tatters with which he has assiduously tricked it out and wrapped it round, but we are obliged to fear a different result. J. W. C.

SHORT STUDIES IN PARTY POLITICS. By Noah Brooks. Illustrated. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.—If the brevity of Mr. Brooks's "Studies" helps to carry them far and wide where something more elaborate would not have gone, it is decidedly a recommendation; for, although the book is superficial, and brings to the progress of events little of moral purpose or discrimination, even such knowledge as it affords of party politics is better than the blank ignorance of the majority of those who vote one way or the other. The pages on the relations of the Liberal Party to the Whigs and Democrats do not show any lively apprehension of the part which the political independent has to play. It is not only possible, but probable, that the Birneyites, in "throwing away their votes," as Mr. Brooks puts it several times, were not "building better than they knew." They were not fools. That their action would tend to Polk's election they perfectly well knew. The election of Polk seemed to them a lesser evil than the success of the Whigs with an equivocal candidate. On page 124 the life of John Quincy Adams is lengthened out into the canvass of 1848; and his vote for Winthrop as Speaker of the House meeting in December, 1847, when Palfrey "voted agin' him," suggests that he was not "in full accord with the men who led the Free Soil movement." It is agreeable to find that Mr. Brooks has not joined the apologists for Webster's Seventh of March Speech. On the other hand there is no indication of the fact that "political abolitionism" ceased from being abolitionist when it became political. Henceforth it did not oppose slavery, but only the extension of slavery, the Republican platforms of 1856 and 1860 neither demanding the repeal of the fugitive slave law nor the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Evidently, it was no easy matter to bring the party that had made these base concessions up to the point of using the war power of the government for the destruction of slavery in the States.

THE HELPFUL SCIENCE. By St. George Mivart, F.R.S. New York: Harper & Brothers.—By "the helpful science" Mr. Mivart means the science of knowledge, called epistemology by those who prefer long words to short ones, or, perhaps, words that exactly express their meaning to those that express it less exactly. His book is very pleasantly written, and contains a good deal of matter that must be agreeable from every point of view. There is nothing in it to differentiate the author as a Roman Catholic from the Protestant or

There are soaps and soaps but only one

Sunlight Soap

which is the soap of soaps and washes clothes with less labor and greater comfort.

Makes homes brighter
Makes hearts lighter

Lever Bros., Ltd.,
Hudson & Harrison Sts., N. Y.

other Christian believer or religious believer of any sort as such. What he is butting against is a system of philosophy which he calls "sensism," the founder of which, as he reckons, was Hume, whose followers have been Sir William Hamilton, John Stuart Mill, Alexander, Lewes, Spencer, and Huxley. Many will sympathize with the inspiring motive of the book. It is one of many signs in current philosophy that to rest in scepticism is a difficult, if not impossible, thing. We crave assurance that we are in touch with reality, that we are not walking in a vain show, that our ideas and beliefs are correspondent with an actual world. Some of Mr. Mivart's criticisms of those to whom he opposes himself are certainly striking and apparently effective. Whether they would still appear so if one of them should make reply is food for thought. There is a note of courage in the book which is refreshing and inspiring. Here is no attempt, as with Balfour and Kidd, to justify the irrational assumptions of religion by proving that the assumptions of science are equally irrational. Neither Balfour nor Kidd is named; but both are indicated, and especially the former, where it is written: "The indignation of any one who values our highest mental powers may well be excited by sophists, who make use of exceptional mental gifts for the purpose of disparaging and virtually denying the existence of that wonderful and admirable human intellect which they insult and blaspheme."

CONFESSIONS OF AN AMERICAN OPIUM-EATER. From Bondage to Freedom. Boston: James H. Earle.—We have in this book a very different one from the celebrated "Confessions" of De Quincey. No time is spent in picturing the delights and raptures that attend the use of opium. It is the opinion of the writer that De Quincey's book has been the occasion of ruin to hundreds where it has deterred one from the opium habit. There is nothing of De Quincey's literary charm. The book is written without any felicity of expression; but then, too, there is nothing here to attract any one to De Quincey's course of life. There is much more confessed than opium-eating,—drink, gambling, and debauchery; and that one so immersed in evil habits should have extricated himself or have been extricated is something marvelous. It is so represented quite literally in Mr. Cole's narration. The love of a good woman was the instrument of his salvation. The story at this point is less explicit than we could wish, and is invested with more of mystery than is agreeable to the best moral uses of the situation; and yet perhaps the only mystery is that of the claim made on an errant will by the goodness and beauty of angelic womanhood. There was a terrible fight, not with the inclination to return to the habit, but with the apparent necessity for doing so if mind or body was to be saved from utter wreck. Touching religious matters there are vague hints of rupture with a conventional orthodoxy and piety, but they are not sufficiently developed for us to understand at all clearly what is in the writer's mind. It is a matter for regret that the circumstances of the writer's reform were so peculiar as to diminish their serviceableness for others who are in his doleful plight.

THE STORY OF BESSIE COSTRELL. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. New York and London: Macmillan & Co. 75 cents.—There are many stories that make one feel a great pity for the sinner, even while condemning the sin; but in nearly all of these the sin proceeds from some natural impulse or from some sudden self-surrender, which in itself was far from being evil, becoming so only in its relations and consequences. Mrs. Ward, on the contrary, forces us to look at life with different eyes, and stirs our hearts by the recital of a commonplace theft committed by a commonplace person, until we are ready to believe that no person is really "commonplace," and that back of every sin there is a nature made to prefer light rather than darkness. We watch a tragedy of fate, as we see poor, thoughtless, pleasure-loving Bessie Costrell changed into the repentant, frightened, despairing woman. The book is sad, of course, but sad "with a difference"; and it has nothing in common with the books that make life seem less worth the living since such things can be true. Rather does it teach a sympathy with helpless things that suffer in the same way that life teaches it, just by putting the story itself before our eyes and letting it say to us what it will.

WATER TRAMPS; OR, THE CRUISE OF THE "SEA BIRD." By George Herbert Bartlett. New York & London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. This pleasant story describes the adventures of four students, whose temporary lack of funds forced them to combine business with their summer yachting trip. Several times they were narrowly saved from bankruptcy by fortunate catches of bluefish, each of which meant comparative affluence for a time; but, when bluefish were wanting, they were willing to dig clams or even to sell huckleberries, if absolutely necessary. The chief complications arose from their frequent meetings with friends, from whom they wished to conceal the state of things; and some of these complications are quite amusing. The summer proved an eminently successful one, not only for the fun it afforded, but financially and matrimonially as well. The writer's enthusiasm for the sea is evident.

ON THE POINT. By Nathan Haskell Dole. Boston: Joseph Knight Company.—This summer idyl mingles pleasant description, housekeeping, and domestic worries, love-making, and summer amusements in approved proportions, seasoning it all with informal, rather bright conversations, and a fair amount of comment on men and things in general. Mr. Dole's style often needs condensation, or so it seems sometimes; but perhaps the hammock reader would be unwilling to spare these expositions of odd theories and personal experiences which are characteristic of the writer. The book is attractively printed and illustrated.

The Magazines.

The American Kitchen Magazine, formerly the New England Kitchen Magazine, continues its mission of telling people what to eat and how to prepare it, besides devoting a space to an interesting article by Frederic W. Taylor, M.D., on "Hygiene in our Public Schools." Albert Leffingwell, M.D., writing on "Physiology in our Public Schools," emphasizes again the needlessness and the great danger of allowing vivisection in the instruction of children. The articles of this magazine are short and practical.

The August number of the Magazine of Poetry and Literary Review opens with a handful of poems by Edward Dowden, tender, lyrical, and pure. Then follow selections from Frances Ridley Havergal, James E. Nesmith, Christopher Pearse Cranch, Helen Gray Cone, and others less known, several of them accompanied by a portrait of the poet represented. The leading literary articles are "Old Forms in Modern Hands," "Poetry, Prose, and Editors," and "Shelley as a Lyric Poet," none of which are important.

Donahoe's Magazine for September opens with an article by Bernard Morgan, entitled "The Pope at Home." It describes the ordinary occupations of this "tireless old man of eighty-five," and there are several illustrations of his rooms in the Vatican. Mgr. Charles de Harlez, Professor of Oriental Languages in the University of Louvain, compares Buddhism and Christianity, Maibelle Justice writes of "The Passion Play in America," as performed by Indians on the Pacific Coast; and Mary Elizabeth Blake continues "Leaders of Men," begun in the last number. The fiction is contributed by Frank H. Swett and Ross B. Franklin, and there are other less important articles and eight poems of varying degrees of merit.

One of the leading magazine articles for this month is "John Smith in Virginia," by John Fiske, which appears in the Atlantic Monthly. Mr. Fiske stands stoutly by the more romantic versions of Smith's various adventures; and his readers are glad to have such undoubted authority, supported by such reasonable proofs, for the credence they gladly yield. The serial by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps draws near a close. A sad ending seems indicated; but love is the best thing in the world, and her hero will not die unloved. Agnes Repplier writes in her lively style of "Guides: A Protest," which will awaken many recollections of masterful couriers and omniscient interpreters. "The Mystery of Witchface Mountain" is a new serial, begun by Charles Egbert Craddock; while that of Gilbert Parker is continued. Bradford Torrey writes delightfully of "Chickamauga"; and there are other articles by William Cranston Lawton and James Schouler, and poems by Bliss Carman and Michael Field.

The Napoleon articles in the Century are supplemented this month by one describing "Life in the Tuileries under the Second Empire," profusely illustrated and written by an inmate of the palace through the nine most prosperous years of the empire. Alice C. Fletcher contributes an article on "Hunting Customs of the Omahas," out of the writer's personal studies of Indian life. H. V. Boynton's description of "The National Park," embracing the Chickamauga and Chattanooga battle-fields, will be read with interest. Bradford Torrey in this month's Atlantic calls Gen. Boynton "the man who is at the head of all things pertaining to Chickamauga and its history." These articles are especially timely now that the park is to be dedicated on September 19 to 21. "Recollections of Henry Clay," by Madeleine McDowell, contains interesting anecdotes. There is plenty of fiction in this number. "The Princess Sonia," by Julia Magruder, is finished; and "Casa Braccio" hastens to the same fate in the next issue. Mary Hallock Foote and Sarah Orne Jewett are the writers of short stories,

The four important serials of the Popular Science Monthly are "New Chapters in the Warfare of Science," by Andrew D. White, "Professional Institutions," by Herbert Spencer, "Development of American Industries since Columbus," by John G. Morse, and "Studies of Childhood," by Prof. James Sully. Each of these advances in the current number of the magazine. "Natural Rain-makers," by Alexander McAdie, and "The Study of Birds Out-of-doors," by F. M. Chapman, are illustrated for the sake of additional clearness, the latter article being part of a chapter from the author's illustrated handbook of American birds. Harry Banjafield urges the importance of "Fruit as a Food and a Medicine," which ought to lead readers to take full advantage of their present opportunities. Gertrude Crotty Davenport writes of "Variation in the Habits of Animals," instancing cases of variability in feeding and nesting habits and in methods of warfare. "Ancestor Worship among the Fijians," by Basil H. Thomson, is another article of interest, chiefly occupied with facts of observation.

Literary Notes.

Mr. Lloyd Osbourne, Robert Louis Stevenson's stepson and collaborator, has written an account for the October number of Scribner's Magazine of the daily life of the novelist and his family. Mr. Osbourne was a figure in Mr. Stevenson's household whose importance was known to all well acquainted with the family.

In the September number of the Writer a series of "Editorial Talks with Contributors" is begun by William Hayes Ward, the superintending editor of the Independent, who tells what the Independent wants, and does not want, in the way of manuscripts. This series will be continued in the Writer monthly by the editors of other leading American periodicals, and will be of great practical value to all periodical contributors.

The success of the "Livres de Lecture et de Conversation," published a year ago by D. C. Heath & Co. of Boston, in their "Heath's Modern Language Series," has induced them and the author to furnish "Lectures Courantes," a similar but more advanced book. Like the "Livres de Lecture et de Conversation," this book is designed for colleges, seminaries, and high schools, and contains reading, conversation, and composition for second year pupils.

The editors of the Critic offer $25 for the best original poem that shall reach them not later than Sept. 30, 1895, on the subject of bicycling or the bicycle. $10 will be paid for the second-best poem. Poems of less than four or more than one hundred lines will not be considered. Each manuscript must be typewritten, and must be signed with an assumed name, not previously employed by the writer; and the real name must be enclosed in a sealed envelope marked on the outside with the assumed name only. Competition closes September 30.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston. Masterpieces of English Literature. The Church in the First Three Centuries. By Philip Stafford Moxom. Price $1.50. Twelve-fold Tales. By Nathaniel Hawthorne. Riverside Literature Series. The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table. With Accompanying Papers. By Oliver Wendell Holmes. Riverside Literature Series. In Memoriam. By Alfred Lord Tennyson. Edited, with Notes, by William J. Rolfe. From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. English Lands, Letters, and Kings. Queen Anne and the Georges. By Donald G. Mitchell. Price $1.50. The Revolution of 1848. By Imbert de Saint-Amand. Price $1.25. Side Talks with Girls. By Ruth Ashmore. Price $1.00. From Harper & Brothers, New York. Two on a Tower. By Thomas Hardy. Principles of Rhetoric. By A. S. Hill. New Edition. Revised and enlarged. Rhymes of our Planet. By Will Carleton. The Front Yard, and Other Italian Stories. By Constance Fenimore Woolson. From Macmillan & Co., New York. Great Expectations and Hard Times. By Charles Dickens. Price $1.00. From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. God Forsaken. A Novel. By Frederic Breton. From Riley Brothers, New York. Solved; or, The Sunday Evening Problem. Hints on the Purchase of Lantern Outfits and Instructions to operate.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. A Bunch of Violets. Words by Walter Plough. Music by Floyd McKimstry Schoonmaker. If I Must, well I Must. Negro Song and March Chorus. Words and music by Percy Gaunt. Lift thine Eyes. Sacred Song. By Harry G. Leland. Approach of Dawn. Quadrille. T. H. Rollinson. Do you Forget? Song. English words by Mrs. O. L. Fox. Composed by Idalia Scallan. Where the Bee sucks. From "The Tempest." Music by Arthur Sullivan. Love, Stay by and Sing. Words by T. R. Sullivan. Music by Robert Atkinson. Heart so True. Song. Words by George Cooper. Music by Mattie Woodcock. Don't take my Boy away. Words and music by Percy Gaunt. Love is Blind. Written and composed by Felix McGlen-non.

Popular Works.

Baltimore American.—There is a tranquil, strengthening, uplifting power in these little books that makes one cherish for them, when they have been enjoyed and laid aside, the warm, grateful sentiment with which we treasure dear friends.

"As Natural as Life."

Studies of the Inner Kingdom. By Charles G. Ames, Minister of the Church of the Disciples, Boston. 109 pages.

"One of the most satisfying treatises we have ever read. The little volume is a spiritual poem, expressed in a human form called prose; but the beauty of its truth has root in the Infinite. It will prove a keen delight to the appreciative thinker."—Boston Ideas.

In Love with Love.

Four Life-Studies. By James H. West, author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," "Poems," etc. 109 pages.

"There is something singularly fresh and strong in Mr. West's way of putting things. Any one of these studies read at night would sweeten a man's slumber, and waken him in the morning to some better sense of his great opportunity."—John W. Chadwick, in the Christian Register.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as related to the Inward Life. By Marion D. Shutter, D.D., author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. 111 pages.

"One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful."—Philadelphia To-day.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, each 50 cents. Special gift edition, full gilt, each $1.00.

 For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher, 174 High Street, - - - Boston.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Crowell Cressey, Ph.D.

CONTENTS: Preface; I. The Conditions of the Problem; II. The Nature of Man; III. The Persistence of Mind or Soul; IV. The Nature of the Universe; V. Personal Belief; VI. Conditional Immortality; VII. Conclusion.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Spiritual Life.

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMAN-DIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROWELL CRESSEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

Wrestling and Waiting. Sermons by Rev. JOHN F. W. WARE. 340 pages. With portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

A Living Faith. By GEO. S. MERIAM. 300 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

The Way of Life. By GEO. S. MERIAM. 206 pages. Cloth, gilt top, $1.00.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Home.

SONNET.

A thousand beauties that have never been
Haunt me with hope and tempt me to pursue;
The gods, methinks, dwell just behind the blue;
The satyrs at my coming fled the green.
The fitting shadows of the grove between
The dryad's eyes were winking, and I knew
The wings of sacred Eros as he flew
And left me to the love of things not seen.
'Tis a sad love, like an eternal prayer,
And knows no keen delight, no faint surcease.
Yet from the seasons hath the earth increase,
And heaven shines as if the gods were there.
Had Dian passed, there could no deeper peace
Embalm the purple stretches of the air.

—George Santayana.

IN THE YEAR 1835.

"Did you ever have a Sunday-school celebration when you were little, and did you take part, grandma?" asked Alfred, snuggling up very close to his grandma Tracy. "Speak a piece, I mean, or say texes?"

"O grandma, you did. I see it in your eyes," cried Edgar, snuggling his hassock close on the other side. "Tell us about it, please."

It was always Alfred who first thought of things and began everything, and Edgar followed. They were so very much alike in looks, had it not been for this difference, their papa would not have been able to tell which one he was speaking to; for they were twins. Both were always on the go; and Papa Tracy called them Wiggle and Waggle, and cook called each one Alfred-edgar with the greatest impartiality, while all the people on Oak Street called each one Twunny. They had hosts of friends, those Twinnies; but cook did not want them in the kitchen, because, she said, they "flustered" her, and made her put in the baking powder wrong, and Mamma Tracy could not have them in the nursery, for baby was cutting four new teeth, and was sick and restless. And this particular Saturday they would have been very lonesome little boys, had it not been for grandma; for they had been vaccinated, and their arms were sore, and the way it snowed and blowed and roared was fearful. Sometimes, when it was pleasant, they forgot that grandma might be lonesome; but, when it stormed, they never forgot her. Dear me, no!

"About the very first thing I do distinctly remember is a Sunday-school celebration," replied grandma, with a smile; and, laying down her knitting, she stroked first one yellow head, then the other, with her delicate hand. "I was very small, not more than five years old."

"Oh!" cried the twins in concert, and smacking their lips. They felt as if they were going to hear wonderful things, for it seemed to them grandma and the world were young together.

"We lived on a farm, and were five miles from the meeting-house," resumed grandma; "but only the severest storms kept us at home. When it was just plain cold, we were well wrapped up, and given hot bricks; and our mother had a Dutch stove, a tiny tin box full of hot coals to put at her feet. The meeting-house stood in the centre of a grassy square, at which four roads met, and you would not think it much to look at; for it was a plain, bare house of red brick, with a squat wooden tower painted white, and which had at each of its corners a sort of peak, the shape of a carpet tack. The pews were high and square, and had doors; and the pulpit was high up, and reached by a winding stairway, and over it hung a wooden canopy, or sounding-board. I could only see the tops of the heads of the people who sat next us, and of course caught no glimpse of the others; and the sermons were always long, and I was often glad to put my feet on mother's foot-stove. Sunday-school came directly after the long morning service, and each scholar learned as many verses as he could. I, being little, learned only one, or two if they were brief; but just after my fifth birthday a prize was offered to all who would commit the Twenty-third Psalm. I was the youngest child who succeeded; and I was given a red Testament with a gilt clasp, and thought a great deal of myself in consequence."

"Did you stand up and say it afore 'em all, grandma?" asked Alfred.

"No. I repeated it to my teacher. That was in March. The celebration came in June, and Grandma Verbeck was so pleased at my getting the Testament she gave me a new frock for the occasion. She went herself to Utica, and bought it, a rose-red cashmere; and she embroidered it with floss of the same color, so it was extremely pretty. I had to wear with it new red shoes and a ruffled muslin apron. My hat was a gypsy, and had a wreath of tiny roses round it; and, when I was dressed that Wednesday afternoon, I was as proud as a peacock.

"Haying was just over, and the grass had been neatly cut about the meeting-house; and, after we children had all assembled under the sweet-acorn-tree which stood in the south corner of the lot, Silas Beard, blowing on his flute 'On the Road to Boston,' led us in procession two by two round that grassy square. Deacon Trent did not approve of the tune; but Silas said we could march better to it than we could to China or Windham, and father said it was a week-day anyhow, and we were not in the meeting-house, and Dr. Tappan, that was the minister, only smiled. The third time we went round the square Silas stationed himself under the sweet-acorn-tree, and we filed into the meeting-house.

"After singing a hymn the superintendent asked questions: 'Who was the first man? Who was the meekest? and the oldest?' and so on. At first the school replied in concert; but, as the questions became more difficult, an answer came now from one corner, now from another. But we did not twist our heads about to look. We could not have seen if we had, and then we had been taught that gaping about is bad manners. At last the question, 'Who were cast into the fiery furnace?' was asked. Ruth Buel gave the first name, 'Shadrach.' Then Tilly Von Emms, who sat not far from me, cried shrilly, 'Meshach.' She was two years older than I was; and I admired her very much, for her golden hair curled, and my dark mane was straight as wire. I had heard that story no end of times, and knew well enough all the names, and that Abednego was the one lacking; but I had never heard the sound of my voice before the whole school. Full of ambition to shine and of vanity over my pretty dress, I sprang up, determined to cover the Brockholst name with glory; but once on my feet wheels seemed to be going round in my head, and I hesitated. Kind Dr. Tappan, thinking to help me, rose in his pulpit, and, leaning over and smiling at me, said: 'Our dear little Rachel Brockholst is going to tell us the third name. Be very still that you may hear her.' My voice seemed to die in my throat. I would far rather have taken a whipping or one of Dr. Bogart's old-fashioned messes of pink-root, aloes, castor-oil, and senna. But my great-grandfather had fought Indians, and my father had been at Valley Forge, so the brave blood in me rallied enough to breathe rather than to say,

"Indigo. The third one, sir, was Indigo."

"Yes, Abednego," said the kind doctor as quick as a wink. Then, turning to the choir, he waved his hand, and added, 'Please favor us with 'There is a Land of Pure Delight.'"

Alfred and then Edgar smiled doubtfully. They did not like to laugh at grandma, even at her doings when she was a little girl; and they were quite ready to be angry if any one else had dared to do so.

"My cheeks turned as red as fire," resumed grandma. "For of course my mistake sounded loud as a thunder peal to my own ears, and Tilly Von Emms added to my chagrin by crawling up on her seat and looking over at me and snickering. Dreadful manners she had for our day."

"I call that real mean," cried Alfred, slapping his knee, "and bad manners any time."

"So do I," echoed Edgar, with great promptness.

"Well, after the benediction Dr. Tappan came down and sat in our pew, and petted me; and, when they passed the cake,—it was the old-fashioned kinds, pound cake and election cake, full of fruit,—he helped me to big wedges."

"Was there lemonade?" demanded Alfred.

"No. For the grown-up folks there was hot tea made out doors, I think, in a kettle, and for the children jelly water, very pink and cool and delicious to drink, we thought."

"And is that all?" asked Alfred, wistfully.

"We want every single bit," added Edgar.

"Yes. Nothing came after the cake but the home-going. Grandmother comforted me then. She said she was all to blame for filling my head with thoughts about my new frock. A head, she said, is like a box. Once full, it is full. The secret of a noble life is not to fill one's mind with trifles to the crowding out of sweet and gracious things."

"I like you better than ever, grandma," said Alfred, after a long silence. "I love you more if, when you were little, you were sometimes a little—naughty and—'staken.'"

"So do I," said Edgar. "I like you a million anyhow."—Elizabeth Cumings, in the Advance.

KEEPING A SECRET.

Is there any greater joy in children's lives than going out into the country? For weeks the Kimbark children had talked and thought and dreamed of the Lake Cottage where they were to spend their vacation.

When school was fairly over, they only waited to put away their books, and help in the great fun of packing and shutting up the house; and away they started,—bag, baggage, bat, ball, and boat, father, mother, Hannah, and all.

What a joy the whole trip was, and how perfectly enchanting was the cottage by the lake side, and all the delicious country surroundings!

The house stood upon a little bluff, at the foot of which the shore was lined with tall reeds, grasses, and brakes. In rainy weather it was wet and muddy here, but in dry weather it was sandy. Here the little boat was moored; and here the younger children played, taking long journeyings, going the length of the rope, as they were not allowed to go rowing on the lake alone.

One twilight, when the family were all having a delightful row together, mamma was reminded by the reeds along the shore to tell a certain story about them. How once upon a time, long, long ago, a king named Midas did such a very foolish thing that he was punished by the fairies by having his ears grow tall, just like those of an ass.

His barber was the only man who knew the king's dreadful punishment, for a high pointed cap hid the ears from every one else. This barber had promised, honest and true, he would tell nobody; but sometimes the secret seemed too much for him. He felt as though he would surely burst with it. Still, he remained faithful, relieving himself when he felt unusually distressed by going down to the shore, and whispering it to the reeds. But the reeds thought it was too good to keep,—they had made no promises,—so they whispered it to every one who listened; and to this day they tell the tale,—"King Midas has asses' ears!"

This story made Teddy curious to hear the reeds tell their secret; and the next morning he wandered off among the tall grasses, and, creeping along, he cuddled down, and listened.

There was just a faint, gentle breeze, which made a rustling noise, and—yes—there certainly was a whispering sound. Listen,—what did it say? He could hear something like "asses' ears." Yes, he really could hear it plainly now,—"has asses' ears."

Now for the rest of it. That wasn't so plain. It was so awfully long ago, perhaps these young reeds had forgotten who it was that had asses' ears; but listen,—there it is,—"idas has asses ears." Then clearer,—"King Midas has asses' ears." Just as plain! How funny it was!

Teddy lay and listened and listened to the soothing sound, and then he fell to wondering if he could keep a secret all to himself if he had promised to. He just knew he could: he wouldn't tell even the reeds. Still, he was glad, on the whole, the barber had told, it was such a good story. Then he listened to it again. All at once he heard something else; and with his keen, bright little eyes he saw something moving farther on among the reeds. He looked closer, and listened more intently. What do you suppose he discovered? An old mother duck, who had stolen a nest down on the water's edge. Here she was sitting quietly and patiently on her precious eggs, waiting and watching for the stir of life in them that promised her such great joy.

With her beady black eyes she gave Ted an appealing, frightened look, which seemed to say,—

"Oh, please, little boy, please, for pity's sake, don't disturb me; and please don't tell of me to other boys!"

Ted understood her, for he was a boy who could hear with his feelings as well as with his ears; and he replied, softly:

"All right, old duckie, I won't trouble you. I won't let even a cat-tail hurt you. And I won't tell anybody about you, either. No, nobody but you and I and the reeds will know where your nest is. Here's my chance to keep a secret. We can't exactly shake hands on it, but I have promised you; and I am good for it!"

Mrs. Duck really seemed to understand; for she clucked softly, and smoothed her feathers as Ted crawled out of the reedy bed as quietly as he could.

He hurried home, feeling very big and important with his secret. He wished he could tell Ruth,—just Ruth. She wouldn't do any harm, and she would be so interested. Of course, it was awfully hard not to tell Harold, but then Harold and some of his big hunting friends might interfere; but Ruth,—still, she was a girl, and very curious, and she might go to look, and then Mrs. Duck would know he had not been true. More than all, he would know it himself, and despise himself for giving in.

So he shut his lips tight together every time he thought of it; and the longer he tried, the stronger he grew. Though he did almost let it out to mamma one day when he was telling her how truly he had heard the old barber's secret, and again, when they were out in the boat one day, papa rowed so near the place his heart almost stood still for fear they should disturb the nest.

He visited his feathered friend often, always taking her some little dainty, in the way of crumbs he had slipped into his pocket, "Hop-o-my-thumb" fashion.

So the days passed in safety. Ted was growing in self-control, Mrs. Duck in confidence; and soon great reward came to both.

Of course, you cannot quite feel how supremely happy the feathered mother was as her dear little ducklings came safely out of their shells, all vigorous and hungry, how proud she was as she led them to the water, and they all took a delightful swim together! Dear little feathered mamma,

GLENWOOD

RANGES AND

HEATERS

MAKE HOUSEKEEPING EASY.

TWO GOLD MEDALS.

Made by WEIR STOVE CO., Taunton, Mass.

she felt as though she had come out into a new world herself; and she was perfectly sure that nowhere in all creation were there twelve such beautiful ducklings as now followed in her train.

You can, however, feel just how delighted Ted was as he saw the family all safely launched. He raced up to the cottage, shouting for Ruth. Together they raced back to the shore; and, jumping into the boat, they pushed it the length of the rope, and found themselves right in the family circle.

What fun it was watching them and feeding them then, and for many days after! The feathered family were given the very best care, protection, and food, and became so tame they would swim right up to eat out of the children's hands. Other ducks came, too; for they learned that these children were to be perfectly trusted. You would surely feel so, too, if you took a look into their happy faces.

Ted was very glad for several reasons that he had been true. Papa said,—

"That's business."

Mamma smiled, saying, "That's one kind of self-control."

It was very gratifying to see Ruth's wide-eyed admiration as she heard how he had learned and kept the secret, and to have Harold exclaim:—

"Good for you! I wish you had told. However, as you didn't, I see I can trust you with other important business."

And old mother duck opened her bill, and said, "Thanks, thanks!"—Hal Owen, in the Churchman.

PASS IT ON.

Once when I was a school-boy, going home for the holidays, I had a long way to go to reach the far-away little town in which I dwelt. I arrived at Bristol, and got on board the steamer with just enough money to pay my fare; and, that being settled, I thought in my innocence I had paid for everything in the way of meals. I had what I wanted as long as we were in smooth water. Then came the rough Atlantic, and the need of nothing more. I had been lying in my berth for hours, wretchedly ill, and past caring for anything, when there came the steward, and stood beside me.

"Your bill, sir," said he, holding out a piece of paper.

"I have no money," said I, in my wretchedness.

"Then I shall keep your luggage. What is your name and address?" I told him. Instantly he took off the cap he wore, with the gilt band about it, and held out his hand. "I should like to shake hands with you," he said.

I gave him my hand, and shook his as well as I could. Then came the explanation,—how that some years before some little kindness had been shown his mother by my father in the sorrow of her widowhood.

"I never thought the chance would come for me to repay it," said he, pleasantly; "but I am glad it has."

"So am I," said I.

As soon as I got ashore, I told my father what had happened. "Ah," said he, "see how a bit of kindness lives! Now he has passed it on to you. Remember, if you meet anybody that needs a friendly hand, you must pass it on to them."

Years had gone by. I had grown up and quite forgotten it all, until one day I had gone to the station of one of our main lines. I was just going to take my ticket, when I saw a little lad crying, a thorough gentleman he was, trying to keep back the troublesome tears as he pleaded with the booking clerk.

"What is the matter, my lad?" I asked.

"If you please, sir, I haven't money enough to pay my fare. I have all but a few pence; and I tell the clerk if he will trust me I will be sure to pay him."

Instantly it flashed upon me, the forgotten story of long ago. Here, then, was my chance to pass it on. I gave him the sum needed, and then got into the carriage with him. Then I told the little fellow the story of long ago and of the steward's kindness to me. "Now, to-day," I said, "I pass it on to you; and remember, if you meet with any one who needs a kindly hand, you must pass it on to them."

"I will, sir, I will," cried the lad, as he took my hand; and his eyes flashed with earnestness.

"I am sure you will," I answered.

I reached my destination, and left my little friend. The last sign I had of him was the handkerchief fluttering from the window of the carriage, as if to say: "It is all right, sir. I will pass it on."—Home and School Visitor.

A BIRD'S NEST.

Perhaps the most unique nest in North America is that of the dusky little rogues who demand our hospitality by building in unused chimneys, the chimney swift. The nest is a delicate and lovely wall pocket, of the daintiest twigs, woven carefully and artistically together, and placed, apparently glued, flat against the chimney, like a bracket. How it holds together long enough to rear swift babies or why it hangs to the sooty surface a moment is a mystery. Curious indeed would be the sight, could we only enjoy it, of the city of the swifts, with its hundreds of residents, as it exists in some of our big chimneys.—Olive Thorne Miller.

A BRAVE POOR BOY.

Mr. Edison, who is known all over the world as a great electrician, was a poor boy. He sold newspapers, he ran errands, he did everything an honest boy could do to support himself. The following story, relating to an event in his boyhood, shows that he was a brave boy:—

One summer forenoon, while the train was being taken apart and made up anew, a car was uncoupled, and sent down the track with no brakeman to control it. Edison, who had been looking at the fowls in the poultry yard, turned just in time to see little Jimmie on the main track, throwing pebbles over his head, utterly unconscious of danger.

He dropped his papers upon the platform, seized the child in his arms, and threw himself off the track face downward, in sharp fresh gravel ballast, without a second to spare. As it was, the wheel of the car struck the heel of his boot.

"I was in the ticket-office," said the child's father, "and, hearing a shriek, ran out in time to see the train hands bringing the two boys to the platform."

Having no other way of showing his gratitude, the agent said,—

"Al, if you will stop off here four days in the week, and keep Jamie out of harm's way until the mixed train returns from Detroit, I will teach you telegraphing."

"Will you?" said Edison.

"I will."

He extended his hand, and said, "It's a bargain." And so Edison became a telegrapher.—Lutheran Standard.

THE BABY'S NURSE.

"Yes," said Mr. Hillier, as he carefully dug around my pansy bed, "oh, yes'm, I've seen elephants in India many a time. I was stationed at one point, with the English army, you know, where I saw one who used to take care of the children."

"Take care of the children! How could he? What do you mean?"

"Well, he did, ma'am. It was wonderful what that elephant knew. The first time I made his acquaintance he gave me a blow that I had reason to remember. I was on duty in the yard; and the colonel's little child was playing about, and she kept running too near, I thought, to the elephant's feet. I was afraid he would put his great, clumsy foot on her by mistake, so I made up my mind to carry her to a safer place. I stooped to pick her up, and the next thing I knew I had had a knock which sent me flat on the ground. That elephant had hit me with his trunk. One of the servants came along just then, and helped me up; and, when I told him about it, said he: 'I wonder the old fellow didn't kill you. It isn't safe for anybody to interfere with that baby when he has it in charge. I'd have you to know that he's that baby's nurse.'"

"Well, I thought he was just saying it for sport; but, sure enough, after a while the nurse came out with the child fast asleep in her arms; and what did she do but lay it in the elephant's trunk as though it had been a cradle! And that great fellow stood there for more than an hour, watching that baby, and rocking it gently now and then!

"He was real good to the other children, too. It used to be his business to take the family out riding. The colonel's lady would come out and mount to her cushioned seat on his back. Then, one by one, the three children would be given to the elephant; and he would hand them up to the mother, nicer than any nurse or servant could, you know, because he could reach and knew how to do it. Oh, an elephant is an uncommon handy nurse when he is trained to the business; and faithful, I tell you. You can trust him every time."—Pansy.

SERENADING HIMSELF.

Herr Nötel, merchant and burgomaster, who is passionately fond of singing, is the first tenor and president of the Schnitzel-burg glee club. The club consists of only a single quartet; but, small as is their number, the greater is their enthusiasm for the songs of Germany. Nötel would shortly celebrate his silver wedding. They must give him a serenade: there was no help for it. But what was a quartet without the first tenor? There was no getting a substitute, but for all that they would give Nötel a surprise. On the eve of the festal day the three members of the club, armed with lanterns, met at the appointed time before the house of their respected president; and, after some clearing of throats and twanging of tuning-forks, the music began. A small crowd collected in the street, and the windows in the vicinity were lined with appreciative listeners. The Herr Burgomaster and his family also appeared at the windows of their brightly illuminated sitting-room. The first bars of the well-known song, "Silent Night," left much to be desired; but the three voices bravely held on their way amid the surrounding stillness, and in a few moments Herr Nötel went down into the street and joined in the quartet. No sooner was the song finished than he ran upstairs again, appeared at the open window, and in loud, clear tones thanked the club for their ovation. Seen on a public stage, an old gentleman madly rushing upstairs to thank himself for serenading himself would cause a good deal of laughter.—Harper's Young People.

RUSKIN AND HIS SERVANTS.

No doubt some readers may have read the following extract from Fors Clavigera, and taken it to be simply poetic sentiment:

"I have got two Davids and a Kate that I wouldn't change for anybody else's servants in the world; and I believe the only quarrel they have with me is that I don't give them enough to do for me. This very morning I must stop writing presently to find the stoutest of the Davids some business, or he will be miserable all day."

The professor and I were dining together, the windows of the dining-room looking up to the wood at the left gable of the house. During the meal, as we were enjoying a rhubarb tart, I happened to say that it was the first I had tasted that season, and how delicious it was.

The professor was delighted at my appreciation of his rhubarb; and, ringing for one of the servants, he said, "Please tell Jackson I want him." This was the gardener,—one of the "Davids," I suppose. When he came into the room, his master said, "Jackson, I am very pleased to tell you that your first pulling of rhubarb is quite a success; and my friend here, who has had some pie made of it, says it is delicious."

Jackson, with a true gardener's pride, thanked us both for our appreciation of his early rhubarb, and left the room.

When we had finished dining, a servant came in, bringing a number of lighted candles. The windows being shaded by the overhanging trees above, the room was almost dark even before the sun had gone down. After placing the candles, she was leaving the room, when she said, "Please, sir, there is a beautiful sunset sky just now over the 'Old Man.'"

The professor rose from his chair at once, and said, "Thank you, Kate, for telling us; but, before disturbing my friend, I will go and see if it is worth looking at."

He left the room, and soon returned.

"Yes," he said, "it is worth seeing"; and he led the way upstairs to his own bedroom.

It was certainly a glorious sight, the sun sinking behind the Coniston "Old Man" mountain, and at its foot, in deep shade, "the Hall," on the opposite shore, where Sir Philip Sidney, according to tradition, lived for a time, with his sister, in "our Arcadia of western meres," and the mist and ripples on the lake tinged with a crimson flush.

We sat, I remember, in the window recess till the sun went down behind the mountain. Not a word was spoken by either of us. He was thinking, perhaps, of the many more charming sunset skies he had seen in various parts of the world. But I was thinking more of the charming relationship and sympathy manifested between master and servant, and how strange it would seem to most of us that even such a trifling matter as a gardener's first rhubarb is not to be left as a matter of course, nor such a common occurrence as a beautiful sunset to be left to pass away unnoticed in this exceptional household.—Selected.

JACK'S LAME FOOT.

A well-known gentleman kindly sends us an account of Jack, a chestnut horse with a white star in his forehead, white right hind foot, a beautiful head and bright eyes, who one day, when about nine years old, became lame, and was turned from his stall into the barnyard. Shortly afterwards Jack contrived to get out of the barnyard, and without halter or bridle went to the neighboring city of L., which was about three miles distant, and found the blacksmith's shop where he had been shod. The blacksmith, not knowing the horse, drove him out of the shop four times, and then, as he again returned, examined his right fore foot and pulled off the shoe, and found that a nail had been driven into the quick of the foot, which produced the lameness of the horse.

To get to the blacksmith's shop, Jack had pulled the pin out of the barnyard gate, and passed through the main street of the city, which was full of teams, and made two turns in the street to get to the right place. Our Dumb Animals.

The two most widely separated post-offices in the United States are those in Key West, Fla., and Unalakleet, Alaska, 6,271 miles apart. Two cents will insure the carriage of a letter between those distant points.

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

Two large pies are made from each package of None-Such Mince Meat. For sale by all grocers. Be sure and get the None-Such.

MERRELL-SOULE CO.,
Syracuse, N.Y.

"DIRT DEFIES THE KING." THEN

SAPOLIO

IS GREATER THAN ROYALTY ITSELF.

A FAITHFUL POLIOEMAN.

A few days ago the people of Dorchester, Mass., were much pained to learn that the soul of the police captain of the great Twenty-fourth Ward had taken its way down "the river that flows forever to the unknown sea."

Born in Ireland, Michael Merrick came to this country when a mere child of eight years, and fought his way through life to a position of great honor in the police department of the city. First a patrolman, then a sergeant, then lieutenant, he was finally appointed captain, which office he filled at the time of his death.

Probably few realize the responsibility resting on the shoulders of him who occupies the position of captain in the 11th Division. Certainly, none realized it more fully than he. Doubtless many of Dorchester's citizens have passed him on the street on the way to his duty without knowing that this man, with slender, erect figure, of a bearing so modest that it suggested the professional man rather than the police officer, was their protector, and watched over them even while they slept. And yet here was one of Boston's most renowned police captains, who, to use Emerson's words in describing the first emperor, "in every moment and emergency knew what to do next," thoroughly familiar with the rules and routine of the department, a strict disciplinarian, respected, honored, and beloved by his superiors, by his subordinates, and by the citizens as well.

In these days of what Hon. George F. Hoar has termed "intemperate utterances of the pulpit and of the press," aimed at the Irish-American citizens of the country, his example will not be lost sight of. His life and work furnish an emphatic answer to the argument so often made that a man cannot be a good Catholic and a good citizen, for he was both. In the future it will be a sufficient defence to the Irish-American Catholic of Boston, at least, to mention his name and remain silent. The members of the numerous "patriotic" orders, when the example of the hero of Winchester and the Valley is cited, say, and with some reason, "We have no fault to find with Sheridan; but he was a man of a century; he was better than the average of his race." But Capt. Merrick was distinctly a man of the people, who struggled on through life to the honorable position to which he gave the best years of his career.

Of his domestic life I forbear to speak: such ground is too sacred to tread; but I may say that he educated his children so that to-day they are a credit to him and to themselves,—one a physician of high standing, while others hold important stations in the public service. But he has left them a priceless heritage; for, when is written the complete history of what the quaint language of the conveyancer terms "that part of Boston formerly known as Dorchester," it will be incomplete without the name of him now of the great and silent majority, the patrolman, sergeant, lieutenant, and captain of police in Boston's greatest ward,—a shining example to every man in the department, gone to answer the last roll-call, with no duty neglected and no trust abused, "faithful unto death."

When the day arrives of which we are beginning to see the early dawn, when the offices of the municipality are filled by men having the conscience, integrity, and self-respect of Michael Merrick, then and not till then may we expect an answer to the prayer graven on the shield of the city, "Sicut patribus, sit Deus nobis."

HENRY B. CALLENDER.

Spirit of the Press.

The Outlook, writing on the case of Prof. Ryder of Andover, speaks of the radical inconsistency of creed subscription:—

It might be thought sufficient to say here simply that Dr. Ryder's teachings, whatever they may be, are found to be not inconsistent with a liberal interpretation of the Andover Creed; and so Andover Seminary is not to lose one of its most eminent and valued teachers. But more than this seems to us to be involved in this case; namely, the radical inconsistency of creed subscription with the essential principle of Protestantism. Rome affirms that the Church is infallible. It may, therefore, by tradition add to the Bible, and by ecclesiastical decisions authoritatively declare its meaning and its applications. Protestantism affirms that only the Bible is infallible; that all church additions and church interpretations are human and fallible; and, therefore, all creeds are to be brought to the Bible to be tested. By Protestants and by Puritans, who are Protestants of the Protestants, a seminary is founded and endowed to promote the study of the Bible. An able and conscientious scholar is engaged to study the Greek Testament and to teach its interpretation to the students. If now a discrepancy is discovered between his interpretation of the infallible Bible and the fallible creed, what does the logic of Protestantism require? Evidently, that his teaching be examined in the light of modern scholarship to see whether it is rational and Scriptural; and, if so, it should stand, and the creed should be changed. What does the logic of creed subscription require? That the creed should be examined; and, if the scholar's interpretation of the Bible does not accord with the creed, the interpretation should be changed. We test the modern scholar's interpretation of the infallible Bible not by the Bible itself, but by the fallible creed. We found a seminary for the avowed purpose of ascertaining what the New Testament teaches, in order that we may from time to time correct the errors in our man-made and fallible creeds; and then we propose to stop any interpretation of the New Testament which discovers that the fallible creed is fallible. This is not finding fault with either the trustees or the visitors of Andover Seminary. They are given a system, and they are under obligation to administer it as well as they can. It is condemning the system itself. No college would forbid an Arnold to discover that certain ancient historic theories are untrustworthy, or an astronomer to discover error in former astronomical theories, or a professor of chemistry to discover a new and before unthought of element in the air. When we are studying the works of God, we assume that we can learn something new about them. It is only when we are studying God himself that we assume that nothing new can be learned, that we know him perfectly already. We need a Luther to bring us back to the doctrine of the Reformation, that all creeds and theologies are to be tested by the Bible, and that no interpretation of the Bible is ever to be tested by a creed or a current theology. We do not live in Rome, but we do as the Romans do. Let us be consistent. Let us either affirm with Rome the final authority of the Church, and test the Bible and all interpretations of it by the creed, or else affirm with Luther the final authority of the Bible, and test all creeds and interpretations of creeds by the Bible.

Here and There.

Sixteen hundred persons and 31,210 cattle were killed last year by wild beasts in Bengal, according to the official returns.

The missionaries in India are indignant that a firm of European silversmiths should undertake an order to make a bull to be worshipped at a Hindu temple. The bull is to be silver, and life size.

The German emperor's imperial train cost $750,000, and took three years to construct. There are altogether twelve cars, including two nursery carriages. Each of the sleeping-cars is fitted with a bath.

Two more slabs of stone inscribed with words and music have been found in the treasury of the Athenians at Delphi by the French. By using some of the fragments previously discovered, a second hymn to Apollo, with its notes, has been put together. The date is after the conquest of Greece by the Romans.

Some notion of the amount of lumber being cut in the Minnesota forests is had from the fact that one day last week there was a jam of logs in the Upper Mississippi above St. Cloud which was estimated to contain 250,000,000 feet of lumber; and a little further up the river was another jam, which extended for almost twenty miles.

On any special festive occasion a Chinese host sends out three separate invitations to his guests. The first is despatched a couple of days before the banquet, the second on the day itself, to remind the friends that they are expected without fail, and the third about an hour before sitting down to table, by way of showing how anxiously the visitors are expected.

It has been recently suggested by an English naturalist, Pocock, that the observation of a spider's web may have given rise to the art of netting. It appears by a letter to Nature from a learned Japanese, Mina Kata, that a Chinese cyclopedia, published in the fourth century A.D., states that "Taihu made a spider his master, and knitted nets."

A Shining Example of true merit

SILVER
ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH
and unlike others
It Shines Without Scratching.

It's sold everywhere.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York

The MAGEE Boston Heater

FOR WARM AIR ONLY, and the MAGEE COMBINATION HEATER here shown (for warm air and Hot Water), each received THE HIGHEST AWARD at the World's Fair, Chicago.

They are honestly, carefully and intelligently made for USE, not merely to sell.

No one can afford to keep house without a Magee Range and Furnace, because the saving in fuel and food will pay many times their cost above any others on the market.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The name Magee carries our Guarantee of PERFECT SATISFACTION with proper use.

DESCRIPTIVE CIRCULARS FREE.

For Sale by Leading Dealers Everywhere.

Hot Water Combination.

MAGEE FURNACE COMPANY,
32, 34, 36 & 38 Union St., Boston.
242 Water Street, New York.
86 Lake Street, Chicago.

Lectures and Sermons

BY

WILLIAM J. POTTER.

With a Biographical Sketch

BY

Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Ph.D.

This book is published in style of Mr. Potter's previous volume, "Twenty-five Sermons in Twenty-five Years." Gilt top, bevelled boards.

Price $2.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

BY

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher; . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Post-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

IMPORTANT WORKS BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE

The Peak in Darien: With Some Other Inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and Body. An Octave of Essays. 266 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"Vigorous in thought and style. We have read the volume through from preface to 'the end,' and enjoyed it."—Watchman.

Darwinism in Morals, and Other Essays. 422 pages. Cloth, $2.00.

Some of the chapters: Darwinism in Morals; Hereditary Piety; The Religion of Childhood; Prehistoric Religion; The Religions of the World; The Religions of the East; The Religion and Literature of India; Unconscious Cerebration; Dreams; The Evolution of Morals and Religion.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"The profoundest, wisest, purest, noblest book in principle, aim, and tone yet written upon the true position of woman in society."

The Scientific Spirit of the Age, and Other Pleas and Discussions. 243 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Religious Duty. 311 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

A Faithless World. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

1. HERBERT SPENCER: His life and personal characteristics; his views on education; his religious opinions. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.
2. CHARLES ROBERT DARWIN: His ancestry, life, and personal characteristics. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
3. SOLAR AND PLANETARY EVOLUTION: How suns and worlds come into being. By GARRETT P. SERVISS.
4. EVOLUTION OF THE EARTH: The story of geology; how the world grew. By DR. LEWIS G. JANES.
5. EVOLUTION OF VEGETAL LIFE: How does life begin? By WILLIAM POTTS.
6. EVOLUTION OF ANIMAL LIFE: The evidences from geology, geographical distribution, and comparative zoology. By ROSSITT W. RAYMOND, Ph.D.
7. THE DESCENT OF MAN: Man and the brute creation; his ancestral line; duration of human life on the planet. By E. D. COPE, Ph.D.
8. EVOLUTION OF MIND: The mind and the nervous system; the nature of mind. By ROBERT G. ECOLES, M.D.
9. EVOLUTION OF SOCIETY: Primitive man; growth of the family, city, and State; development of the domestic relations; is society an organism? By JAMES A. SKILTON, Esq.
10. EVOLUTION OF THEOLOGY: Origin of religious beliefs; ancestor-worship; nature-worship; the Absolute. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.
11. EVOLUTION OF MORALS: How altruism grows out of egoism; the proper balance. By DR. LEWIS G. JANES.
12. PROOFS OF EVOLUTION: From geology, morphology, embryology, metamorphosis, rudimentary organs, geographical distribution, etc. By NELSON C. PARSHALL.
13. EVOLUTION AS RELATED TO RELIGIOUS THOUGHT: The Unknowable; design; miracle. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
14. THE PHILOSOPHY OF EVOLUTION: Relation of the doctrine to prevailing philosophical systems. By STARR HOYT NICHOLS.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Pleasantries.

Cholly: "I told Miss Lenox that I was out of sight." Dick: "What did she say?" Cholly: "That I verified an old adage."—American.

Hackett (gloomily): "I tell you, Charlie, this is a hard, hard world." Sackett (interestedly): "So you have bought a bicycle, have you?"

An agent tried to sell a man an encyclopedia. The man said he did not want one, for he would not have the time to ride it. The Outlook.

"I saw my papa's last book before he wrote it," said Jimmieboy. "How did that happen?" asked the visitor. "It was a blank book then," said Jimmieboy.—Presbyterian.

Sammy: "Here's my new cart. Ain't she a beauty?" Tommy: "You mustn't say she. A cart's it." Sammy: "'Tain't. It's she." Tommy: "I'll leave it to Dick." Dick (inspecting it): "'Tain't either one. It's he. It's a mail cart."

A bright Chicago boy got an autograph album filled with signatures; but, as they lacked neatness and uniformity, he bought a new book, and copied all the names in it, according to copy-book rules. Now he is happy.—Selected.

Pompous Author (to veteran editor): "What would you advise a man to do whose ideas are in advance of the times?" Veteran Editor (promptly): "I would advise him to sit quietly down, and wait for the times to catch up."—Boston Home Journal.

An absent-minded young preacher in New England, wishing to address the young ladies of the congregation after the morning services, remarked from the pulpit that he would be very glad if the female brethren of the congregation would remain after they had gone home.—Standard.

A lady of New York,—where the horse-cars are still in fashion,—in speaking of the extent of the trolley system throughout the country, said, "Mr. Trolley must be a very rich man if he is interested in so many street-car lines." The laughter was taken good-naturedly, and the speaker explained that "trolley" to her mind was the same as Westinghouse, Wagner, and Pullman of steam railway fame.—American.

Two little folks, poring over Retzsch's outlines of Shakspeare, explain and expound as follows: "That's Romeo: that's Juliet. She says, 'Don't go!' He says, 'I must, I must go to my office!'" "This is a king. He's saying his prayers. [It is a picture of the king at prayer in Hamlet.] He says to the Father in heaven, 'Forgive me if I've vexed you.' He know she's not been very good. 'I don't know who that lady is in her night-gown. [Lady Macbeth.] She is rubbing her hand. She has a bad mosquito bite.'"—Exchange.

"Defuelization" is a new word added to the language, told in a story by Senator Palmer about an Illinois farmer who for several years had been selling him wood for $6 a cord. "This year," says Senator Palmer, "he came to me with a load, and I told him that I did not want it. He offered it at $2 a cord. I still refused, and he wanted to know why I would not take it at $2. I told him I was using soft coal, for which I paid $1.37 a ton. "Well," he exclaimed. "I heard you was trying to demonetize silver, but now you're trying to defuelize wood."—The Tribune.

TWO VERSIONS.

A young farmer who had great conceit, little discretion, and scarcely any education, presented himself at a Presbyterian conference, and said he wished to be ordained as a preacher.

"I ain't had any great learnin'," he said frankly; "but I reckon I'm called to preach. I've had a vision three nights runnin': that's why I'm here."

"What was your vision?" inquired one of the elders.

"Well," said the young man, "I dreamt I see a big, round ring in the sky; an' in the middle of it was two great letters,— 'P. C.'"

"I knew that meant 'Presbyterian Conference,' an' here I am."

There was an uncomfortable pause, which was broken by an elder who knew the young man, and was well acquainted with the poverty of his family and the neglected condition of the farm in which his father had taken such pride.

"I haven't any gift at reading visions," said the old man, gravely, as he rose from his seat; "but I'd like to put it to my young friend whether he doesn't think it's possible those two letters may have stood for 'Plant Corn?'"

Fortunately, this version was accepted by the applicant.—Youth's Companion.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,328.71

LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94

$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.

ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.

S. F. TRULL, Secretary.

WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM

DANVILLE, New York

Established in 1858.

A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P. O. Box 1873.

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON, EUROPEAN PLAN, J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every library and reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours.

The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,

50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sell

CHURCH CARPETS

at manufacturers' prices.

John H. Pray, Sons & Co.,

Wholesale and Retail CARPETS and UPHOLSTERY,

658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston.

Correspondence Solicited.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin.

BLAKE BELL CO.,

Boston, Mass.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

Chauncy-Hall School.

(Established in 1828.)

For Boys and Girls of all ages. Especial care for health and for individual needs. Thorough preparation for the Mass. Institute of Technology, for business and for college. Special students received into all regular classes. Chemistry and Physics are taught by laboratory work. Instruction is given in Sloyd. There is Military Drill for boys. Upper classes begin Sept. 18.

593 Boylston Street, Copley Square, Boston.

SCHOOL OF DOMESTIC SCIENCE AND CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

Courses for Teachers, Matrons, Home-makers, City Missionaries, Pastors' Assistants, Y. W. C. A. Secretaries, etc. Eighth year. Address for Circulars, Miss L. L. SHERMAN, Principal (Formerly Principal D. L. Moody's Training School), 52 Berkeley St., Boston, Mass. (B. Y. W. C. A.)

Mr. HALE'S SCHOOL 86 BEACON ST., BOSTON.

The 13th year will begin September 25. Preparation for Harvard College and the Institute of Technology. Full Classical and Scientific Courses. Primary department for young boys nine or ten years of age. Fine situation, directly opposite the Public Garden. Large, sunny, high-studded rooms, open fireplaces, gymnasium, extensive laboratories, covered fire-escape, lunch-room. Teachers: ALBERT HALE (Harv.), E. D. MARSH (Harv.), E. K. STEVENS (Harv.), C. S. STREET, Amherst. Address ALBERT HALE.

West Newton English and Classical School.

ALLEN BROTHERS.

Family School. Both Sexes. Unsectarian. Prepares for College, Scientific Schools, Business, and for a useful life. Forty-third year begins Wednesday, September 18. Catalogue of ALLEN BROTHERS, WEST NEWTON, MASS.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.

SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. R. THORPE, Principal.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE Springfield, Mass.

Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN McDUFFIE, Ph.D.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. Mrs. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

THE HIGHLAND MILITARY ACADEMY.

WORCESTER, MASS., begins 40th year September 11. Classical, Scientific, Business, Preparatory Departments. Gymnasium. Athletics encouraged. Careful training. Home influences. JOSEPH ALDEN SHAW, A.M., Head Master.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. Rev. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

THE MORGAN SCHOOL, PORTSMOUTH, N.H.

This Home and Day School for Girls will reopen September 25 for its second year under the new management. College, Preparatory, and Finishing Courses. Address for circular Miss GEORGINA S. WOODBURY, Principal.

THE JACOTOT SCHOOL.

A French and English Boarding and Day School for Girls.

No 11 West 86 St., New York.

Adjacent to Central Park. Mile. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals. Circulars on application.

Rev. and Mrs. John A. Bellows'

BOARDING AND DAY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS will begin its seventh year Sept. 18, 1895. Number of boarding pupils limited to eight. Address 91 DANFORTH STREET, PORTLAND, ME.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION

for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods; large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. R. W., Christian Register.

MRS. H. M. BROWN, 49 Oxford Street, Cambridge, wishes to take charge of two or three little girls. Instruction at home or at school. References: Rev. O. R. ELIOT, Boston; Prof. C. J. CHILS, Cambridge; Mrs. JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, Jamaica Plain.

A LADY with a pleasant home near Boston, and having the care of a young girl of thirteen, desires to communicate with parents or guardians who may be seeking a temporary or permanent home for one or more children. References exchanged. Address GUARDIAN, care Christian Register.

TO LET.

The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST. BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1895.

NUMBER 38.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes: The National Conference,	593
The Man and his Message: Mr. and Mrs. Put-off,	594
MUSINGS,	594
BREVITIES,	595
PRO AND CON.
In Aid of Armenia; The Free Pew System;
The Pilgrims and Puritans,	595
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
American History, by Rev. E. P. Powell; A
Notable Biography, by Rev. John W. Chad-	596
wick,
The Teachings of Jesus, by Rev. E. A. Coll;
The Tarpelin Rock for Evil-doers, by Rev.	597
Mary H. Graves,
Rev. William H. Bicknell; National Confer-	598
ence; American Unitarian Association,
The Armadillo as a Pet; The Friends we may	606
have; Tobacco and Lumber,
Village Improvement; Clay for Correspond-	607
ence,
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	597
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	599
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	599
THE PULPIT.
Be not Anxious, by Rev. Ernest C. Smith,	600
SERMON GLEANINGS.
The Development of Ethical Forces, by Rev.
T. T. Munger,	601
LITERATURE.
"The Chauncy Hall School,"	602
Magazines; Literary Notes; Books Received,	603
THE HOME.
Among the Thuringian Fairy-folk, by S. Alice	604
Ranlett; A Fight with Gravitation,	604
The Old Clock; Hospital Dolls,	605
POETRY.
"Dei Gratia," by Mrs. E. C. Whitney,	596
Consummation, by T. H. F.,	600
The Reformer,	601
Lost and Found,	604
SPIRIT OF THE PRESS,	606
TEMPERANCE,	606
CHARITIES AND REFORMS,	606
EDUCATION,	607
SCIENCE,	607
HERE AND THERE,	607
PLEASANTRIES,	608

Editorial.

DESPATCHES from London received through the Daily News, by way of Kars, report that fresh outrages have been perpetrated in the Erzenian district in Armenia: "A band of brigands attacked on August 12 a company of Turkish gendarmes, killing a sergeant. The Turkish authorities, without making any inquiry, decided that the assailants were Armenian revolutionaries from Kemakh, who intended to release prominent Armenians, who are still in prison at Kars. A force of one thousand Turkish troops was sent to Kemakh, and five villages were pillaged. Five thousand persons were rendered homeless. Men were tortured, and women and children assaulted. Four monasteries were sacked." This is but another terrible chapter in the long record of Turkish atrocities in Armenia, and the end is not yet. Diplomacy is slow, and the Turkish government is either misleading or evasive. Unless the Armenian question is settled soon, under the Turkish policy of extermination there will be very little left of it to be settled. The pretext of Armenian rebellion will always serve for new slaughter, unless England and the powers are able to stay with a strong hand the Turkish arm.

THE danger has been that the Armenian agitation in this country and in England would stop before something positive had been accomplished by it. Our own government certainly could not do less than it has done in this matter: whether it could not have done more is another question. It has communicated to the Turkish government the expression of American public sentiment in regard to these outrages, but the moral force of these protests is much weakened by the utter want of backbone of the American minister at Constantinople. Some months before Mr. Gresham's death Mr. Terrell had lost the confidence of the State department, as he has since lost the confidence of the country. If President Cleveland cannot take the active part in the Armenian question that is taken by the English cabinet, he can strengthen the moral attitude of this country immensely by sending to Constantinople a man who is in some way fitted to represent it. We may send to Turkey reams of protests from the American people; but they will have very little effect on the sultan or his advisers, so long as we have a man at the Turkish court who treats the whole matter with a wink of indifference, or who is more concerned in establishing the Turkish view of the case than our own.

THE chronic grumblers about ministerial vacations overlook the fact that the minister who leaves a city church for a summer outing often preaches to thrice as many people while away as he could preach to if he stayed at home. We do not think it a good plan for ministers to preach much during vacation, when they have gone off for a rest; but, wise or unwise, a good many city ministers do preach, and to audiences of good size. The summer watering-places certainly have their religious needs, and missionary work can be done as effectively there as in the deserted brown-stone wildernesses of the city. The populous districts should, of course, never be abandoned, and the poor should never be deprived of opportunities for worship and for hearing the gospel; but the rich man needs to be saved as well as Lazarus, and it is possible that the gospel writer, when he described him in hell, was thinking of some fashionable summer resort. In Boston the Unitarian churches have joined for a number of years in having a union service on the Back Bay; and this summer a Sunday afternoon service has been maintained on the Common, in which rich and poor, without the necessity of discussing the pew question, could join together in a worship both filial and fraternal.

A WAVE of excitement has swept over a Methodist church in Chicago. It is reported that the pastor received a blessing from the papal ablegate, Mgr. Satolli, in the name of the pope, at a service at the Convent of the Sacred Heart, to which the minister had been invited. The deacons of the church were at once informed of this occurrence, and "lost no time in calling upon the pastor and demanding an explanation." The report adds that it was "a decidedly stormy interview," and that the pastor "did not know which way to turn to escape the cross-fire of scathing questions which were hurled at him from all directions." It is pompously added that "the trustees of the church will institute a thorough investigation." We are unable to understand why this episode should have occasioned so much excitement. The Methodist pastor, out of personal curiosity, went with a lady who had formerly been a Catholic to see this ceremony, and to see one of the great leaders of the Catholic Church. It does not appear in the report whether the blessing he received was one bestowed upon the whole congregation or a special blessing for himself. If he received it as a member of the congregation, the interesting question will arise whether a blessing bestowed on a congregation is to be divided up fractionally among the members, like a communion loaf, or whether every member is capable of appropriating the whole of it.

But, even if the Methodist pastor received a concentrated special blessing in the name of the pope, we do not see why his deacons should roast him on a gridiron. That sort of persecution ought to be left to the A. P. A.

WE do not see how these Chicago trustees can arraign their pastor without assigning more importance to a papal benediction than Methodists are accustomed to do. The Methodist priesthood constitutes one hierarchy, the Roman Catholic priesthood another; and both of them are sufficiently rigid. Theoretically, no official act of a Methodist minister is recognized as authoritative in the Catholic Church, and no official act of a Roman Catholic priest has any authority in a Methodist church. To prosecute a Methodist minister for receiving a papal benediction is an implied recognition of the validity of the blessing. Such an implication will bring down upon the Methodists the hot indignation of the A. P. A., who, if they are determined to uproot ecclesiasticism in the United States, may well take the Methodist Church in hand. We suspect, however, that there are sensible Methodists who will see in this action of the papal ablegate an illustration of Christian courtesy which found its proper response in the courtesy of the Methodist minister. The generous blessing of any good man or woman, whether pope, priest, or layman, is something to be received with respect and gratitude; and we do not know why this Methodist minister should not have reciprocated the courtesy of Mgr. Satolli by blessing him in turn. Blessing is better than cursing, and we are free to confess that we would much rather receive the benediction of the pope than the maledictions of the A. P. A.

ONE of the most significant and interesting indications of the changed position of women in our day is seen in the new relations into which they have entered in the Presbyterian Church in the United States. This Church has been one of the most conservative in doctrine and in practice, and this conservatism has been manifested distinctly in the restraint imposed upon women in religious services. "Let women keep silence in the churches" and "Suffer not a woman to teach" were the awful injunctions which the Presbyterian Church respected as truly as it did the Calvinistic interpretations of Pauline theology. But now the Calvinistic theology is losing its hold, and so is the Pauline conception of the place of women in the Church. In a recent sermon Rev. Dr. D. B. Greigg, pastor of the Twelfth Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, said: "You may see the advance of woman in the Presbyterian Church. What a change has developed there! Within the last twenty-five years women have taken their places as coworkers with men in all religious activity, in public addresses, in preparing and presenting reports, in leading congregations in praise and at the throne of grace. The women of the Presbyterian Church have developed amazing powers of leadership. Drop into an Endeavor service, and, if you are a philosopher, you will reflect upon the strange feature of young women leading devotions, speaking and praying in an old-fashioned Presbyterian congregation. If you are a cynic or inclined to old-fogyism, you will hold up your hands in holy horror, and turn away, muttering that present days are not like the old days, and that the Church is going to ruin. Dismiss your fears. Presbyterians are only going back to the old customs of the primitive church, and he would be a rash man indeed who would venture to prove that this advanced step upon the part of woman is contrary to proper teaching. The woman of to-day is born to an inheritance of power and privilege such as her ancestors never dreamed of."

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches will hold its sixteenth session at Washington, D.C., beginning Monday evening, October 21.

If one who is becoming a veteran in the service of the Conference can judge by the indications, the Conference will be one of the largest and strongest ever held. The result at Saratoga not only surprised and pleased those who were present at that eventful meeting, but also inspired confidence in lovers of our cause throughout the country. A new interest has been awakened. Hope, expectation, and enthusiasm have taken the place in many cases of doubt and apprehension. We hear less than ever before from within and without of the cry that the day of Unitarianism has gone by.

The programme which has been made will certainly interest our people. Great subjects will be treated. The difficulty is that the week will be so crowded with rich food for mind and heart that the delegates will be unable to take all the courses. Washington is very accessible for those who come from regions west of the Hudson River; and it is probable that a large Western delegation will take this opportunity to visit the beautiful city, which is the capital of the country, and to make the acquaintance of Unitarians from the East. Eastern Unitarians who have been accustomed to social recognition and numbers sufficient to prevent loneliness know little of the surprise and pleasure of one who has always lived where Unitarians were regarded as peculiar phenomena both in the church and in society, and not too numerous at that, when they see them assembled in a multitude. At once their self-respect is increased. The cause assumes larger proportions. They take courage, seeing that something has been done which may be done again in other parts of the country. Apathy is the one thing to be dreaded. We have no enemy more destructive than indifference. Unless all signs fail, the coming meeting at Washington will be preceded by a period of expectation and hope, and will be followed by an advance all along the line. The Unitarian Association stands ready to do any amount of work when the churches are ready to stand by it. A little active interest, a little knowledge increased on the part of all the men and women of our parishes, more willingness to give, and an increased desire to work, a purpose to have something done by our churches which shall be of national importance, would instantly change the aspect of affairs and make our Church more than ever a conspicuous factor in the advance of civilization and religion in the United States.

This meeting ought to have many attractions for our friends who are scattered throughout the South. Some of the most intelligent men and women, representing the best sentiment of that part of the country, —the new South,—which is so rapidly becoming a powerful factor in the national life, would find themselves greatly helped and strengthened by meeting at Washington representatives of Unitarianism from all parts of the country.

The churches everywhere should actively co-operate with their ministers in securing a full representation at this meeting. No church can afford to allow its minister to be absent merely because he cannot afford the expense. If the church can afford it, and he cannot, let him go as a delegate, expenses paid. Let no rich church fail of a delegation because wealthy people do not volunteer to go. There are always men and women of the finest intelligence and spiritual quality who are available for such service, although it does not always happen they have full purses. It should be honorable to them and to their church if they were appointed and their expenses paid whenever it is necessary to secure a representation. The minister or lay delegate who attended the Saratoga Conference and did not return more like "bottled sunshine" than he went must have failed to catch the spirit of that eventful meeting.

The Unitarian Church in America during the last thirty years has come into something like a coherent organization. It has provided for its purpose machinery enough of every kind. When complaint is made that the machinery does not work efficiently, it would be well to remember that, given a decent organization and a reasonable amount of machinery, the entire condition of effective work is not more machinery, but power. An animated interest in the best things in American life, a spirit of devotion to the highest interests of the republic poured through the channels of moral and religious activity, are always the result of a National Conference. From the Unitarian Association to the smallest guild or club in the country there is no organization which would not show increased activity if there were a rising tide of spiritual power in all the churches. In the changed conditions of American life we can no longer trust to the social and religious conditions which formerly were so favorable to the production of literature and the growth of strong churches manned by great men. The home life, the compact social organization, and the close, friendly intercourse of the old times have passed away. The men and women who represent the Unitarian thought and life are scattered over the United States. To make themselves felt now, they must draw together, combine their forces, and stimulate one another by the interchange of thought, the cultivation of friendship, and by co-operation in planning great things for the common good.

There has been no time in the history of our Church when, with so little difference of opinion among ourselves and with so little adverse criticism from without, we could define our purpose, state our object, and summon our forces to undertake important work for mutual benefit and the common good. In literature, in the life of our churches, in the spread of truth, in the establishment of new centres of influence, in the proclamation of a simple gospel freed from injurious traditions and adapted to the free movements of life and progress in our time, we have now an open course. If we may trust what appear to be evident signs of the time, the men and women of our churches will show their faith by their works, and make the meeting at Washington, with what comes after, memorable in our history.

GEORGE BATCHELOR,
Chairman of the Council.

THE MAN AND HIS MESSAGE.

In the old-fashioned preacher the man was sometimes lost in the minister. There was a saintliness which did not belong to this world. There was a professional aspect to the minister's message which gave it a certain conventional authority. But we are coming to feel more and more to-day that the message of the minister must be re-enforced by the power and spirit of the man. Unless the man is in the message to-day, professional tone, garb, cant, will not carry it.

There has just passed away at Plymouth a venerable saint of the Unitarian household, Rev. George W. Briggs, D.D., who was a marked example of the inspiration which a man may receive from his message, and of the weight and impulse which the message may receive from the man. Dr. Briggs always preached as if he himself had been enkindled by that which he was uttering; and, as a consequence, he did not fail to kindle his audience. His success was not the result of the studied arts of the orator. It could not be separated from the character of the man. There was no doubt that he was born to be a preacher. His message was clear, but not cold. His heart beat in his brain. There was always a body of thought to his sermons, but they were warmed by sentiment and vitalized by conviction. Dr. Briggs was as far from being a mechanical preacher as one can imagine. There are men who deliver the gospel message as if a phonograph were speaking in a manikin. It needs something more than lung power to sound the gospel trumpet. The genuine power of the preacher remained with Dr. Briggs clear into his old age. His moral and spiritual vigor always impressed one more than his physical infirmity.

A man who threw himself so completely into his message could not himself fail to be a welcome messenger to his people, could not fail to be pastor as well as preacher. So it was that he formed the most endearing and the most lasting attachments with his people. Though he moved from one parish to another after long intervals of service, he always carried with him friendships which could not be broken, and left behind him fragrant memorials of a sacred ministry. His heart was so warm, his sympathy so fluent and tender, his words of consolation so rich and soothing, that his message to the house of sorrow came like a tender benediction. And, then, his spirit was so young and joyous and bright and winning that it diffused sunshine in the social circle.

Dr. Briggs kept step with his own time. Though his life was long, fourscore and five years, it did not merely become a memory of things that had been. He easily adjusted himself to new and advanced thought. He was in sympathy with the young men of his day; and they easily found themselves in sympathy with him.

If it is painful to see one lose an interest in his chosen profession and dropping out of sympathy or relation with it, it is gratifying and reassuring to those who enter it to find a man maintaining for more than fourscore years an interest in the holy offices of the ministry and a joy in fulfilling the functions of the preacher. Only as a man really loves to preach will people love to hear him. Very seldom of late years did Dr. Briggs appear before his people; but, when he did, the fulfilment of his own beautiful life seemed to give the fulfilment to his message. Without seeking to follow widely the path of authorship or activity outside of his profession, he showed how much a man can make of the ministry when he stays within it, and how much, also, the ministry can make of one who is devoted to its service.

MR. AND MRS. PUT-OFF.

This is not a family of Russian extraction, although the name has a Slavic termination. They have branches in every race under the sun. In America we are inclined to question their existence as native born, but we really cannot hide the fact that there are Put-offs in our own stock. They are far from an easy-go-easy sort of people, are just as fidgety as the rest of us, but lack the power of prompt execution. The result is that at home, in doors and out, they are always at sixes and sevens. "Time enough ahead! Time enough ahead!" is Mr. Put-off's favorite maxim; and all the young Put-offs believe, with all their souls, that "haste makes waste." "There is a great deal often accomplished by waiting," says Mrs. Put-off. So the whole of them wait for something to turn up; but corn and wheat will not turn up unless sowed in time, and, while you wait on sowing, the reaping waits on you. The curious thing is that the Put-offs keep on sowing,—about a month too late; and they cut fodder when they should have had fine grain. The wonder is they do not get discouraged, but they manage just to keep soul and body together.

It is utterly useless to expect to make money or a living from neglected trees, vines, and crops. The only sure plan for keeping up with the seasons is to keep a little ahead of the seasons. Then, if spring comes in two weeks sooner than you expected, you are ready to move on with it. There is no room for an old stump or a pile of brush or a stone heap on a decent place. Every unsightly object occupies the room that belongs to something valuable. Keep a memorandum in your pocket; note in it every broken limb, every loose fence board, every stump, and whatever else is to be done, and then you will not forget it. Mr. Put-off says this is all true,—that he really intends to keep suckers off his trees, and to prune away dead limbs; but he doesn't get at it. Over the way Mr. and Mrs. Get-up-and-Get live, and they are always urging their neighbors by example and precept. "Winter," says Mr. G., "is the farmer's friend. It gives him a chance to get ahead of his work." Mr. G. is often out in his orchard in winter, pruning or clearing, when the snow is six inches deep. "One day now," he says, "is as good as a day in spring; and a day's work now takes so much off the pressure and hurry of the spring."

These two families illustrate the difference between success and failure in farm life. Whoever tries to invent better methods, better tools, and to originate better fruits and larger crops, has no complaint to make of agriculture as a failure. Mr. G. picks bushels of grapes off his barns and outbuildings; and he always finds room for a new sort of grape, and time to set it. Mr. Put-off never finds time to set or get a new bush or vine, and then he has no room to plant it in. You would hardly believe this if you saw how much land he has that does not pay him ten dollars an acre. Only when a tree agent comes about, with a lot of lying pictures and tremendous novelties to sell at extortionate prices, Mr. Put-off invests. He does it because he can put off paying until delivery.

You should see Mr. Put-off's plum-trees! They are a mass of black knot, which he intends to cut out and burn; but he puts off the doing of it until the trees are spoiled. At last the law interferes, and compels him to do some pruning. His apple orchard is littered with dead limbs that blew off a year ago. Along the roadside are trees that are broken and spoiled by neglect. He intended to get at these things; but somehow things get behind hand, and always stay there. He never did quite catch up, and he never will.

A dead tree is a thief. A pile of rubbish is where a few hills of food ought to grow. A nest of worms will subtract a dollar or more from your pocket-book. In all the list of enemies, animal and vegetable, that assails us, there is not one single put-off. They are all ready to take advantage of the climate and the seasons.

Mrs. Put-off's house has a hundred plans of work and jobs to be done, "when she gets round to it"; but she never will get around to one-tenth of them, as she has no system for execution. The worst thing is, however, that it will not do to urge her on or in any way hurry her. It "breaks her all up," and she can do nothing at all. The best thing to be done is to let her alone and not criticise. Mr. Put-off is slightly different; for, if you hurry him, he slights his work, and nothing is done as it should be. It is a capital thing that these people married each other, for now they do not care because things are at odds and evens.

No man or woman has a right to indulge in habits that disorder a household, throw out of time the fulfilment of duties, and lead children to consider it an unimportant matter whether they are exact in obedience to obligations or are not. It should be the first law of every home to know the worth of minutes, to be punctual, exact, and sure. This both parents are responsible for. There can be no compensation for disorder, and irregularity. The only seeming compensation is the liberty to put off what ought to be done at once. There are few social laws of a purely economical sort laid down in the Bible; but this very excellent one is there, "Put not off till to-morrow what ought to be done to-day."

Musings.

I HAD no expectation last week of going abroad so soon again. But I find myself once more, by sudden and mysterious transportation, outside the jurisdiction of the United States. The transition has been so rapid that I have to stop and ask myself how I happen to be just where I am. Next to a pen there is no instrument I am fonder of wielding than an axe. It was a matter of regret not to find an axe in the Shay-back camp, as I came home from Europe. Camp without an axe is like home without a mother, and I had a sort of half-orphan feeling when I went into the timber. Not that I ever want to commit tree-murder. There is too much arboricide now; and it ought to be punished by decapitation,—that is, by taking the head off the axe-handle. But, when I find in the woods monarchs of the forest laid low by some destructive wind, or standing dead on the stump, or when the grove needs to be thinned and the wood-box needs to be filled, I am ready to pick up the axe that lies at the foot of the tree. So, as I walked by a Boston hardware store last week, I suddenly wheeled about, entered, and asked for an axe. I had been reading lately a Greek version of the familiar fable of the poor man who lost his axe in a river. A lovely angel came to help him, and, diving into the stream, brought up first a gold and then a silver axe to test the man's honesty. He disclaimed the ownership of both, and acknowledged only the axe he had dropped into the stream; and the good angel rewarded him by giving him all three. When, therefore, the storekeeper brought me an axe with a golden head, I thought of the fable, and wondered if he would bring a silver one if I declined this, and end by bringing me a steel one, throwing the others into the bargain to reward the honesty of my bearing. On the contrary, he told me it was the only axe he had left, and offered to sell it just as cheap as if he had fifty others. Would it be honest, I asked myself, to take a golden-headed axe at this price? However, as I like to do business on a gold basis, I gave the man four pieces of silver, the equivalent of one dollar, and left.

No SOONER had I come into possession of this instrument than I longed to put it to use. I carried it through Washington Street, and down Franklin, hoping to discover some dead tree left by the old settlers. It would have been a labor of love to cut down a dozen telegraph-poles. They constitute a dangerous disfigurement to the city; and, if one could bring down at the same time the telegraph and the telephone rate, it would be a double benefaction. But was this axe legally sufficient to attack these corporations? and, if it be true that corporations have no souls, could a man be arrested for murder if he killed one? To have gone within half a mile of the Common with an axe would have exposed me to the suspicion of tree-slaughtering. I made a detour around the Post-office, and then started to find a North End lodging-house, wisely determining to do my cutting and slashing only when and where it would be perfectly safe. I found a lodging-house on Causeway Street. It was kept by a man named Pullman, who employed a colored man as chambermaid. As I had no prejudice in regard to color, I engaged a bed. The place was clean and well kept, but an excess of oil lamps made it fearfully hot. It was indeed one of the hottest days of the season,—last Wednesday, September 11. I went to bed early, and, to satisfy the keeper that I was commercially sound, paid for my lodging in advance. I noticed before I turned in that I was to sleep in a trundle-bed,—an experience that was common when I was a boy, and which had the charm of early associations. I was not fairly settled in bed before I felt the wheels of my bedstead roll a little. The bed moved several feet. It kept on moving. "Oh, yes," I said: "the colored man is pulling my bed out into the yard where I can get a little more air. Much obliged to you. Only don't pull her into the water"; for I had a vague feeling that the Mystic River flowed somewhere around the north side of the lodging-house. The rumble increased: the bed began to rock. It bumped and swayed: the speed accelerated. I raised the curtain, and looked out of the window. Houses and trees were flying by at the rate of thirty miles an hour. Then the truth dawned over me. Some one had hitched a locomotive to my trundle-bed, and we were plunging into the night. But the discovery created no alarm: locomotives I have found to be among the most docile and friendly creatures, and their impulses controlled by intelligence and judgment. I took two or three short naps,—about ten or twenty miles each,—and then settled down to a long, two-hundred mile sleep, punctuated only by those attempts at self-recovery which come when the trundle-bed comes to a dead stop, and you are half aroused by the utter noiselessness of your position. You miss the soothing rock and rattle, the snort of the engine, the rumble of the wheels, and are threatened with consciousness. The engine starts again, and you are off. It was not till the lapse of nine hours that the colored masculine chambermaid called me, and said, "Newport!" "What Newport?" "Newport, Vt." I rose, jumped into my clothes, seized my gilded axe, silvered the palm of the colored man, and stepped out on the platform at five in the morning to find "The Lady of the Lake" tethered at the wharf. There was no frog pond here, and this was not Boston Common. Twelve miles away I could see Owl's Head, with a cloudy night-cap. "Yes," I said, "this is the lake; but the lady I want to see is twenty miles away."

I took the boat, and a few hours after entered the Shayback camp by the back door. The front door is the lake. The back door is the charming path through the maples, leading from the Georgeville road. The Shayback camp at Birch Bay is now a nunnery. A few weeks ago there were thirty people here,—a flock of girls and a whole drove of boys. Now the boys have gone; and the men, lawyers, preachers, editors, engineers, architects, bankers, and students, have left, too. Mrs. Shayback, the quartermaster, chief cook, doctor, judge, admiral, and general benediction, has also gone. In fact, twenty-six people have gone; and only four maidens are left. This is why Birch Bay has become a convent. I whistled the camp whistle as I came down to the cabin. The rules of the order did not prevent the nuns from giving the old comer a warm welcome; for, underneath the secular garb, they recognized the hermit of Birch Bay. They were taken by surprise; but, after the hermit had made himself useful by chopping wood and washing dishes, they admitted that it was a good thing to have a man around. The "Hermitage" was all ready for him, and he was ready for the "Hermitage." The gilded axe was soon ringing in the woods, and the oars were dipping in the lake; and I was not sorry that some one had hitched a locomotive to my trundle-bed.

It is not easy to get used to the present silence of Birch Bay. To some people five seems a good-sized family, and in their early years at Birch Bay the Shayback camp sometimes did not number more. But of late years it has grown to twenty-five and thirty. Little barefooted boys and girls with pig-tails down their backs are pretty thick. A camp boy is an invaluable and irrepressible form of motion, and a camp girl an inestimable provocation to mischief and mirth. One end of the camp table we call "Bedlam"; but "Bedlam" now is absolutely silent. Every day at noon in August the bay looks as if a score of young dolphins were splashing and diving; but now the raft is deserted, and the noon spectacle is wanting. The hermit of Birch Bay has taken a lonely dive into the clear waters, but his individual splash creates no great commotion. An ominous silence reigns at Birch Bay, but the loons have come back to supply scream and laughter. They find no fault with this brooding silence: they can easily break it themselves. So yesterday three of them swam defiantly but a few rods from the point, and made the air ring long and loud with their satirical laughter. The north winds came down, too, to greet the hermit. When he left Boston, the thermometer was up in the eighties. Within twenty-four hours after he had reached the lake, it had dropped to forty-two degrees, and on Sunday last at seven in the morning was thirty-six. But it only made the axe ring in the woods and the birch logs crackle on the cabin fire. On Sunday the hermit preached in the cabin to an audience of six, two more hearers coming from across the brook. Mizippi deftly played the camp melodeon; and the nuns kept awake by holding a session of the Birch Bay Dorcas Club, and devotedly stitching and weaving baskets, as Dorcas did, undoubtedly, when she went to hear Peter preach. A display of birch-bark products was held and admired after the service: they are all for the heathen. And then the hermit went out on the raft, and, like Saint Anthony, went down and preached to the fishes in his bathing suit. The sunset came to greet the hermit, too,—a magnificent display of glorified color wrought on a background of cloud. In all my travels this summer I have seen nothing so fine. It was a wonderful issue of free gold; but the free silver man had his turn, too, for at nine o'clock at night there was a brilliant display of the aurora. The whole northern sky shone as with electrified silver. Surely, the heavens did their best to welcome the hermit. The autumnal tints are only just beginning to spread over the trees. In ten days they will be all aflame.

Mrs. SHAYBACK is famous as a cook. But what about the refectory at the nunnery? It was ample, varied, experimental, and conclusive. A whole library of cook-books lay round in the kitchen tent, and were consulted like sacred oracles. The gastronomic reputation of the place was well sustained. There were surprises, too. I did not know that such fine charcoal apple-sauce could be made by judicious neglect, and I had no idea that such excellent griddle-cakes could be made out of caoutchouc. Two or three of these cakes sewed together would make a good overshoe.

FIVE days of delightful rest at Birch Bay, and then the hermit folded his tent, like the Arabs, and silently stole away, leaving the nuns in possession of the lake and the forest, the sky, the sunset, and the glinting aurora.

Brevities.

Pack your Saratoga trunk in a few weeks, but label it for "Washington."

Most of our city ministers are already in the harness again. Let the deacons see that the wheels are well oiled.

Read the particulars about transportation to the National Conference on our sixth page, and then secure your ticket.

"On to Washington!" Let the capital be taken, and then let the fire kindled at the National Conference spread over the country.

Dr. Hawthorne, a Baptist minister in the South, has come out against women bicyclers. He is probably afraid that the women will ride over him.

"The model layman,—who is he?" asks a writer in the Central Christian Advocate. We know, and we suspect that there are few ministers who do not know him.

Rev. M. J. Savage will be welcomed back to his pulpit at Unity Church, Boston, next Sunday; and, undoubtedly, the pews will receive a welcome from the pulpit.

In the quotation from Shakspeare in Miss Channing's article last week on "The Song of Suffering," "Bassanio" should have been "Bezonian," meaning a beggar or needy person.

"Are you a radical or conservative?" a flippant young reporter once asked the late Rev. Dr. George W. Briggs. Dr. Briggs smiled compassionately on the young man who had but two labels for everybody, and said, "Both."

The faithful organist and choir-leader spends a good deal of valuable time in selecting good music. A Boston organist who passed away but recently was unusually wise and conscientious in his selections. The collection is now offered for sale, and the catalogue may be seen at this office.

It is unfortunate that the yacht race between the "Defender" and the "Valkyrie" ended as it did. An international contest which develops a generous rivalry may be followed with useful results in boat-building, seamanship, or any other art; but, when the contest simply develops a narrow patriotism on either side, it may as well be suspended.

Who shall say that Catholics are not marching with the nineteenth century? The Catholic University of Washington has just opened its doors to women. This is a notable step. It has also called Col. Carroll D. Wright to the chair of economics in that institution. Col. Wright has accepted. This does not mean that Col. Wright has become a Roman Catholic or that the Catholic University has become Unitarian. It means that economics can be taught without religious dogma. There are Protestant institutions in this country where no Unitarian would be admitted to the teaching faculty.

The Boston Herald, in speaking of the appointment of Col. Wright to teach economics in the Washington Catholic University, says: "Col. Wright is a Unitarian; but it may be believed that, in teaching economics, he will not trouble the Roman Catholic youth with his religious views, and they will be sure to receive a better all-round economic education than could be given by any one else in this country. He has had exceptional opportunities to fit him for such a position, and his appointment will do much to show that Bishop Keane intends to make this institution one of our leading universities."

The Boston Herald thus speaks of what it terms the snubbing of Dr. Briggs: "The refusal to allow Dr. Briggs to speak on Christian unity at a meeting of St. Andrew's Brotherhood, soon to be held in Louisville, Ky., because he is a Presbyterian clergyman under censure for too free teaching concerning the Bible, will be variously interpreted; but it is to be regretted for many reasons. While it is true that Dr. Briggs is under censure, it is also true that he is one of the strongest advocates of Christian unity in the whole country. . . . It is small business to treat a strong man this way."

Pro and Con.

IN AID OF ARMENIA.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

At the request of numerous citizens, we, the undersigned, have allowed the use of our names as a committee to take charge of funds intrusted to our care for the speedy relief of the distressed survivors in the Sassoun district of Armenia.

We shall remit such funds through the proper channels to responsible persons known to us, on the field. Money can be sent to either of the undersigned or to Frank H. Wiggin, 1 Somerset Street, or to Messrs. Brown Brothers & Co., 50 State Street; Edward G. Porter, Beaumont Street, Dorchester; Martin Brimmer, 47 Beacon Street, Boston; Mortimer B. Mason, 220 Devonshire Street, Boston; Henry L. Higginson, 44 State Street, Boston; Hagop Bogigian, 22 Beacon Street, Boston.

THE FREE PEW SYSTEM.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

I am very much interested in the discussion of the free pew system. It seems to me a mistake, however, to make the question at issue whether pews should be rented or free, and to suppose that by this discussion the whole problem of church finances is covered. Whether pews should be rented or free is primarily a question of ethics. If it is decided that it is not right to rent pews because this system lacks ethical beauty, an argument to the effect that a church cannot pay its bills under a system of free pews does not prove that the pew-renting system is ethically right. If the pew-renting system is ethically wrong and the free pew and subscription plan is a financial failure, we are compelled to seek some new plan that will make the church a financial success and at the same time allow the church to do that which is ethically right in the distribution of its pews.

In my judgment the pew-renting system is unjust and ungentlemanly. Equal rights exist in a church as well as in a State. Distinctions based on ability to supply the church treasury with money disregard the common humanity of each church member and break the ideal of social democracy which should reign in the church. This system is ungentlemanly because it is not an expression of the highest type of kindness. Perfection of love does not allow the church to serve the man of wealth with a good seat and the man of poverty with a poor seat. I most heartily agree with "Layman" that the subscription plan is virtually the same as the pew-renting system. The man who pays five dollars is a charity to the man who pays five hundred. Both men receive from the church the same service, and the large contributor pays for part of the service which the church renders to the small contributor. To receive alms is detrimental to the manliness of the recipient, and to give alms too often produces a feeling of superiority in the giver. Social democracy cannot exist under the subscription system; and the system is wrong, not because it fails to make the church a financial success (which is usually the case), but because it does not put the church in the condition best fitted for the development of the highest ethical character in its members.

The churches need a system that is ethically sound, that allows the members to fulfil the ideals of social democracy, and at the same time makes it possible for them to be a financial success.

I believe that the churches are becoming more and more educational institutions, and that they are to fulfil more and more in their communities the functions of social educators, their fields of instruction being especially ethics and religion. The church members are to become students of ethics and religion. The relationship which the student has to his college is the relationship which the church member should have to his church. The financial system which the colleges have developed is the system which the churches will find themselves compelled to adopt. Part of the running expenses will be met by the payment of a certain stipulated sum by each member of the church. Some system of scholarships may be developed to supply the needs of those who cannot pay this required tuition to the church. The additional sum above that received from the church tuitions will need to be made up by an income accumulating from an endowment. Of course, each member of the church will be receiving alms from the endowment, and to this extent will be getting more than he pays for; but the gift which comes from an endowment is impersonal and not degrading, especially when the gift is in common and the members all share alike in the gift. Under the endowment and tuition system the members of the church would be left free to fulfil the ideals of social democracy. This system is ethically sound, and I believe also financially sound.

There was good reason for the subscription system under the older type of Church,—that type which is now the orthodox Church,—because that Church was and is a propagandist institution. Each subscription is made for the sake of having the gospel preached to the unsaved. The great motive of this Church is the salvation of men by means of convincing them of certain religious doctrines. The Unitarian Church has taken the scientific position in religion. It is not a propagandist institution, but an educational one. It teaches the two sciences, ethics and religion. The members are church students, and should share alike in the opportunities of the church, and be required to share alike the financial support of the church. The deficiency should be made up by endowment,—a form of subscription that is impersonal and not debasing and not destructive of the ideals of social democracy. It seems to me that the members should have regular seats, because this helps to regular attendance and thoughtfulness. E. M. FAIRCHILD.

THE PILGRIMS AND PURITANS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Will you kindly allow me a little space in the Register to ask the writer of the article published in this week's issue, entitled "Look beneath the Surface," what "history" he refers to as his authority when he says that "among the Plymouth Pilgrims only church members were allowed to vote in civil affairs or to be chosen town officers?" As a lineal descendant of John and Priscilla Alden, I have tried to keep informed of the events, characteristics, and all that of the early settlers at Plymouth; and I was indeed surprised to meet with the above statement.

So careful, reliable, and conscientious a writer as Mr. J. A. Goodwin, who compiled "The Pilgrim Republic,"* on page 1 of that valuable work says, "They did not restrict voting or office-holding to their church members." On page 160 he says, "The whole male population, in town meeting assembled, attended to all questions of public interest, generally making reference of each case to the governor and council."

These quotations refer to the years 1620-1621. "In 1636," Mr. Goodwin, page 414, says, "None but freemen could vote in the General Court of Election." Page 405, he says, "It was subsequently provided that voters not freemen must have a freehold worth £20." Nothing here is said about church members. On page 415, describing affairs at the "Bay"—Massachusetts—and "at New Haven, 1636," Mr. Goodwin says, "Only church members were entitled to vote." No such restriction was ever adopted in Plymouth or Connecticut. But I fear to trespass on your patience with further quotations. Enough has already been shown to indicate to your readers that in this, as well as in other matters,—historical,—it is well to "look beneath the surface." The fact is, the men who composed the company at Plymouth—"Mayflower" people—were Separatists, not "Puritans," like those who settled Boston and Salem; and tradition, not history, has so often confounded them that it has been easy to charge the illiberality of the latter upon the former. Hence the unguarded remark of the writer whom I desire to correct. E. A.

*THE PILGRIM REPUBLIC. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

For the Christian Register.

"DEI GRATIA."

BY MRS. E. C. WHITNEY.

Spirit of Holiness, oh, breathe
Within mine ear that wondrous key
That tunes life's friction to a chord
Of softest, sweetest harmony.

When earthly tumult mars the soul's
Serenity, and sweet peace wanes,
Life's "angry babble" sinks to rest
When Thou dost strike those mystic strains.

Is it the chord once lost, that ear
Of mortals now must seek above?
The key that makes a holy chime
Of earthly turmoil, child, is—Love!

AMERICAN HISTORY.

BY REV. E. P. POWELL.

It is a pleasant as well as fortunate event that, while Napoleonism is having its revival in literature, the making of America and the establishment of federalism is having a greater revival. Up to a recent date we had but two great histories,—Bancroft's and Hildreth's. We have had added to these recently Parkman's admirable histories of the North-west, summed up in "A Half-century of Conflict," Fiske's monographs, which are living pictures of the past, Johnston's most useful handbooks, Winsor's "Columbus" and monumental "Narrative History of America,"—a marvellous work in detail,—forty volumes of material by Hubert Bancroft on "The Pacific Coast States and Tribes," a large number of brilliant monographs, like that of Weedon's "Economic Story of New England," and Brown's "Genesis of the United States." But these do not more than open the list. A full library of works on constitutional history could be collected by itself. The best of these are Von Holst's "Constitutional Law of the United States" and Landon's "Lectures on the Constitutional History and Government of the United States." Taylor's unfinished work on "The Origin and Growth of the English Constitution" is a noble testimony to American scholarship. Other monographs of value covering special eras are not lacking. Of these the "American Statesman Series" has probably done the most to popularize American history. Some of the volumes in this series are of the highest rank as history; others are not. But, by all odds, the greatest work of this kind is "The History of the Administrations of Madison and Jefferson," by Henry Adams. Written from a New England standpoint, or, rather, an Adams standpoint, this is nevertheless a perfect thesaurus of authorities,—a most painstaking work; and, while not just to Thomas Jefferson or Madison, and somewhat out of sympathy with both, it is one of the few works in history that an American may point to with pride. Of outline histories we have had two uniquely good,—Johnston's and Sheldon's,—the latter constructed of contemporary documents, a plan sure to be of great value to young pupils. But Dr. Andrews has now added a third, which, with Fiske's making a fourth, will supersede for some purposes their predecessors. Both the latter works are invaluable as handbooks for scholars. It was natural that Centennial Year should teem with works on Columbus; but, of the whole pack, none came near high-water mark except that of Winsor. The volume by Dr. Adams bore marks of manufacture at second hand. Histories of secession have equally failed of highest rank, although some of the memoirs will be useful as historic material. "The History of the Civil War," by the Comte de Paris, was probably the best of the general works. Mr. Bryce, perhaps more than any one else, stimulated us to the present awakening in the study of our own history and institutions. His "American Commonwealth" and Von Holst's "Constitutional Law of the United States," both by foreign-born writers, displace all works by Americans.

After all these, we come upon no less than five more ambitious attempts to write American history,—Schouler's "History of the United States," Payne's "History of the American People," McMaster's "History of the People of the United States," Von Holst's "Constitutional and Political History of the United States," Rhodes's "History of the United States from the Compromise of 1850." Of Mr. Payne's work it is hardly possible to judge as yet. Only two volumes are before the public, but are full of promise. Von Holst's volumes have met with nothing but the highest praise from scholars. Mr. Rhodes is giving us an analysis of recent history that is thoroughly excellent every way.

Mr. Schouler's work is, without question, the most complete picture of the nation from its founding to the Civil War. It is a rapid, straightforward narrative, seldom stopping to quote authorities, but accurate in facts, and possessed of the highest historical genius. The narrative flows on, when well under way, with a marvellous richness and eloquence, midway between the general and the particular, the narrative and the philosophic methods. As an authority, it is going to stand prominent. But what it is to be most valued for is the fact that the author is possessed of a vast synthetic power: a real economic and political philosophy makes the facts he relates bear their true relative position and force. There are instances of special pleading as he reaches periods near his own, and these are to be regretted; but, on the whole, Mr. Schouler has given us a brilliant, vigorous, strong, pithy, stimulating history. He is never tempted to turn aside to lengthy, disproportionate disquisition, but holds his subject and himself marvellously well in hand. He is a condensed, pruned Macaulay.

Of Mr. McMaster one can take only a single view. Gossipy and fuller in detail than Schouler, he gives us on every page what he promised at the outset,—a history of the people. Mr. Schouler has admirable summaries of the popular life and economic changes in separate chapters. But Mr. McMaster had in mind "to describe the dress, the occupations, the amusements, the literary canon of the times, to note the changes of manners and morals, to trace the growth of that humane spirit which abolished punishment for debt, which reformed the discipline of prisons, and in our own time destroyed slavery and lessened the miseries of dumb brutes." He equally discourses constantly on progress in the utilization of power, and its applications to machinery. Thousands of minute elementary facts which rarely enter into written history Mr. McMaster rightfully puts in place. He describes far more than Schouler, and therefore is at his best in picturesque episodes. If you wish for the discussions that preceded the settlement of the question of a national capital, or a thoroughly filled picture of the visit of Lafayette, or a complete account of the attack on Washington's character, or a full account of mints and coins, you must turn to McMaster. It is not possible to find anywhere else so perfect a history of the War of 1812. It was a gossipy war, a war of small episodes, a war disgraceful for petty management, for the presence in power of imbeciles, and for disasters of a most aggravating sort. It needs a hand like Mr. McMaster's to do it justice. The six episodes of American efforts at secession are not given too full statistics. Those who desire to study the questions of tariff and free trade and finance will find large material here at hand. But, to fully understand Mr. McMaster, one needs to turn to such subjects as the study of slavery in Indiana. Here he finds the outlines of other historians filled up and comprehensible. For the general reader we have nothing equal to McMaster.

This is but a bare outline of the work recently undertaken in the history of the American people. We are as a nation but one hundred years old; but that hundred includes the history of steam, of railroads, of telegraphs, of electricity, and steam applied to arts and industries,—practically, of the press, of great colleges, and great monopolies. It covers the rise of millionaires and their vast enterprises. It is equivalent to a thousand years of any preceding period. We have already a richer field for research, teeming with greater problems, than the whole history of Rome.

But this is not all: greater history is ahead. Questions even more vital to the life of society than the slavery of Negroes are now crowding upon us. The problem is no longer one of secession, but one of possible degeneration or regeneration. The system of competition on which all our business is based must be tested in comparison with new methods of production and distribution. It is probable that a total readjustment will take place to co-operation in industry and profit-sharing. City life must become suburban, at least. These enormous maelstroms of humanity must be broken up. The centripetal tendency of population must be reversed for the centrifugal. While socialism will win more in some directions, individualism will win in others. The end of coal is not fifty years ahead. That will necessitate the substitution of other forces for steam. The great steam age will thus have soon done its work. Its roar and bluster will be in the past. But this is not all. Internationalism crowds hard on nationalism. Statesmen must learn to plan less for limited areas and river-bounded territories. The field will be the world. Tariffs will have the moral side to the front. Finance must not be led in eternal circles of blind wandering. This and more makes us recall with pleasure and indorse the opinion of Jefferson that the chief study of a self-governing people should be history. "We," said Lincoln, "are history-makers." We cannot too well understand the errors as well as the achievements of the past. Above all, we need the grand optimism that inspires the students of history that has not been falsified in the writing. When Bunsen wrote the words, "God in History," he spoke the truth we are more and more learning to see.

It is not a procession of monarchs or statesmen that passes by, but the evolution of humanity inspired by the will of Divinity.

A NOTABLE BIOGRAPHY.

BY REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

The biography of a man of quite exceptional ability, written by his equal or superior, is too infrequent an event not to be notable. We have that conjunction in the biography of Sir James Fitzjames Stephen by his brother, Leslie Stephen, published by G. P. Putnam's Sons. Fitzjames, as his brother uniformly calls him, was the more striking personality, the man of greater public force and standing, law his main haunt, literature his avocation; while the career of Leslie has, I believe, been exclusively literary. His, if not the stronger, is certainly the juster mind and the greater literary skill. Fitzjames could have given us no such biography of him as he has given us of Fitzjames. Full of the warmth of brotherly affection, it is nevertheless characterized throughout by that critical instinct everywhere apparent in Leslie Stephen's essays, in his "History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century," and in his "Science of Ethics."

In one other respect this is a notable biography. It is written in a manner which in past times has had some great examples, but which latterly has fallen considerably into disuse and disrespect, as if a "Life and Letters" were the only kind of biography worthy of our attention and regard. Their name is legion whose opinion is, The more letters and the less life we have, the better. Their ideal is that of the completest self-effacement possible, the biographer content and satisfied to be the editor of his subject's letters. Leslie Stephen's biography of his brother is removed from this variety as far as possible. No letters are formally introduced, and such as are quoted are quoted briefly and in such a manner as not to mar the sense of literary continuity. In a volume of 504 octavo pages it is the biographer who is speaking to us, giving us, together with a vivid portraiture of his brother's life and character, the best of his own thought concerning a wide range of matters relevant to his special theme. Nor could any better argument be found for this kind of biography as needing no apology than the example of it now in hand. A collection of Fitzjames Stephen's letters must have been wonderfully good that would have made a book so interesting as this, and, withal, so instructive and impressive.

This is a notable biography in respect to a third particular. It is the biography of a family, and not merely of an individual. If Galton had not anticipated the title, "Hereditary Genius," it might appropriately have been the title of the book in hand. The genealogical introduction to the biographies of famous men are apt to be a weariness; but the one we have here is not, though it is prolonged through 65 pages. The father, grandfather, and great-grandfather were all men of marked ability. That of the great-grandfather was both physical and intellectual. He had his ups and downs, especially his downs, and, as a prisoner for debt, wrote earnestly, if not convincingly on the injustice of such imprisonment. Six feet and three inches tall, he anticipated in this respect his great-grandson, Fitzjames, whose general resemblance to him was remarkable. He was the first lawyer in a succession of five generations. His son, the grandfather of Fitzjames, after a youth of much adventure, became a successful lawyer, a Master in Chancery, and a valued coadjutor of Wilberforce and Zachary Macaulay and their set in the West India emancipation. The father, best known by his "Essays in Ecclesiastical Biography" and by his "Lectures on French History," was an under-colonial secretary, with a capacity for business management that was quite marvellous. He was a man so hyper-sensitive that he hated to look in the glass, so modest that he wished to have his birthdays pass unnoticed, and "shy," as Sir Henry Taylor said, "beyond all shyness that you could imagine in any one whose soul had not been pre-existent in a wild duck." He married a daughter of Rev. Henry Venn, one of the most softly shining of the evangelicals; and Fitzjames was their third child, born March 3, 1829.

It is because he is so thoroughly convinced of the truth of Wordsworth's dictum—

"The boy is father of the man"— that Leslie Stephen has dwelt with careful emphasis on Fitzjames's childhood and youth. Of brilliant promise there was little, of school and college honors and successes few indeed; and, when his professional life began, so tardy were the victorious eagles in perching on his banners that he sometimes questioned whether he had not better devote himself to literature exclusively. From first to last it would be hard to say which engrossed him more, his vocation as a lawyer or his avocation as a writer; nor does it greatly matter, seeing that, as lawyer and writer, he was still the social moralist. He always resented the distinction so often made between law and morality, holding law to be the formal expression of the deepest moral needs of the community; and, as a writer for the Saturday Review, Pall Mall, and other publications, whatever his subject, there was an irresistible gravitation to its moral side.

His industry was enormous. A formidable list is given of his independent books and magazine articles; but the main bulk of his literary contributions were to the weeklies and dailies,—226 articles in one year for the Pall Mall Gazette! He had a giant's strength; and, alas! he used it like a giant, with irrational expense and waste. There is something inspiring and rebuking for the most of us in his industry, but at the same time a voice of warning. He wrote all night and walked thirty-five miles the next morning,—many things of this sort. But he broke down at fifty-six, and died at sixty-four. He is best known to the general public by his "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity." It was a book which lost him many friends among the Liberals, and made him some among the Conservatives and Tories. To many it seemed hard, even to brutality, in its plea for force as the origin and mainspring of the social order. It was nothing if not unsentimental. As was the book, so was the man. Sentimentalism was his chief abomination. He had no mercy on it anywhere in literature or life. And a sentimental regard for the brutal criminal was of all sentimentalism the most abhorrent in his eyes. As a judge, he reserved his sternest penalties for men who abused women and children, sentencing for life a man who had tried to hack his wife to death, and made a botch of it.

Here was a man who had in him a great fund of real sensibility; but his determination not to wear his heart upon his sleeve led him to rudely force it back, and to defend it with the bosses of a forbidding and impenetrable shield. So hateful to him was all wilful optimism that, in his avoidance of it, he tried to make his statement as repulsive as possible rather than as engaging. The final outcome of his thinking on the religious side was extremely tenuous in its affirmations, if it was not purely negative. It became so, however, only by a most gradual process of differentiation from his original belief, the evangelical doctrine of "the Clapham sect." His love and admiration for his father's and his mother's people and their friends lengthened out a process which otherwise would much sooner have reached its term. Worse than a wilful optimist, he hated a whining pessimist. He did not often "drop into poetry"; but once he did so in reply to Tennyson's "Despair." His verses were addressed to the dripping malcontent of Tennyson's poem, and among them were the following:

"The know-nothing books may alarm you;
but many a better man Knows he knows nothing, and says so, and lives the best life he can.
If there is a future state, face its hopes and terrors gravely:
The best path to it must be to bear life's burdens bravely.
And, even if there be none, why should you not live like a man, Enjoying whatever you have as much and
as long as you can?
In the world in which we are living there's plenty to do and to know,
And there's always something to hope for till it's time for us to go.
'Despair' is the vilest of words, unfit to be said or thought,
Whether there is a God or a future state or not."

"'Despair' is the vilest of words."
"That," says the biographer, "expresses Fitzjames's whole life and character."
And the man himself in these pages is more helpful than anything he writes. His life had many disappointments, but he was superior to them all. He gave enormous labor to the codifying of the English criminal law only to see his hope continually deferred and miserably disappointed at the last. But his heart was not made sick.
Men who could walk between his legs were frequently preferred to him for positions of great public influence. But he went on counting up his joys and satisfactions, and found himself one of the happiest of men.
Doubtless he had serious defects of character or disposition; but he was splendidly courageous and sincere. Here is his scheme of life: "We cannot get beyond probabilities.
We have to make a choice, and make it at our peril. We are on a pass, blinded by mist and whirling snow. If we stand still, we shall be frozen to death. If we take the wrong road, we shall be dashed in pieces. We do not certainly know whether there is a right one. What must we do?
'Be strong and of a good courage!' Act for the best, hope for the best, and take what comes. Above all, let us dream no dreams and tell no lies, but go our way, wherever we may land, with our eyes open and our heads erect. If death ends all, we cannot meet it better. If not, let us enter the next world with no sophistry in our mouths and no masks on our faces."

It is not the most attractive scheme imaginable. But there is something in it to pique the courage of a man from whom the ordinary props and stays have fallen away;
and, at least, it is a scheme to which Sir James Fitzjames Stephen was always true, come bright or evil days.

THE TEACHINGS OF JESUS.*

THEIR BEARING ON OUR SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

BY REV. E. A. COIL.

There are certain great principles laid down in the teachings of Jesus, the universal, practical recognition of which would quickly transform the world. When the burdens of taxation were heavy and the class spirit was strong, and all the evils incident to such a distorted state of society were rife, there appeared upon the scene one who declared in no uncertain terms that all men are the children of God, and therefore brethren who should dwell together in love. His declaration was strengthened by a life consistent with it, in that it was full of pity for the misguided and laden with encouragement for the weak. Sometimes I hesitate to mention that fundamental principle of the teaching of Jesus,—namely, the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man,—because we talk about it so much, but seem at times to practise it so little. But, inasmuch as the cause, of which present conditions are but an effect, consists so largely in the fact that it is either ignored or looked upon as an optimistic dream which can never be realized in fact, we must speak of it, and convince the world of its practicability and inestimable value. Man is entirely too likely to form the habit of thinking of himself as a distinct personality, whose development and interests are independent of all the rest of mankind.

There is a tie of kinship binding him to the lowest and weakest of his fellow-men in a way that makes his interests one with theirs. The cry of many in nearly every age has been, "Save thyself, regardless of what becomes of the rest of the world."
Just as though "heaven could be heaven, and look unmoved on hell." That castes have been developed, sectarianism strengthened, race prejudices perpetuated, and human slavery in various forms allowed to exist, is not at all strange when we consider the standpoint from which most people have been in the habit of looking at life. To effect a change for the better, the eyes of men must be opened to the fact that they have not seen and understood life as it really is.

A recognition of kinship would mean that the mere cash relation which now receives such wide-spread recognition, and to which everything else is, in so many cases, subordinated, would take a secondary place.
All the movements looking toward a betterment of human affairs, of which I have any knowledge, have succeeded in so far as they have recognized this kinship; and in whatever degree they ignored it they have failed.
I conclude, therefore, that it is not by this or that particular method that our problems are to be satisfactorily solved, but in the recognition of the doctrine of fatherhood and brotherhood as taught by him to whom not only lawyers and doctors, but artisans and fishermen, gladly gave ear. We can refuse to incorporate this principle into our lives and act upon it in our daily contact with each other, if we so choose; but there is a severe penalty attached to such refusal, and we cannot escape it, no matter how hard we try. Their training has been such that, when people read, "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life, for my sake, shall find it," they are very likely to begin thinking of things which belong exclusively to the spiritual realm. But a little observation will reveal to all of us the fact that the truth contained in that statement is operative on our streets, in our factories and stores, just as well as in the spiritual world. No matter what phase of our experiences we are considering, Jesus was right. He who seeks to save his life in a narrow and exclusive sense will inevitably lose it. In whatever degree we allow the principles of darkness to abound in the community in which we live, our own children are in danger of falling into the ditch; and no policy of exclusion that we may adopt will render them safe. A hope based upon anything less than that doctrine of brotherhood which implies an earnest effort to save the world from sin is sure to fail.

Let us look for a moment into the factories and workshops and stores where so many daily ply their trade. There the cash relation is predominant. On the one hand are many who seek simply the largest and best service for the smallest possible pay.
On the other, there is an army of men who contend for the largest pay for the least possible service. I have listened to discussions between employers and employees; and almost universally they resolve themselves, in one form or another, into discussions of so many pieces, so many dollars and cents, and so many hours. Each looks upon the other as his enemy, and from that standpoint considers the work to be done and the remuneration therefor. And what is the result? The conditions that prevail throughout the industrial world of to-day are the answer to that question. Blind selfishness on one hand, no matter whether it appears first among employers or employees, is sure to beget a like spirit on the other;
and, until men learn that their interests are one, and deal with each other as brethren, present conditions are not likely to be materially improved. Suppose the principle upon which so many are disposed to act at the present time was supplanted by that nobler one which constitutes so important a factor in the teaching of Jesus, and, instead of suspicion and destructive greed, men should begin living more for each other. In this case employers would everywhere pay the largest possible amount for services rendered. On the other hand, employees would give the best and greatest possible service for that which they received. I believe that the adoption of this principle would quickly transform the industrial world; and, if the greatest good to the largest number is the thing we seek, I am sure no one would have cause to regret the change. The establishment of this principle is now the chief thing that concerns us.

The man, and not the dollar, would then become the standard of greatness, and the kingdom of heaven would not be far away.
But, in order to effect this change on the material plane, another principle characteristic of the teaching of Jesus must be given a larger place in our daily lives.

You remember it is recorded that, while he sat beside Jacob's well, near the city of Sychar in Samaria, his disciples, who had gone into the city to buy provisions, returned and urged him to eat. He had just ended that interesting conversation with the Samaritan woman; and he seemed, for the time, to be entirely forgetful of his physical needs. His reply was, "I have meat to eat that ye know not of." Through the mysterious connection of the mind with the body, the faintness of the flesh was repaired by the energies of the spirit. This is a lesson that the Western world needs to learn. We are in danger of sacrificing the spirit in the interest of a great materialistic civilization, which, however grand it may become, will not of itself satisfy the longings of a human soul. Like Martha, we are much troubled about objective things. We fret about environments, and work ourselves into a fever about soup-houses and cheap food counters. Do not misunderstand me now. These things are of importance, and I would be the last one to discourage any worthy effort to supply the needy with food. But our social problem will never be settled by giving attention to that alone. Show me a nation absorbed in things subjective, and I will point you to one in which what we call civilization is on the wane. On the other hand, show me a nation that measures life by purely materialistic and objective things, and I will show you one that is restless, fretful, and constantly on the verge of revolution. You may add to this a high but purely intellectual culture, and the case will remain much the same.

In a recognition of the many-sidedness of our lives is to be found the golden mean which we should all seek. To disregard the objective in its various forms is to rob ourselves of much that we may legitimately enjoy; but, however beautiful and helpful the objective may be, if we do not partake of that bread and drink of that water which comes down from heaven, our souls will cry out because of hunger and thirst. We may mistake the nature of that cry and strive to still it by greater accumulations or more gorgeous environments; but that means giving ourselves a stone for bread or a scorpion for fish, and the cry will grow louder and its tones become more plaintive as the days go by.

The more I study these things, the more
I become convinced that any scheme which has for its object the betterment of human conditions is doomed to failure unless it plants itself squarely and practically upon the great doctrines of fatherhood and brotherhood, as taught by him in whose religion we say we believe, and at the same time grasps and clearly comprehends the spiritual side of life, and contributes abundantly to its needs. I hold in high esteem that intellectual culture of which we are justly proud; but, unless it serves us as a sure pilot to guide us to a better understanding and wider application of these principles which Jesus declared, and for which he was not afraid to die, there will still be an aching void in our lives. Our souls, figuratively speaking, will be discontented, hungry, and cold; and in some form or other the world will continue its quarrelling, bickering oppressions, and martyrdoms until the end of time.

THE TARPEIAN ROCK FOR EVIL- DOERS.

BY REV. MARY H. GRAVES.

The wronged woman her own avenger.
For victims of brutality a heroic part, in defiance of law, has been suggested as justifiable and as praiseworthy under certain circumstances. His death for her dishonor,—thus the balance is struck. A mild voice has been heard in protest, to the effect that the course is not saintly. In truth, the ethics savor of the old rather than the new dispensation, to which the world has not yet had time to adjust itself.

The "Eternal who makes for righteousness" is so very patient!

We have had impromptus on this question from nimble minds and noble hearts;
but what is the verdict of sober second thought? Did two wrongs ever make one right? Was ever the outcome of hatred and vengeful violence other than remorse and anguish, or torpidity and continuous degeneration? Bolts of wrath,—do they not react with fearful effect on mortal arms that try to wield them? There comes to mind a familiar study of the old, old question.
It is by the pen of a master. Scene, Rome, summit of the Tarpeian Rock; Miriam and Donatello.

"Who were they," said he, looking earnestly at her face, "who have been flung over here in days gone by?"

"Men that cumbered the world," she replied; "men whose lives were the bane of their fellow-creatures; men who poisoned the air, which is the common breath of all, for their own selfish purposes. There was short work with such men in the old Roman times. Just in the moment of their triumph a hand, as of an avenging giant, clutched them, and dashed the wretches down the precipice."

"Was it well done?" asked the young man.

"It was well done," answered Miriam.
"Innocent persons were saved by the destruction of a guilty one who deserved his doom."

Miriam's strange persecutor now approached, and "such a cold, sick despair crept over her that it impeded her breath and benumbed her natural promptitude of thought."

A moment more. Then a wild cry from a falling victim, and Donatello's voice saying, "I did what your eyes bade me do when I asked them with mine, as I held the wretch over the precipice."

She could not deny that joy had thrilled her heart when she beheld her tormentor in his mortal peril; "but, with the dead thump on the stones below, had come an unutterable horror."

For a companion picture turn to Gwen-dolen Grandcourt, a "crushed penitent," recounting to Daniel Deronda the gruesome details of the drowning of her husband, her quickenened conscience accusing her of an instant's delay in throwing the rope to save him, and of a flash of gladness that he was gone.

In a strongly written bit of fiction in one of the leading magazines a few years ago,
"An Eye for an Eye," occur these words, which make the reader, as did the author,
"feel reflective": "While the code of society continues to make subtle distinctions between equally guilty parties, one can scarcely be surprised that those who suffer under its operation should sometimes disregard all law in their efforts to obtain justice."

True; and yet, from the more advanced and thoughtful women of our time, something wiser and better is to be expected than a harking back to the Tarpeian Rock and the reasoning of hunted Miriam at bay.
The world waits to hear.

Spiritual Life.

The poet utters, the thinker meditates, the righteous acts; but he who stands on the borders of the divine world prays, and his prayer is word, thought, action in one.—
Balzac.

It is the eternal order of God that the deeds of man, good or evil, come back and must come back upon the doers. In this way the good is rewarded, conserved, the evil is tormented, torments itself, and thereby becomes self-correcting, self-undoing.—
H. W. Thomas.

"He only wins his freedom truly
Who daily wins it fresh and fair,
He only ever rises newly
Into the regions of the purer air,
Who falters not for blame nor praise,
But lives in strenuous and victorious days."
Louis James Block.

A man may be an eternal failure, although his footsteps glitter with gold and his words sparkle with knowledge. That man is the most successful in the divine kingdom who sets in motion the greatest amount of spiritual power, power for the glory of God, whatever may be the opinions or rewards of fallen mortals.—John Reid.

* An address given before the Unitarian Women's Alliance of Cincinnati, Ohio.

REV. WILLIAM H. BICKNELL.

The death of Mr. Bicknell in Malden August 28 brought relief to a spirit that looked forward through the decay of the flesh to renewal of life. Oppressed during months of weakness, borne with patient submission, he caught glimpses of light on the way of his decline that cheered and sustained amid the deepening shadows of mortality, and moved him, out of the fulness of experience, to say, "God restoreth my soul." With calm and sure eye that beheld in every added infirmity a new token of the grave, he awaited the summons to depart,—not as the mandate of a resistless tyrant, but as message of a benignant friend.

Although years have elapsed since our friend was busy in the active duties of the minister, yet his interest in the word and its work was ever steady and strong. To the great truths of Christianity his mind was always open, his sympathies responsive, his trust in them cordial and sincere.

As parishioner, he moved upon the same lines of faith and duty that he had marked with just and true hand in the pastoral office and work; and in the fellowships of the church, in choice labors in the Sunday-school, before his health finally failed,—in any and all ways that may become the Christian,—he abundantly proved that his real ministry was his life. In the parishes where he once ministered many hearts will be thrilled with sadness, as they feel that he is gone; but the privilege of sacred memory is one with the privilege of immortal assurance that, having loved these,—his friends who once wrought with him under the Master's inspiration,—he, like his Master, "loved them unto the end."

B.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

RAILROAD ANNOUNCEMENT.

The fare over the principal lines of railway will be full fare going to Washington, and one-third of the fare returning, provided the person desiring this reduction secures a certificate when purchasing the ticket for Washington, and has it properly indorsed at Washington. Full directions as to this will be given later; but one thing must be borne in mind,—that no reduction of the return fare can be obtained except upon the presentation of the certificate properly indorsed.

All persons going from Boston who desire to avoid the trouble of obtaining certificates can do so by buying their tickets of Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street. These tickets cover exactly the same as would those purchased of the railroad; i.e., transportation to Washington and return. They do not include parlor cars, or berths, or state-rooms in steamers. Price of ticket for the round trip, via Fall River Line to New York and Royal Blue Line from New York to Washington, is $12.67, tickets good going Friday, Saturday, or Sunday, October 18, 19, 20, and returning within ten days. Price of ticket, round trip, all rail route, leaving Park Square Station, New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, 9 A.M., or midnight express, is $16.33, tickets good going Friday, Saturday, Sunday, or Monday, October 18, 19, 20, 21, returning within ten days.

Messrs. Nason & Durgin advertised in last week's Register a Washington excursion at $30 for the round trip, including hotel expenses at the Vendome. This covers boat and railway fare, including berth on steamer; but transportation by rail is, of course, in regular passenger-cars, and, as train to be taken from Boston on Friday leaves at 6.30 P.M., passengers are expected to obtain supper before starting.

Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb issue a very full circular, with particulars as to excursions: first, travelling by boat and rail to Washington, and return, stopping at the Ebbitt House, and covering every needed expense for the whole trip, including drawing-room car seats and all incidental meals, at $40; second, all rail, every necessary expense included, for $50, with more extensive excursions, taking in Gettysburg, Blue Ridge, and Harper's Ferry in one case, and Old Point Comfort in another. The particulars as to these excursions are so fully set forth in their circulars that we do not undertake to reproduce them here, but advise every reader of the Register who is intending to visit Washington to send for their circular, either to Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb direct or to this office. Our knowledge of Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb and their methods of doing business leads us to say without hesitation that any statements or agreements that they make can be relied upon. Arrangements will be announced later by which parties from other sections of the country can visit Gettysburg, Old Point Comfort, and Richmond under the auspices of Raymond & Whitcomb, if desired; and an agent of theirs will be located in Washington to look after the interests of all who cast their lot with them.

CONFERENCE NOTES.

The Southern States Passenger Association, the Central Traffic Association, the New England Passenger Committee, and the Trunk Line Passenger Committee have all granted the reduction in fare on the one-fare-and-a-third certificate plan. This includes all the principal railroad lines, exclusive of those belonging to the Western Passenger Association, as noted below.

The programme for the Conference is very nearly completed; and, with one or two exceptions, the speakers have all been engaged. It is strongly missionary in its character and purpose, with just the right number of scholarly subjects introduced to make the whole as mentally strengthening as it will be denominationally and spiritually. Within a week or two the completed programme will be given in the Register.

The Western Lines Passenger Association has refused to grant any reduction in fares on its railroad lines. These lie in the territory west of St. Louis and north-west of Chicago. All Unitarians living north and west of these two points who attend the Conference can secure the reduction from Chicago and St. Louis eastward by purchasing regular tickets from their homes to these two points, where through tickets to Washington should be obtained, together with the railroad certificate which will entitle the holder to a return ticket at the reduced rates.

In this issue of the Christian Register appears the first list of delegates appointed to attend the National Conference to be held in Washington, October 21-24. Several churches that did not send delegates to the last meeting at Saratoga have been among the first this year to send their credentials to the secretary of the Conference. This makes it look as if Mr. Batchelor's prophecy in the Unitarian would be realized, and that we may expect "such an uprising of our people, such unanimity and enthusiasm, that from the Washington Conference we shall date a new epoch in our missionary history."

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

Business is beginning to look up at these rooms. The number of visitors is increasing daily. The board of directors had its first meeting since vacation on Tuesday last, and Mr. Batchelor gives the results in another column. The Channing Hall "Talks" began last Saturday. The regular monthly board meeting of the National Alliance of Unitarian and Other Liberal Christian Women was held last Friday. Every day committees meet in the various rooms of this building. Persons not residing in Boston, and not familiar with the details of Unitarian work in and about Boston, would be surprised, I think, at the extent of the business transacted at these headquarters during the busy season of the year. The number of tracts sent out daily is large, and the sale of books begins very encouragingly.

No new books have been received since last week's notes; but, among the old books, we find the following, which ought to be more widely read: "Ways of the Spirit," "Reason in Religion," "A Volume of Sermons," all by Dr. Frederic H. Hedge, $1.13 each. It is unnecessary to speak in praise of anything Dr. Hedge has written: everybody recognizes his writings as among the best. Dr. C. C. Everett's "Gospel of Paul" is a work that is an interpretation of Paul's doctrine of the atonement. If those persons who think that Paul's writings justify the doctrines of Calvinism will read this book carefully, they will in all probability change their views somewhat, if not entirely. We advise every one that wants to really know what the great apostle actually taught to read this book. Dr. Everett is dean and professor of theology at Harvard University. Price of this book, $1.13. "Kindling Thoughts," by Elizabeth P. Channing, is a book filled with beautiful and helpful thoughts. The chapters are short, and the book is a good one to have on one's table to take up when weary and perplexed for a few moments' reading. It ought to do a world of good, and will, if it is used. Price 84 cents.

We would repeat, for the benefit of our friends outside of Boston, that we can supply any standard books they may wish to order from the Association. If you want a book, write to us, and we will get it for you if we do not have it in stock.

ATLANTA EXPOSITION.

Preparations for the Atlanta Exposition exhibit, which Mr. Chaney is conducting, have been going on here for ten days past. It will be a fine exhibit, and it is to be hoped that our Unitarian friends who visit the Exposition will look it up. It is quite certain that almost any one will be surprised to see what an abundance of interesting material there is in existence for such an exhibit. Photography furnishes the means for showing faces and places that Mr. Chaney has availed himself of. We hope to have some of it at these rooms when the fair closes. It is likely that many of our delegates will extend their trip to Atlanta from Washington.

VISITS.

Last Sunday at North Easton, Mass., in the handsome church, with its beautiful windows, its excellent choir, and well-filled pews. The day was a perfect one; and the beauty and quiet of the scene were inspiring and helpful to all, people and preacher. North Easton is a very interesting place. Wealth and prosperity are about one on every hand. Architecture by Richardson and landscape gardening by Olmsted add greatly to the natural beauties of the place. The Unitarian denomination has great reason to be proud of the laymen it has in this place. The name of Ames, associated as it is with the most extensive business operations of the country,—a name known among business men everywhere,—is a credit to any denomination. The great manufacturing establishment, the town hall, the free library, the high school, the beautiful church, cemetery, parsonage, the cairn, the shade-trees,—all these and numerous other objects, to say nothing of the great lawns and greenhouses adorning the surroundings of the village, and open to the enjoyment of all, show what wealth can do in the hands of kindly-disposed, liberal, and, greater than all, common-sense men.

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer.

Directors' Meeting.

The board of directors of the American Unitarian Association held their regular monthly meeting at their rooms, 25 Beacon Street, Tuesday, September 10. There were present Mrs. Hooper and Mrs. Williams and Messrs. Batchelor, Brown, Butler, Dole, S. A. Eliot, Fenn, Fox, Howe, Little, Long, Savage, and Stone.

The treasurer made a report of which the following is the substance: the expenditures of the Association from May 1 to September 1 have been $25,762; cash on hand May 1, $732.60; received from churches, $2,274.80; income from funds, books, etc., $5,047.94; leaving, to provide from temporary loans, $17,706.66.

On recommendation of the Finance Committee it was "Voted, That it is not the intention of the American Unitarian Association to exact the four per cent. interest called for by the deed of trust made by All Souls' Church, Chicago, and that it will take whatever steps are legally necessary to release the society from the payment of said interest, and thus carry out the original purpose of the Association."

It was also

"Voted, That the treasurer be instructed not to pay over any appropriation to a society when debt to the Church Building Loan Fund shall be three months in arrears until the amount so due shall be paid, except by consent of the Finance Committee."

On recommendation of the Finance and Executive Committees, it was "Voted, That the Association shall spend no money until it gets it, except in so far as it is necessary to keep good work going which is already begun, or in the hope that the outlay may result in increased receipts. New work shall be undertaken as fast as increased income shall justify it."

This committee also ask for further time to consider the matter of changing the by-laws to define the mutual relations of the secretary, assistant secretary, and treasurer.

Rev. T. B. Forbush, superintendent for the Middle West, having asked aid for certain churches, on recommendation of the Western Committee, the following appropriations were made for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1895: to the First Unitarian Society, Ann Arbor, Mich., $1,200; to the Free Congregational Society, Baraboo, Wis., $150; to the Free Christian Church, Minneapolis, Minn., $800; to the First Unitarian Church, Duluth, Minn., $500; to the First Unitarian Society, Fargo, No. Dak., $400; to First Unitarian Society, Des Moines, Ia., $300; to Rev. Charles H. Rogers, for work in Oklahoma City and Guthrie, $600; to All Souls' Church, Colorado Springs, Col., $400; to First Unitarian Society, Salt Lake City, Utah, $800; to the Independent Congregational Society, Great Falls, Mont., $200; at the discretion of the Western superintendent, for Scandinavian work in the Red River Valley, $400; to Rev. Walter S. Vail, for missionary work in Southern Kansas, $100; at the discretion of the Western superintendent, for work in Athens and Sherwood, Mich., $240; to Rev. Fitz C. Davis, for missionary work in Minnesota and Wisconsin, $200. Also to the Unitarian church, Sturgis, Mich., from July 1, 1895, to April 1, 1896, $150; to Rev. J. L. Andrew, for missionary work in South Dakota, from July 1, 1895, to Oct. 1, 1895, $75; to Rev. Herman Haugerud, to assist him in moving to Minneapolis, Minn., $75.

Mr. Forbush was present, and explained the circumstances that made these appropriations necessary, and also made a general statement concerning the condition of missionary work in the West.

It was also

"Voted, That $3,000 be appropriated, with travelling expenses, to pay for the services of Rev. T. B. Forbush as superintendent for the Central West, for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1895, all sums received for preaching to be credited to the Association."

"Voted, That $250 be appropriated for the office expenses of Rev. T. B. Forbush to May 1, 1896.

A general discussion followed concerning the establishment of a "Missionary Council" in the West. No resolutions were offered, but it was apparently the unanimous opinion of the board that the Unitarian Association should in no way attempt to influence the action of the Western churches and State conferences in regard to the matter. The Association has no specific plan which it wishes to urge upon them. It has, however, one paramount desire; namely, to come into vital union and working harmony with all the active forces of Unitarianism in the Middle West, to encourage and strengthen, and, so far as it may, to assist with sympathy and money lonely workers and struggling churches.

It was "Voted, That a committee, consisting of the secretary, treasurer, and Mrs. Hooper, be appointed to write a memorial resolution upon Mrs. Stephen H. Bullard, and to nominate her successor."

On recommendation of the Committee on the New England States it was "Voted, That an appropriation of $1,200 be made to Rev. John B. Green for services at St. John, N.B., for the year beginning Oct. 1, 1895."

The Committee on Foreign Missions, being in doubt as to the exact sum necessary to pay the remaining expenses of the current year up to November 1, made the following recommendation; and it was "Voted, That the treasurer of the American Unitarian Association be authorized to meet the drafts of Mr. MacCauley for the Japan Mission, at the discretion of the secretary, to an amount not exceeding $500 for the year beginning Nov. 1, 1895."

Considerable discussion followed concerning the future of this mission. While no definite action was taken, the prevailing sentiment of the directors seemed to be that it was inexpedient to lay plans for the building up of a permanent school of theology in Japan. The political and religious changes are going on so rapidly in that country that it is impossible to foresee what will be the needs to be provided for. The directors, therefore, do not think it expedient to add any new member to the force at our headquarters at Tokio. It was believed that, by reducing the scope of our mission, our representatives could maintain a dignified attitude, and, returning somewhat to the original plan of the mission, do that which would be effective in expressing the sympathy of the Unitarians in America for progressive religious movements in Japan, and give all necessary information to the leaders of religious thought and action in that country. With this general understanding, it was "Voted, That $2,500 be appropriated for the salary of Rev. Clay MacCauley and $500 for the salary of Mr. Droppers, for the year beginning Nov. 1, 1895."

All further consideration of the question was postponed to the regular meeting, November 12, when, more information having been received from Japan, some definite decision would be made concerning the future conduct of the mission.

The Executive Committee was instructed to consider and report any proposition which may be made concerning the relations of the American Unitarian Association to the Christian Register or other publications.

The president, secretary, and treasurer were chosen delegates to the National Conference at Washington.

On motion of Mr. Stone it was "Voted, That the matter of signs for this building and stands and bulletin board in lower hall, register for visitors to the rooms, and the establishment of a circulating library of religious books in this building be referred to the Finance Committee, with instructions to report at the next meeting of the board such recommendations as they may have to make."

Adjourned.

GEORGE BATCHELOR, Sec'y.

The Sunday School.

The Channing Hall "Talks" opened auspiciously last Saturday. A goodly attendance was on hand to listen to Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford, who will give the addresses for the three grades hereafter. By a vote of those present the regular hour for the ensuing Saturdays is fixed at half-past two, this being more convenient for all considered. We call attention to this, so that there will be no mistake, and repeat the information of last Saturday, that there will be no Primary "Talks" by themselves, they being merged in the Channing Hall "Talks," and the hour is changed from three o'clock to half-past two. The subject for next Saturday, September 21, will be "The Pearl of Great Price."

Contributions to the treasury of the Unitarian Sunday School Society are coming in quite generously. We would remind churches and Sunday-schools that only two weeks remain in which to remit. The financial books close October 1, to be ready for the auditors. Any church or Sunday-school contributing any sum is entitled to three delegates to the annual meeting at Providence, October 16 and 17, with full voting powers. These delegates are members of the Unitarian Sunday School Society for one year, beginning October 1. We urge again upon our denomination the opportunity of sustaining the work which the Unitarian Sunday School Society is carrying on. It means the training of the young people in the faith, in character, and in essential religion. It means, also, some guarantee that the Unitarian denomination will have a future. If we do not secure the young people, where is there any outlook of growth?

The current leaflet lessons, one-topic graded system, issued by the Unitarian Sunday School Society, are being ordered quite largely both West and East. The subject, "The Teaching of Jesus," as shown in the parables, promises to furnish a very helpful line of topics. Sunday-schools that have not so far taken up this course are now falling into line. There never was so much union and system in the Sunday-school teaching of our body as at present. And all this is accomplished, not by the sacrifice of the wishes and life of the individual schools, but by raising them to a mutual plane of plan and spirit.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning; announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

REV. GEORGE BATCHELOR, secretary of the American Unitarian Association, closed his connection with the Unitarian church in Lowell in June, with many kindly expressions of regard from the parish. The ladies of the society presented to Mrs. Batchelor a silver tea-service of eight pieces. Last month Mr. Batchelor moved to 19 Wendell Street, Cambridge.

THE new leaflet prepared by the Study Class Committee of the Women's Alliance is now ready for use. The subject is "Unitarian Belief"; and it is divided into the following heads: "The Central Idea of Unitarian Belief"; "God"; "Jesus Christ"; "Man"; "The Holy Ghost"; "The Trinity and Creeds"; "The Bible and Inspiration"; "Prayer"; "Miracles"; "Sin, Evil, and Regeneration"; "The Future Life"; "Heaven and Hell"; "The Christian Church." This leaflet is not for sale, but is at the service of any Branch of the Alliance, or class of readers, or individual student, in any Unitarian church. Copies may be obtained by addressing Miss L. Freeman Clarke, Magnolia, Mass.

BOSTON.—Church of the Disciples: During the extended vacation of Mr. Ames Sunday services have been arranged as follows: September 22, Rev. John Cuckson; September 29, Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford; October 6, Rev. George Batchelor; October 13, Rev. F. G. Peabody; October 20, Rev. F. H. James; October 27, Rev. Charles T.

Billings; November 3, Rev. Charles G. Ames.

Second Church: Rev. Thomas Van Ness, the minister of the Second Church, in Copley Square, has just returned from a vacation visit to Southern France, and will occupy his own pulpit on the 22d, preaching the last sermon in the union series. On October 6 the Sunday-school will reopen, the primary department under Miss Kate L. Brown, and the main Sunday-school under the leadership of Rev. C. A. Langston, formerly of San Francisco, and a last year's graduate of the Meadville Theological School.

Boston Common: Next Sunday, September 22, the last open-air service for the season will be held on the Common. The Boston Journal has this to say: "Under the spreading branches of the old cotton-wood that is coming to be known as the 'Unitarian tree' another large and interesting congregation gathered yesterday afternoon to hear the Unitarian speakers give some sound, practical advice as to life in this world, together with a word of encouragement for the hereafter. There is no doubt about the success of these meetings in interesting the people. The novelty of the idea, which may at the beginning have drawn out some persons from motives of curiosity, has worn off; but there is apparently no more signs of waning enthusiasm among the audiences than there is with the speakers. Yesterday's congregation was as large as any on the Common. The people stayed until the close, too, although the dusk was fast closing in and the chill of the evening had set the thinly clad to shivering. There have been a few faithful ones who have not missed a meeting this summer. Among them is the Unitarian dog that every one who has heard any of the Unitarian preachers under the tree has come to know. He was on hand with the first arrivals yesterday, and walked around among the people as if to bid every one a hearty welcome. During the preaching he sat near the speakers' stand,—a model of quietness and attention, listening intently to all that was said." Last Sunday Rev. B. F. McDaniel of Newton Centre read the Scriptures, and commented on it. The regular speakers were Rev. J. M. Pullman, D.D., of Lynn (Universalist), and Rev. Albert Walkley of Brighton. Dr. Pullman spoke on the subject of "Working out your own Salvation." Mr. Walkley considered the subject of "The Improvement of Individual Souls as Necessary to the Improvement of Institutions and Laws."

The evening comes now so soon and the weather is so cool, the directors of the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches have decided that it is wise to end these meetings for the present season. It seems a pity to stop when so much interest is manifested; but there is no option. These meetings, as the Register readers must have seen by the brief reports, have been remarkably successful. Both speakers and audiences seem to have been in quick sympathy, and great good has been accomplished in various directions. The people at large who have gathered have received valuable thoughts, and the clergymen have come face to face with the people in frank consideration of living topics. The moral effect on the Unitarian denomination is not to be overlooked, since it shows that we are able to handle ourselves in the arena of an everyday test, away from upholstered pews and stained-glass windows. The preaching of the gospel is necessary in both kinds of places, but it was a well-known comment that Unitarians could not deal successfully with people at large. No greater proof could be given that this is false than the remarkable meetings on Boston Common the past summer. These have numbered nineteen in all. There has not been an omission of a single meeting owing to bad weather, though the skies have been threatening up to the very hour of beginning. At the closing service next Sunday, at 5 P.M., south-west corner, near the band stand, will be Mrs. Mary A. Livermore of Melrose, Rev. Augustus M. Lord of Providence, R.I., and Rev. Edward A. Horton.

ALBANY, N.Y.—One of the Albany evening newspapers published last Saturday for its weekly sermon an interesting statement by Dr. William M. Brundage on "Moral and Religious Education in the Sunday-school." Dr. Brundage believes that the average Sunday-school is a disappointment to parents, their children, and the pastor; and he proposes to improve upon the type in the school to be connected this winter with the newly organized Unitarian church of this city. The programme that he has adopted is somewhat similar to that successfully used by his neighbor, Rev. E. M. Fairchild of Troy, N.Y. There are to be five departments, beginning with the primary, which is to be in charge of a trained kindergarten. The senior department is for adults, and its study will be "Comparative Religions." In the words of Dr. Brundage, "The single purpose in the new 'School of Ethics and Religion' is to help the boys and girls to be the noble men and women God means them to be,—to teach our children that they are children of God, and to teach them to act like children of God."

BROOKLINE, MASS.—Rev. C. H. Porter of Quincy will preach in the First Parish Church on Sunday, September 22.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.—Second Society: Services will be resumed Sunday morning, September 22, Mr. Chadwick preaching on "The Religious Situation."

CARTHAGE, MO.—Mr. Frederick M. Bennett of the Harvard Divinity School has accepted the earnest call from the Unitarian church at Carthage, Mo. He began his work in this important field on September 15. Mr. Bennett was married at La Fox, Ill., September 5, to Miss Alice M. Barber.

GARDNER, MASS.—Mr. William Channing Brown was ordained to the work of the ministry, and installed as pastor of the First Unitarian Society of Gardner, Mass., on Wednesday, September 11, by a Council of Unitarian Congregational Societies, duly called and organized. Rev. A. F. Bailey of Barre was chosen moderator, and Mr. L. A. Wright of Gardner clerk. The council, after due consideration, unanimously approved the candidate; and the action of the society and the programme of ordination was carried out as follows: invocation, Rev. Edward Green; reading of the Scriptures, Rev. Walter F. Greenman; sermon, Rev. William W. Fenn; ordaining prayer, Rev. George M. Bodge; charge to the minister, Rev. George W. Kent; right hand of fellowship, Rev. W. L. Walsh; charge to the people, Rev. Edward A. Horton; concluding prayer, Rev. William Brown; benediction by the pastor. Large delegations were present from Athol, Barre, Petersham, Templeton, and other neighboring churches; and the church and pastor received hearty congratulations and wishes for their future prosperity from all.

LITTLETON, MASS.—The regular annual meeting of the North Middlesex Conference will meet with the Littleton society Wednesday, October 9. Programme and arrangements will be announced next week.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.—During the summer the Second Church has been kept open every Sunday, though for the evening service only. The pastor, Rev. L. W. Sprague, and his wife exchanged with Rev. A. G. Wilson of Spokane for two months, thus getting a change, if not a vacation. Mr. Sprague resumed his regular work the 1st of August, taking up again both morning and evening services. The regular congregations are now back, and the church is well filled in the morning and crowded in the evening. The course of sermons given on Sunday nights on "Science and Religion," embracing a memorial to Prof. Huxley, a study of Drummond's new book and of Kidd's "Social Evolution," and lastly "The Religious Thought of To-day," has proved most attractive and profitable. Mr. Sprague now announces a course of Sunday evening Unitarian revival sermons, which he, with the assistance of other ministers, will give in the Second Church. The only way in which they can be called "revival sermons" is in the attempt made to revive the interest of many who say they are Unitarians, but who have nothing to do with the church of that name.

LIST OF DELEGATES.

Reported as appointed to the Sixteenth Meeting of the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches, to be held at Washington, D.C., Oct. 21-24, 1895.

MASSACHUSETTS.

ASHBY.—First Parish: Rev. George S. Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Sheldon.
ATHOL.—First Congregational Church: Rev. S. W. Sutton, Mr. and Mrs. Leander B. Morse.
Second Unitarian Society: Rev. Carl G. Horst, Mr. and Mrs. Lucien Lord.
BEACHMONT.—Church of the Unity: Rev. Eber R. Butler, Horace Tobey, Mrs. C. J. Shaw.
BRIDGEWATER, EAST.—First Parish: Rev. John W. Quinby, Mrs. Susan M. Keen, Charles F. Mann.
BOSTON.—Church of the Unity: Rev. Minot J. Savage, Henry F. Miller, James N. North. Alternates: Alfred Ewer, Frank B. Thayer.
(East Boston) The Church of our Father: Rev. Richmond Fiske, D.D., Henry Peterson, Arthur D. Rogers.
CHELMSFORD.—First Congregational Society: Rev. Granville Pierce, Mrs. Lucy Fletcher, Mrs. F. A. Adams.
CONCORD.—First Parish: Mr. Harvey Wheeler, Miss Angelina Ball. Alternates: Prescott Keyes, Mrs. William Wheeler.
DEDHAM.—Third Parish: Rev. Obed Eldridge, Mrs. Reuben Colburn, Miss Elizabeth Fisher. Alternates: Mrs. William Colburn, Miss Anna Colburn.
DOVER.—First Parish: Rev. Obed Eldridge, Mrs. Sarah Smith, Frank Smith. Alternates: George D. Burrage, Mrs. Mary Smith.
HINGHAM.—First Parish: Rev. John W. Day, Ebed L. Ripley, Wilmon W. Blackmar.
HUDSON.—First Unitarian Society: Rev. John Mills Wilson, James L. Harriman, Edmund M. Stowe.
LITTLETON.—First Congregational Society: Rev. Isaac F. Porter, Mrs. Mary J. Priest, D. G. Houghton.
NORTHBORO.—First Congregational Church and Society: Miss Ella Searle, Mrs. L. F. Stratton.
REVERE.—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Eber R. Butler, John Y. Pratt, Mrs. C. M. Butler.
ROCKLAND.—The Unitarian Society: Rev. Frederick O. MacCartney, Charles A. Townsend, Miss Angela W. Collins.
TURNER'S FALLS.—Unitarian Society: Rev. and Mrs. Alfred Free, Mrs. Daniel P. Abercrombie.
TYNGSBORO.—First Parish: Rev. William Brown, Miss Mary E. Bennett, Miss Ellen F. Perham.
WEST TOWNSEND.—Liberal Christian Society: Rev. George S. Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. Morton Barrett.
WINCHENDON.—Church of the Unity: Rev. A. J. Culp, D. H. Barnes, J. N. Richardson.
WORCESTER.—Church of the Unity: Rev. Calvin Stebbins, Hon. George F. Hoar, Cyrus G. Wood.

COLORADO.

GREELEY.—First Unitarian Society: Rev. C. Howard Wilson, Oscar B. Hawes.

CONNECTICUT.

HARTFORD.—First Unitarian Congregational Society: Rev. Joseph Waite, William Francis, Horace Cornwall.

DELAWARE.

WILMINGTON.—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Alexander T. Bowser, Mrs. Frances L. Garrett, Miss Helen L. Garrett. Alternates: Daniel W. Taylor, C. Cameron.

MONTANA.

HELENA.—First Unitarian Society: Rev. J. H. Crooker, Hon. Henry M. Blake, A. D. Edger.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

ANDOVER.—Congregational Unitarian Society: Rev. Lyman Clark, Walter S. Carr, Mrs. Maria Carr.
MILFORD.—First Unitarian Society: Rev. A. Judson Rich, Mrs. William Richardson, Miss E. A. Livermore.
NASHUA.—First Congregational Society: Rev. E. Powell, Miss Henrietta Prescott, Miss Kate Thayer.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PITTSBURG.—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Charles E. St. John, R. Q. Whitten, Mrs. Henry Holdship. Alternates: George Faunce, Miss Mary P. Semple.

VERMONT.

BRATTLEBORO.—Unitarian Congregational Society: Rev. E. Bradford Leavitt, Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, Mrs. Mary E. Warder.

ASSOCIATIONS.

CONNECTICUT VALLEY CONFERENCE: Rev. F. A. Hinkley, Rev. C. F. Abbott, H. C. Parsons.
HANCOCK CONFERENCE (MAINE): Mr. and Mrs. David B. Flint, Mrs. F. G. Peabody.
NORFOLK CONFERENCE: E. A. Cushing, Mrs. G. F. Fisher, Mrs. Samuel Phipps.
WORCESTER CONFERENCE: Charles H. Blood, John C. Otis, Mrs. W. S. Heywood.
UNITARIAN MINISTERS' MONDAY CLUB: Rev. Alfred E. Mullett.
UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON: Frank B. Thayer, Mrs. C. R. Elliot, Hon. Charles H. Porter.

Business Notices.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

A Look Ahead.—The advantages of a brass bedstead are very apparent as time goes on. It takes on a richer lustre as the years roll by. The low prices on brass bedsteads which are being quoted at the Paine furniture warehouses, on Canal Street, have resulted in a greatly increased use of brass bedsteads during the last twelve months.

The Morris carpets and rugs are beautiful—really works of art, in both design and color—shown by Joel Goldthwait & Co., 169 Washington Street.

Marriages.

In Littleton, 11th inst., by Rev. I. F. Porter, George F. Stone and Lizzie A. Proctor, both of Littleton.

Deaths.

In Dublin, N.H., 8th inst., suddenly, Elisabeth J. Faulkner, of Keene, N.H., in the 74th year of her age.

In Passaic, N.J., 8th inst., Elizabeth Farrie Chamberlain, 89 years.

A lifelong Unitarian, faithful to its highest spirit. She was one of the committee of forty-two that went to West Roxbury to invite Theodore Parker to Boston. She leaves the memory of a life full of love, patience, and tenderness.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE

OF

Unitarian and Other Christian Churches

AT WASHINGTON, D.C.,

October 21, 22, 23, and 24.

Messrs. RAYMOND & WHITCOMB have arranged for the accommodation of delegates and others who may wish to attend the National Conference an Attractive Series of Excursions at Very Low Rates.

Parties will leave BOSTON Friday, October 18, and Monday, October 21, under special escort. A choice of routes by boat and rail.

Additional Excursions to

GETTYSBURG, OLD POINT COMFORT, Etc.

Send for special circular.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,

296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

To Organists and Music Committees.

A large and valuable selection of choir music, made with care by a Boston organist, is now offered for sale. Church committees have an excellent opportunity to obtain, at a reasonable rate, an unusually good selection of modern and classical compositions. Address, MUSIC, Christian Register Office, 141 Franklin Street, Boston.

JAMES KAY APPLEBEE

is open to engagements for PREACHING or LECTURING. Address: ALLSTON, MASS.

Rooms To Let.

Single or in suite, with bath. House occupied by owner. Apply at

36 RUTLAND SQUARE.

A YOUNG LADY wishes to secure a position as soprano in a church choir in or near Boston. Address BOX 70, TEMPLETON, MASS.

WANTED.—In Unitarian family boarding-place for boy of nine. Address "F," care Christian Register, giving full particulars.

For the Christian Register.

CONSUMMATION.

BY T. H. F.

“The fashion of this world passeth away.”

All things are but as dust. From whence they sprung,
To that shall they return. Vain builders, ye!
Relentless Time shall mock your prophecy,
This will endure. Earth's mighty fabrics wrung
From sweat of toiling hands, and labored thought,
The pride and glory of presumptuous man!
Eternity but measures out a span
Of fleeting years to all that ye have wrought.

The Temple and the Coliseum; where Jehovah's shrine, the boast of pagan Rome,
Where that fair building, once Religion's home?
And what is Rome's yet mightier structure?
There,
Wherein her hosts made bloody holiday,
The broken column and the crumbling wall
Of gaping ruin but presage its fall
Beneath the heel of Time's remorseless sway.

Egypt's colossal mystery of stone,
Which from the sands its lofty sides uprears,
Defiant still of wreck and change of years,—
Shall this of all man's work, and this alone,
Escape unscathed the universal doom
Pronounced on all? Not so; for in the end
Its fate with that of all things else shall blend:
The sepulchre itself shall find its tomb.

If such as these shall pass, what power may save Aught from the wreck of years, of old or new,
Which, in their turn, with their own dust shall strew
Earth's kindred clay within one common grave?
And did He err who said of old, There stands
A mansion fair, on sure foundations placed,
Whereon no winds shall beat, no floods shall waste?
No: such there is,—“a house not made with hands.”

The Pulpit.

BE NOT ANXIOUS.

BY REV. ERNEST C. SMITH.

“Be not therefore anxious for the morrow.”—
MATT. vi. 34.

The chapter which I read this morning (Matthew vi. 19-34) is one of the most exalted and beautiful in all literature, full of tenderness and full of strength. While it does not temporize, but plainly sets two ways before a man and bids him make his choice,—telling him that he cannot serve God and mammon,—it also breathes the deepest trust in God's care and love, telling those of little faith that the Father's care includes even the grass of the field, and will not fail them in their time of need.

No matter how a man's philosophy may conflict with the plain teaching of the chapter, there are practically moments in every life when its words of trust have a soothing and healing power beyond all expression. It is heart speaking to heart, supreme faith speaking to doubt that would fain be faith. In our ordinary hours we see, perhaps, only the outward, poetic beauty of the words. When our hearts are bowed down with grief and loss, when disappointments beset us and we look forward to a future dark and forbidding, when the coming days and weeks seem like a grim fate bringing to us burdens too heavy to bear, then, and not till then, do we find out the true meaning of the words and the true comfort that is in them. They are the utterance of a great faith,—the faith that removes mountains. While we hasten from one pleasure to another, are absorbed in the successful search for this or that, we feel no deep need of that which faith can give; but, when the objects that satisfied us fail, when we can no longer see the outcome, we long for the eye of faith, and, as our own faith is weak, we flee to Him whose faith is strong. We are like the passenger who, while the sky is clear and the sea smooth, is confident and careless, but, when storms sweep down and the waves swell mountain high, runs in terror to the calm and unmoved captain to gain some hope from his confidence.

This portion of the Sermon on the Mount will always be a consolation and a stay to those who come to it under such circumstances. Even those who come most blindly will find there some balm for their aching hearts. But the hard common sense of our age shakes its head at some of the commands there, saying: “Very pretty, but very impracticable. Suppose men should cease to sow and reap. Where would the bread come from? Suppose we should be as careless of raiment as the ‘lilies of the field,’ should cease to toil and provide for the morrow. Would that bring about an ideal condition of affairs? Would man be more spiritual, less animal, less given over to his passions?” With a few such questions as these many a man puts aside the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount, thinking he has shown good cause why it can be nothing to him.

There is a certain logic in this brusque treatment of the subject, a dim consciousness that, however poetic or ideal the injunctions may be, yet they are somehow intended to have a practical application. Now, between what presents itself as a most natural practical application of the precepts and the habits of mind of the ordinary nineteenth-century man there is a deep, almost impassable gulf. The summing up of the chapter is in the words, “Therefore, take no thought for the morrow; for the morrow shall take thought for itself.” The tendency to-day is to attribute all advances and gains to precisely this taking thought for the future, or “to-morrow.”

A German writer of to-day claims that Jesus was so thoroughly an Asiatic, belonged so wholly to the Orient, that we of the West cannot understand him or draw near to him. Is this true, and can there be no willing application of his precepts to our modern life? The writer seems to think that Jesus here means to suggest something like the Buddhistic asceticism, where literally the devotee took no thought for the morrow, but begged his daily bread from door to door. What the common sense of to-day takes as the reductio ad absurdum he accepts as positive and emancipating truth. The Buddhist saint neither reaps nor sows. In fact, he looks upon labor for the “meat that perisheth” as sinful, and passes his time in meditation that continually carries higher and higher in the spiritual realm.

Now, it is true that the asceticism of the early centuries of the Church can point to this and kindred sayings of Jesus in justification of itself. The question, then, is a fair one, put to us both by ascetics, who are struggling for holiness, and by practical, energetic men, who regard asceticism as absurd, “Does Jesus enjoin asceticism and neglect of the common prudences of life?”

This is a question which cannot be answered offhand. The answer depends largely on who the questioner is and on the motive of his question. On the one hand, in the ordinary meaning of the term, Jesus was not an ascetic. “The Son of Man came eating and drinking,” was present at feasts and marriages, was a-hungered and ate like other men. The only fast of which we are told is that which marked the beginning of his ministry. He bade his disciples keep his memory, not by a feast, but by a social meal. He made use of forethought and prudence at times in his dealing with priests and Pharisees. On the other hand, he bade certain men leave all and follow him. He told one man to sell all he had and give to the poor, to take up his cross and follow him; and he did teach his followers to despise earthly riches and glory. He would not make men idlers. He would not make all his followers preachers; but he would make them pure of heart: he would have them “seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness.” If love of wealth or love of power was absorbing their attention and engaging their best powers, he bade them root out that love, give up their wealth and their power as being hindrances to their truest life. Yes, if those cares we consider absolutely necessary—cares for food and raiment—come to usurp the whole of our lives, they, too, must go. When one has to continually plan how to make a small income go a great way, to do without the things he desires most in order to get some of the things he must have, when it is work, work, work, for the meat which, it is true, perishes, but which the body must have or die, it is easy to lose faith, and conclude that riches is “the one thing needful.” Many have this feeling who have never known grinding poverty,—people who compare themselves with their more wealthy neighbors and desire this or that luxury, a little more leisure, or a more sumptuous style of living. It matters not what the thing desired is, the principle is the same. Only this feeling seems to be more justified as we approach those things which are absolutely necessary to support life,—the “food” and “clothing” of the gospel. Here, if anywhere, the anxiety would be justifiable.

“Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat.” Had he ever felt the pressure of hunger? Did he know what an absorbing want it becomes, how outraged nature cries out? Yes, we are told that he did. He makes a test case right here. He takes this primal need of man, the need of bread, and tells us that even the pressure of that need should not make us doubt or forget God. It is a real need, he acknowledges, not merely an imagined want,—“Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of these things”; but, to recall his own answer to the pressure of that same want, “It is written that man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.” The soul's need of God is deeper than the body's need of bread. It is not that, when we need bread, we are to fold our hands and wait for God to fill our mouths. I see nothing of that spirit in the life of Jesus. I think Paul was not contradicting the spirit or teaching of Jesus when he wrote to the Thessalonians that, “if any would not work, neither should he eat.” It is right that man should work for his bread. The command is not, “Do not work for your bread,” but, “Take no thought for the morrow”; or, as the revised version has it, “Be not anxious for the morrow.” It is lack of trust that is rebuked.

So I find here not asceticism and not condemnation of prudence, but that trusting spirit which is certain that righteousness is more to be desired and prized than riches, and which, having done all, is ready to leave results with God, knowing that, if the first search is for the kingdom of God and his righteousness, no evil can befall him that he shall not have abundant strength to bear. The real thought of the passage is, to me, independent of the mere form in which it is expressed, is neither carelessness nor idleness, but simple trust, which may be active and energetic as you will,—a simple trust which is ready to take life one day at a time, doing always the nearest duty, and not being over-anxious about to-morrow's burdens and to-morrow's needs. The last sentence of the chapter, “Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof,” used to trouble me greatly, seemed to mar the beauty of the chapter as a whole. Now it seems to me to throw considerable light on the meaning and application of our text. It is as if the command were addressed to some one of those persons who are continually borrowing trouble from the future and adding it to the burden they have to bear to-day. Each day has its own evil, its suffering, its dangers, its burdens. Why be concerned beyond to-day, and take upon thyself the burden of two days? I know there is another aspect to the matter,—that there are anxieties for the morrow which have true nobility in them; but I wish you to see the truth of this aspect as well, and the very practical benefits that follow obedience to the injunction of our text.

“Be not anxious for the morrow.” It is merely another form of the motto, “One day at a time.” It is, or may be, a bugle-call to duty in the present: it certainly sanctions no postponement of action, no putting off until to-morrow what you can do to-day. So, although the text primarily refers to fears for the future, I wish to speak as if it included hopes for the future as well; for the motto, “One day at a time,” is a good one in both connections. It suggests the importance of the present opportunity, implies that to-day demands our whole attention, our whole strength. One trouble with too much thought for the future is precisely that it may lead us to lose the present and what it can give us. We postpone our existence while we wait for the to-morrow that never comes. We cannot live in the future and the present at the same time: action belongs only to the present; and, if we are to act, it must be now. Dreaming of the future may be pleasant, as well as overwhelming; but it is not fruitful. The call is, “Act, act in the living present.” Each day brings opportunities with it: do not scorn them. Let me read you a few stanzas that seem to have sprung out of experience:—

“Why do we heap huge mounds of years
Before us and behind,
And scorn the little days that pass
Like angels in the wind,
“Each turning round a small, sweet face,
As beautiful as near?
Because it has so small a face
We will not see it clear.

“We will not clasp it as it flies,
And kiss its lip and brow;
We will not bathe our wearied souls
In its delicious now.
“And so it turns from us, and goes
Away in sad disdain:
Though we would give our lives for it,
It never comes again.”

So far, then, as taking thought for the morrow empties the present for us, let us, as we are bidden, “take no thought for the morrow.”

This kind of thought for the morrow empties the present to enrich the imagined future: the “anxiety for the morrow” of our text borrows from the future to overburden the present, and then sinks beneath the load. Have you never known people who groaned under this double burden? Or, rather, do you know any one who is entirely free from it, any one who does not need a deeper faith and trust in God's goodness and love? I have known one or two saints whose trust seemed absolute, who truly had no anxiety as to what the future might bring forth; and in these cases anxiety would have seemed inevitable to the ordinary observer. To them God was not a mere abstraction, but a loving Father, a very present help in time of need, to whom they might go and receive daily strength for daily needs. Such lives are better explanations of the text than all the sermons that have been written on it.

But most of us either have no real faith or else have so much doubt-mixed with it that it is hardly worth the name. Well might Jesus say to his hearers, “O ye of little faith!” This lack of faith manifests itself alike in most important concerns and in matters trivial, in that pessimism which sees evil at the heart of things and in the fretful spirit which cumbers itself with the cares and trials of the morrow. Many a noble, self-sacrificing spirit is robbed of half its graciousness just because its possessor cannot live one day at a time, cannot trust for what it cannot see. Some of you know how hard it is to live with one who has this doubting, fretful disposition,—how it manages to let fall a drop of bitterness in every cup of joy, and to put heavier burdens on the already heavily laden soul. The friend may be helpful and loving,—these borrowers of trouble often are; but this very fact may multiply his anticipations of evil for you, and lead to greater energy in borrowing trouble.

These anticipations of evil are as hard to bear, oftentimes, as the reality would be. Indeed, the actual occurrence of the dreaded evil is sometimes a positive relief to the overwrought expectation.

“It's never to-day which the spirit breaks:
It's the darkened future without a gleam.”

Oh, if these burdened souls could only take to themselves the true meaning of “Be not anxious for the morrow”; or, rather, if they could only share the trust of him who uttered those words! The man or woman whose daily task is hard, whose strength just suffices for the day's duties, who is weary of the treadmill existence forced upon him, is lost if he lets the thought of the coming weeks and years, each just like the last, or, as his fancy paints it, worse than the last, take hold upon him. It is the old story of the discontented pendulum over again. The task is too overwhelming; and we faint at the thought of it, leaving the present portion that we could do undone.

WOULD YOU HAVE THE HANDSOMEST
GLOVES?
THEN WEAR ONLY THE
GENUINE DUCHESS,
Which come in all the popular styles, dressed and undressed Kid, button and Foster lace, long and short wrists,
And cost no more than other makes.
CALL AND INSPECT, OR SEND FOR CATALOGUE.
All Gloves fitted when desired, and every pair warranted.
CHANDLER & CO.,
SOLE AGENTS,
WINTER ST., BOSTON.
Agency Dr Jaeger Sanitary Woollen System.

But, as the realization of the fact that its overwhelming task required only one swing at a time, and that it had a whole second for each swing, set the pendulum at work again, so the realization (not the mere thought) that we are called upon to live our life and do our duties only one day at a time may give us new heart.

There is a further promise which I firmly believe to be true,—that, as our days are, so shall our strength be. It may not seem true to you all: it has proved true to me. If we seek for strength from the Source of all strength, we shall receive sufficient for the days as they come to us. God requires from man only what man has power to accomplish. We say we could not bear certain troubles,—that the pain and shame would kill us. Yet those troubles come; and we do bear them, and do not die because of the experience. We may even pray for death, as Elijah did; and yet the boon is not granted, and we learn to bear the burden instead of getting rid of it. And yet we will not learn by experience, but continue to doubt and fret.

Another very real burden with many is the uncertainty of the future, the ignorance of what a day may bring forth, what changed duties may meet them. They cannot walk by faith, but must see their way, even its distant portions. After some great loss or sorrow which closes certain paths we had hoped to tread, when certain duties which had become a part of our very life are suddenly taken from us, we stand bewildered, and ask: "What can I do? What can life bring me? What is my duty now?" Something of this feeling, consciously or unconsciously, I think, comes into every life whose course is suddenly changed either by the death of one whose life was closely knit up with it or by arrival, at some conviction which undermines our present position, and puts us in a new attitude toward the world. In all such cases the tendency is to look too far away for an answer, to try to settle too much, the future as well as the present. Probably darkness stares us in the face: we see no goal toward which we must press. But by and by the immediate present forces itself upon us; and, lo! we see one step clear before us,—some simple, every-day duty, perhaps, but still clearly a duty. As we think of our great loss, or of the seemingly barren years stretching out before us, it may seem as if it mattered little whether the duty was done or not. But, if we take it up bravely, not letting the darkness of the future overwhelm us, it is wonderful how our strength increases and how the way opens before us. Only a step at a time, the goal still shrouded in darkness, but always one step for us to take.

And, strangely enough,—providentially, I believe,—the very best preparation for future steps, in fact, the only adequate preparation, is that we take this step now. The best way to make sure of the morrow's strength is to put our whole strength into the task of to-day. "Therefore, be ye not anxious for the morrow; for the morrow will be anxious for itself." A wise command, truly, and a practical one! Only how can we obey it? By using what faith we have, and thus increasing it, by laying hold of the eternal verities, and, in the midst of broken and shifting lights, which only cast fitful gleams into the darkness of the future, trusting that "underneath are the Everlasting Arms," and that we cannot stray beyond the reach of God's love and care. One who does this will still have to meet trials and sorrows, will still have crosses to bear, but will also be strong with the strength of the living God, not anxious for to-morrow, but obedient for to-day.

"Lord, for to-morrow and its needs
I do not pray;
Keep me from stain of sin
Just for to-day.

"Let me both diligently work,
And duly pray;
Let me be kind in word and deed
Just for to-day.

"Let me be slow to do my will,
Prompt thine to obey:
Help me to sacrifice myself
Just for to-day.

"Let me no wrong or idle word
Unthinking say:
Set thou a seal upon my lips
Just for to-day.

"So for to-morrow and its needs
I do not pray;
But keep me, guide me, help me, Lord,
Just for to-day."

THE REFORMER.

Before the monstrous wrong he sets him down,—
One man against a stone-walled city of sin.
For centuries those walls have been a-building;
Smooth porphyry, they slope and coldly glass
The flying storm and wheeling sun. No chink,
No crevice, lets the thinnest arrow in.
He fights alone, and from the cloudy ramparts
A thousand evil faces gibe and jeer him.
Let him lie down and die: what is the right,
And where is justice, in a world like this?

But by and by earth shakes herself, impatient;
And down, in one great roar of ruin, crash
Watch-tower and citadel and battlements.
When the red dust has cleared, the lonely soldier Stands with strange thoughts beneath the friendly stars.

—E. R. SILL.

Sermon Gleanings.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF ETHICAL FORCES.

BY REV. T. T. MUNGER.

The most striking feature of the day is the development of new forces. It is so great that there is simply no end to it. We no longer prophesy: prophecy cannot measure probability. Any day may bring out something that will revolutionize the face of the globe and society as a consequence. We who work in moral ways are slow to see that possibly the same thing may be true in our world. It has hardly occurred to us that, as the earth under our feet is stored with undeveloped forces, so the moral world may have lodged within it energies peculiar to itself not yet realized. We have rather assumed that we have a complete system, full and strong enough for whatever is to be done. And we are sometimes disposed to decry any attempts to enlarge or even alter it. But see what is going on in the realm of material invention. Every day fresh developments of power and new combinations of forces. Nothing is created, only discovered. So in our world and work is it not possible that we could take some of our elemental truths and bring them into a stronger working form, or so unite one truth with another that they shall develop a new moral force? Let me make a few suggestions in this direction.

The first is that there is a vast amount of moral force and encouragement lodged in the truth of divine sovereignty—I use the term not in a theological, but rather in a dynamic sense—that has not yet been brought out, and awaits development.

The strong religions have always contended for this doctrine as a primary and fundamental truth. Whatever becomes of human freedom, we must have divine sovereignty, whatever metaphysical and practical difficulties lie in the way. It has always been full of comfort and power, but we are permitted to see it to-day in a way that adds immensely to its practical value. It is no longer solely a matter of revelation or an inference from history: it is a fact of science, which at last, as a scientific necessity, rests the whole movement of creation and the order of the world on the will of God. This is as well established as gravitation or chemical affinity. Natural selection, always held in a critical way, becomes subordinate to this older and newer truth of the divine Will and Purpose. Its method is by evolution.

It is one of the chief consolations and encouragements of earnest workers for the uplifting of society that they are laboring under such a law as this. The same power that lifted the continents out of the waters is raising mankind to higher conditions. It is the divine Will working toward a full realization of itself,—the divine working for the divine. The course of the world is simply a realization of the will of God. By its very nature it is always pressing toward higher forms, from chaos to order, from simplicity to complexity, from life to more life,—all tending to the production of the brain which crowns and covers man like a dome. Now begins a moral order. Heart takes its full place beside the will. Out of relationship springs the sense of duty,—conscience spread over life. The sacredness of the world and of man and of society begins to be felt, the vision of God comes with clearness, and love divine and human is on the stage.

The significance of this process or progress lies in the fact that it has been going on from the beginning,—one movement, one thought, one purpose, one will behind and in it all: it is divine sovereignty on its proper scale. But see where it points, —to minds, perhaps, you say. No, to the moral and spiritual. If the movement is not a delusion, it must reach such a stage: otherwise, God would stop short of himself. We have been taught to think that man will preserve about the same proportions as to natural qualities; that his type is pretty well fixed; that human nature will not greatly change; that he will go on contending for himself, unselfish only so far as religion requires it. This old question has become a very new one, and is the most vital in, at least, three sciences,—biology, sociology, and theology. Christ anticipated them all, and made the decision in his own person. He fixed the bounds of the developing universe by loving his neighbor as himself even to the point of total self-sacrifice and by oneness with God in the spirit. In him is revealed the destiny of society, ages ahead of us, but a goal toward which the same Power that created the heavens and the earth and made man in his own image is leading the world. Man will not become a different kind of being: the type will not change, but the type will be developed. We have but an imperfect idea as yet what kind of a being man is. We only know that there are in him certain things, potential qualities, that have had so far no adequate expression. Who will say that the forces represented under the general term "religion," and more particularly that quality known in religion as "love" and in science as "altruism," have had so far any due and adequate part in human life and conduct? This side of man's history lies in the future. The day will come, and is fast coming. It is as sure as that God is himself.

The question now comes up, how we are to co-operate with this world movement, how we are to insert our agency into a process so mighty that it seems not to need it.

My first answer is, by insisting in all our work on the ideal, tempering it with practical wisdom.

It will never do to lose sight of the ideal. When we do that, we forget our own nature and the nature of the work in which we are engaged. We are made after the power of an endless life, and our task is the regeneration of human society. The workers and the work are thus correlated to an ideal achievement. It will not be fulfilled until a regenerated humanity is delivered up to God, that he may be all and in all,—dear and religious words, easily translated into the language of science; for science is also keyed to moral perfection.

But, while we contend for the ideal, we must not forget that it lies afar off and at the end of things. We cherish the ideal because it is stored with hidden forces that may be drawn out and used, but only in a certain order. The higher conditions the lower: we must never forget that; but it is also conditioned by the lower, and this also we must never forget. To recognize this condition, and so manage it that it shall do its work, and then give way to the higher, is well-nigh the sum of practical wisdom. Goethe says, in substance, "Greatness depends on knowing your limitations." It is true also of reforms: they must know their limitations. Moral and social reforms are beset by two enemies,—those who thrive on the evils that are attacked, and idealists who will have everything or nothing. It is not unjust to say that the latter often inflict the most injury. Social reform is a battle. In our own country the opposing side, the fighting force, is greed,—not ambition nor love of power, but pure and simple love of money. "To this complexion have we come at last." While it represents the depths of vulgarity and baseness, and is a powerful enemy, it could be successfully fought if there were agreement on the other side. What is more melancholy than the history of the temperance question during the last forty years,—every possible advance thwarted by divided opinion in the ranks of reform! As the result, the saloon holds the field, and bids fair to hold it until idealists cease to play into its hands, and begin to co-operate with those who are ready to undertake what is possible, but not what is impossible.

The plea of the idealist is conscience; but conscience waits not alone on the ideal, but also on the possible. Rev. Charles Gore aptly says: "No truth can degenerate into a greater lie than that it is a man's first duty to follow his conscience. A man's duty is to enlighten his conscience." To insist on the ideal because the indorsement of anything short of it is an offence to conscience is a blind misuse of conscience. It is a denial of progress, which is by steps and stages, and of the law of growth,—first the blade, then the ear, and at last the full corn in the ear. It overlooks the truth wrapped up in the saying that God winked at times of ignorance.

JOEL GOLDTHWAIT & CO.

Oriental Carpets and Rugs, Axminsters, Wilton, and Brussels Carpets.

We are now ready to show the finest line we ever opened in Foreign and Domestic Carpets.

All new in style, and adapted to the present furnishings.

OUR OWN SPECIAL PATTERNS.

Our open stock is full at prices lower than ever.

JOEL GOLDTHWAIT & CO.,

163 to 169 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON.

(NEAR CORNHILL.)

Brass Bedsteads.

It has been observed that in cards a deal depends upon good playing, and good playing depends upon a good deal. In furniture you depend upon a good bed, and a good bed depends upon you.

It depends upon your good sense. And that is only another name for your true realization of values. If a brass bedstead will last a lifetime and by its nature and construction cannot become soiled, or unclean or musty or broken, it is cheaper than a wooden bed at one-half the cost.

We were the first house in this section to bring down the prices on Brass Bedsteads. We have led the reduction at every stage. We sell Brass Bedsteads to-day at lower figures than any other firm in New England. You can save from $3 to $25 on each bedstead. A large line on exhibition.

PAINÉ FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

The choice between the possible and the ideal is often difficult: it is not easy to know where to draw the line. I know of no better rule than to keep one's eye on the ideal, but not to insist on it. Meditate on it, cherish it, enshrine it in your hearts. Let it be a temple where you go to pray and refresh your spirit; but, when you come out, face the world as it is, and do the best you can. Only do something,—the one, first, eternal requisite in all human undertaking. It is a long and weary path that humanity has to tread. The spires of the golden city shine in the distance, but are reached only by a path that sometimes drops into low valleys, sometimes winds as if it turned back; and every step is so short that progress is seen only by faith. But, meanwhile, we may rest confidently in the reality of the ideal and draw in its inspiration. If the kingdom were not to come, if society were not to be regenerated, little heart would be left us even to deliberate on the evils of the world, and none at all for resisting them. We are not striving to overcome certain abuses, but to deliver from all evil.

The second suggestion is that we should press the altruistic principle into the fullest possible use.

The time has come for ascending into the higher forms of human helpfulness and service. The door that opens and no man shuts is turning on its hinges, and we catch glimpses of that world in which the love of God is man's rule of conduct. The peculiarity of the end of the age is a tendency to think correctly. The glamour of Greek art and ideals, the art for art's sake hallucination, the conscienceless literature,—each with its deep and subtle selfishness,—are passing by, dying of their own emptiness. The world has no more use for them. The age of agnosticism, with its paralysis of the moral nature, is also passing. Its vision of a godless universe is ending,

“And on the glimmering limit far withdrawn
God makes himself an awful rose of dawn.”

A clearer faith, a more altruistic service,—these are the signs we see in our sky. God and duty, Christ and the Christ-life,—these are now before us, not merely under the form of the Church, but also as the revelation of science and the product of thought. The developing world is drawing nigh to the Life that was lived under the Syrian sky. We are actually taking into our thought and turning over as something worth testing the idea that not struggle for existence, but love, is the law of the world. Mr. Kidd does great mischief when he relegates this truth to the super-rational realm. It is instead the very soul of reason: it is the burden and secret of nature, only we have not clearly seen it. That my neighbor is as real as myself, and that, therefore, it is my duty to love him as myself, is unquestionable logic; but we have not fully thought it out.

It only remains to apply this truth to society. My suggestion is that we should press it, crowd it upon the world as fast as we can. There is already more of it than most of us suspect. There is, in some quarters, fear lest it will work deterioration of character by weakening self-reliance. It is urged that it is better to leave men to the laws by which the deserving win and the weak fail; that what is needed and aimed at is a world full of strong men, and not a world full of patched-up, weak ones,—questions on which we will not now enter, only remarking that we must be careful how we handle these great words; careful also lest we find ourselves repeating the worn-out catchwords of past ages, deaf to some heaven-born words that are fast finding their way into the vocabulary of modern thought. It is unfortunate that, whenever the word “love” is used, it is thought to imply a sentiment or a gift. It is a sentiment, and it may imply a gift; but it is more than either or both. Neither indicates its prime function. This, I should say, is to secure a full individualism as a basis for the social system. Its first and main aim is to strengthen the man himself. And the chief work it has to do is to take off the burdens and root out the evils that now crush men into misery and weakness. If I were to look into the Scriptures for the word that best describes the task that lies before social reform, it would be that spoken at the grave of Lazarus,—“Loose him, and let him go.” Make a living man of him, unbind him, and he will take care of himself. When that is done, social science may take him and fix his place in the social fabric. At present and for a long time to come the main business of reform will be to work out those evils that have made men weak and defeated their manhood. It does not presume to wage a contest with nature, in order to save those whom it were better should not be saved. Its contest is with the evils that have brought about an abnormal state of society and filled it with abnormal men. Let it be as it will and must with these: love will do its uttermost for them; but the main thing it has to do is to stop the processes that are turning out generation after generation of bruised and maimed and thwarted humanity. Such is the work of altruistic reform,—not the ideal fantasies of Mr. Howells, nor the vagaries of Mr. Bellamy, nor the reduction of society to one vast man, as socialism would have it, but rather such an improvement of social conditions that individualism shall have full play.

Thus character becomes possible,—the only logical explanation of humanity, the only achievement worth striving for.

“If this fail,
The pillar'd firmament is rottenness,
And earth's base built on stubble.”

Literature.

“THE CHAUNCEY HALL SCHOOL.”*

The story of a private school which has attained to nearly seventy years of existence, and averaged more than two hundred pupils during that long period, and which, from its institution in 1828 by the late Gideon F. Thayer until this day, has been distinguished for high educational ideals and original methods, must possess much interest for its graduates and the general public. Chauncey Hall is a name endeared to successive generations of Bostonians especially. In the appendices to this little work will be found names which represent the best social and business traditions of the city, together with eminent examples of her culture, character, and good citizenship. It is a record of usefulness and noble purpose of which any institution might be proud. No one is more competent to give it literary expression than the able educator whose fifty years of service as teacher and principal of Chauncey Hall are perhaps its brightest chapter, and who now, in a vigorous and honored old age, his eye not dim nor his natural strength abated, is spared to be the chronicler of its annals. If there is any fault to find with the book, it is that Mr. Cushing has spoken all too modestly of his own large share in the development and efficiency of the school.

He pays a deserved and generous tribute to its founder, his long-time associate,—the late Gideon F. Thayer,—a man of sterling character and many gifts as an educator. It was the happy fortune of the present writer to have received his early education at Chauncey Hall during the decade so important in its history between the years 1850-60. These witnessed the close of Mr. Thayer's long term of service, the assumption of the full direction of the school by Mr. Cushing, the first connection of Mr. W. H. Ladd with its faculty, together with other notable changes in its personnel and methods. Valuable as were the educational opportunities of the school in that day, the chief benefit conferred upon its pupils was the privilege of coming under the personal influence of such trained scholars and high-minded and earnest men.

Chauncey Hall was founded in 1828 by Mr. Thayer, who had ideas of his own, in advance of the current educational methods. This was ten or fifteen years before the reforms in the public school system of New England, introduced by Horace Mann and his associates. The existing schools were characterized by poor accommodations as regarded the comfort and health of their pupils, imperfect apparatus, even a blackboard being rare, severe discipline, poorly paid teachers, and courses of instruction either unduly classical or purely practical. What redeemed them was the fine personal endowment and lofty purpose of their principal, among whom names like the late N. A. Gould, George B. Emerson, and E. S. Dixwell awaken grateful memories.

Mr. Thayer rightly judged that there was

* HISTORICAL SKETCH OF CHAUNCEY HALL SCHOOL, 1828 to 1894. By Thomas Cushing. Boston,

need and room in Boston for a school based on the new methods in education which were being discussed in Boston, and which private initiative could more readily introduce than public. Already, in 1820, he opened in a room in the rear of the old Province House, off Washington Street, a school of this character. Among other improvements he opened, in connection with it, the first gymnasium attached to a school in Boston. His ideas met with favor, and an increase of pupils led to an extension of his plans. A site in Chauncey Place, next the First Church, was secured, and a building erected which was a notable advance on the school architecture in vogue at that day. A cut of this building—since torn down, together with its neighbor, the stately First Church, to meet the encroachments of business—prefaces the book. It will be a pleasant reminder to many old-time pupils of profitable and happy hours spent within its walls. It was, indeed, an ideal location for a school. A brick wall, afterwards replaced by a light iron trellis, in those days stretched across Chauncey Street, and forbade the passage of vehicles. The quiet court was only invaded by romping school-boys, and on Sundays by the decorous congregation, where to-day is a crowded and noisy thoroughfare. Great chestnut-trees shaded street and playground. The latter, from want of space and off-time stress of weather, was situated chiefly under the school building, which rose on solid granite piers over it to the height of three stories. In the rear of the school site, where is now Hovey & Co.'s store, was then the beautiful tree-shaded garden of an old estate. On the south was another large garden, with the residence of Judge Jackson.

In this structure many of Mr. Thayer's educational ideas were made actual. Besides the large hall in the third story, which was the general assembly-room of the school, there were four or five classrooms, each devoted to its special department of instruction. Classes went in rotation from the hall to these rooms and back again. This simple and now familiar system of class instruction in separate rooms was, fifty or sixty years ago, a great novelty. The construction of school edifices up to that time would not have permitted it.

Other innovations were the convenient, separate desks, with their comfortable chairs, the ample blackboards on the walls of every recitation-room, the maps, globes, and philosophical apparatus, the natural history collection, the hot-air furnace, then a great rarity, etc.

The system of teaching, also, was a notable improvement in many ways over existing models. The departmental instruction already referred to, the milder and more paternal discipline, the opening half-hour of moral instruction and devotional exercise, which served to bring the ennobling influence of the principal close to the heart and conscience of his pupils, the increased attention to drawing, singing, and natural science, the medal system, and especially the substitution of masterpieces of English literature by Irving, Scott, and Shakspeare for the dull reading books in common use, were characteristic features of Chauncey Hall. To Mr. William Russell, the gifted teacher of elocution and rhetoric, and author of text-books highly prized by a former generation, the eminence which the school attained in the department of English was largely due. One of the most distinguished of the graduates of Chauncey Hall, the historian, Francis Parkman, has borne grateful tribute to his merits as an instructor and a man. Later generations of pupils cherish much the same feeling of gratitude toward one of his successors in that department, Mr. William H. Ladd, who, as teacher and principal, has now been connected with the school since 1855. One of the characteristics of the school has been the long terms of service of its teaching force. Besides the principals referred to, Prof. Gaetano Lanza taught in the language department for seventeen years, and Prof. J. B. Torricelli, to whose beloved memory a just tribute is paid, twenty-four years. Oliver F. Bryant served thirty-four years, Horace Chapin, most amiable and faithful of men, twenty-four years. To crown this record, Miss Susan D. Nickerson rounded out in 1889 forty-eight years of service as head of the preparatory department, and has left in thousands of minds, made wiser and better by her instruction, the imperishable testimony to her goodness and devotion.

As the years went on, the reputation of the school increased. Many of the best families of Boston sent their children to it. The appendix to the book contains the names of thousands of pupils, and it is noteworthy how often the same family name is repeated, parents, children, and grandchildren in succession having received their education at Chauncey Hall. Indeed, the list may fitly be termed an anthology of the leading families of the city. In later years there has been a manifest preference for Chauncey Hall, also, on the part of the more cultivated foreign-born citizens of Boston. The list of pupils includes many who entered Harvard and other colleges, and in later life won distinction in business and the professions. Among them we note Horatio Hale, the philologist, Rev. Rufus Ellis, D.D., late pastor of the First Church, Henry T. Tuckerman, the author, James Jackson Jarves, the art critic, Francis Parkman, the historian, Rev. John Weiss, the brilliant preacher, Alice Stone Blackwell, Rev. William C. Gannett, Rev. F. H. Hinckley, Dr. Reginald H. Fitz, T. E. Chickering, John Lowell, Henry Lee Higginson, Curtis Guild, Gen. G. W. Colamore, Gen. Hazard Stevens, Arthur Fuller, H. S. Burrage, Lieut. J. A. Perkins, Lieut. Henry Ropes, Col. C. E. Griswold, and many another of whom Boston has reason to be proud.

The connection of Mr. Thomas Cushing with the school began with its inception in 1828. At the time of his assumption of the principalship, in 1855, Chauncey Hall, largely through his efforts, had become one of the leading educational establishments of the country,—a rank it has ever since maintained. This is not the place to speak of Mr. Cushing's admirable work as an instructor, or the lasting and ennobling impression which his strong character produced upon the thousands of boys who came under his care. The memory of his vigorous manhood, his inflexible justice, and his untiring devotion to his pupils, is written indelibly in their hearts, and is one of the most cherished traditions of the school. The latter has survived his withdrawal in 1879, the episode of the Civil War, which drafted so many youth into the army, the encroachments of business and the great fire, which, twice in succession, compelled it to seek other quarters. In its present admirably appointed building in Copley Square, with a large force of teachers and an increased number of pupils, it keeps up the honorable traditions of its past. True to the spirit which actuated its founders, it has made many innovations, when these were dictated by the highest welfare of its pupils. The other sex is no longer debarred entrance. Since 1858 girls sit side by side with boys in the school-room. There are women teachers as well as men. Indeed, one of the present principals of the school is a woman, Miss Mary H. Ladd, while a sister, Miss Harriet Ladd, has been an instructor since 1864. A military battalion holds its daily drill, a kindergarten

Flowers flourish in the Sunlight, which brightens and gladdens everyone, and cheers up the tired housewife by relieving her of the terrors of the old time “wash day,” bringing brightness and comfort into the home and making her happy and cheerful.

Sunlight Soap

Less labor
Greater comfort

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Streets, New York.

and normal training school have been added. The outlook for another prosperous seventy years seems assured.

The most impressive of the appendices of the book is a roll of honor containing the names and military record of two hundred and thirty-four former pupils of Chauncey Hall, who gave themselves to their country in her hour of need. It is a chapter in the history of the school of which it may well be proud. A portrait of the founder, Mr. Thayer, displays his fine, noble countenance. To some old scholars it would bear an even stronger resemblance to the original if it reproduced the famous gold crown-tipped pencil with which the good man was wont to rap his mild counsel into their dull pates. The absence of a likeness of Mr. Cushing is to be regretted. We are glad to learn that, yielding to a general desire on the part of his old-time pupils, he consents to supply the portrait to those that desire it.

CHARLES W. WENDTE.

The Magazines.

The Kindergarten Magazine is always of interest to those interested in this form of educational work, whether practical workers or not. The notes about the kindergarten meeting at Denver in July are full and interesting, containing many suggestions of value; and an article by Amalie Hofer on "The Social Settlement and the Kindergarten" is well worth reading, even in the present abundance of similar ones.

Lend a Hand for September continues its work of informing the people about the progress that is being made in educational and philanthropic directions. Chautauqua, the school savings-bank system, the Calhoun Colored School, and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences come in for the main share of attention this month; while John Visher of Chicago discusses "Philanthropy as a Social Factor," and Prof. J. J. McCook writes of "The Tramp Problem" and of helps toward its solution. "Manual Training for the Feeble-minded" is an extract from an address by Mrs. Isabel C. Barrows delivered before the Association of Medical Officers of American Institutions for Idiotic and Feeble-minded.

The leading articles of the Arena for September are a continuation of Helen Gardiner's "A Battle for Sound Morality," treating of recent legislation in Colorado, Nebraska, and Missouri, and "Marvels of Electricity," by Prof. J. R. Buchanan, which maintains that electricity is a master of psychic as well as physical life, and opens wonderful possibilities. Another scientific article is "How Evolution Evolves," by Stinson Jarvis. Henry Wood writes of "Omnipresent Divinity"; Prof. Frank Parsons writes of the electric lighting in different places, aiming to show its actual cost; Rev. Marion D. Shutter traces "Progressive Changes in Universalist Thought,"—a subject which he is well qualified to treat; and a symposium of seven ministers, discussing Prof. George D. Herron and his work in California, will also be of interest to many.

September's Forum opens with a manly article by Theodore Roosevelt on "The Enforcement of Law," recounting points in the recent political situation in New York and in the opposition that met the attempts to have the statutes honestly maintained. "Municipal Progress and the Living Wage," by D. G. McMeans, "The Benefits of Hard Times," by Edward Atkinson, and "Unsanitary Schools and Public Indifference," by Dr. Douglas H. Stewart, are the articles chiefly concerned with present social questions. Clarence King argues for a better understanding of the Cuban question, believing that the United States should give Cuba the aid she needs. Richard H. Hutton, editor of the London Spectator, writes of Prof. Huxley; and Frederick Harrison's article on "George Eliot's Place in Literature" is also of interest to the general reader. "Methods and Difficulties of Child Study" are treated by Mrs. Annie Howes Barus.

In the North American Review for September the Bishop of Albany, William Croswell Doane, tries to explain "Why Women do not want the Ballot." He does not argue, wishing merely to assert the basic principles of the case, which in his mind are the following: first, suffrage is not a right, but a privilege; second, women who are taxed are already represented "by their relatives, by their potent influence, and by men's sense of justice"; third, overstocked professions and neglected duties would be the result if "this unnatural idea" of equal suffrage should be successful; and, finally, less employment and lower pay would result likewise. He then notes the probable dangers that religion would be dragged into politics, that violence of partisanship would be fostered and the family relations put in peril. It will be interesting to keep this article for future reference. "Reminiscences of Prof. Huxley," by Sir William H. Flower, Huxley's friend for forty years, is interesting and clear. "The Christian Endeavor Movement" is explained by the president, Rev. Francis E. Clarke, D.D. Robert H. Thurston of Cornell College traces "The Trend of National Progress" with charts and figures, the study of which leads to important and most promising conclusions. Max O'Rell shows the present danger of American democracy from the general willingness to endure bullying and snubbing from servants of the public. "The African Problem" is ably and temperately discussed by Edward W. Blyden, minister to the Court of St. James from Liberia, and probably the most learned of Negroes, whose opinions on many subjects are generally accepted as authoritative. This unusually interesting number contains other articles that deserve mention.

Literary Notes.

Roberts Brothers have put together in book form Rev. Philip Stafford Moxom's "Lowell Lectures" of last year, with the title "From Jerusalem to Nicæa."

Mrs. C. Emma Cheney, wife of Bishop Cheney of Chicago, has written a book which A. C. McClurg & Co. will soon publish, entitled "Number 49 Tinkham Street." It describes the working of a Christian social settlement to show the benefit to society of a mingling of the poor and ignorant with men and women of education and refinement.

Among graphic methods of illustrating the Sunday-school lesson, the sand-map is now used in many progressive schools. Miss Juliet E. Dimock has become known as an expert in the use of this form of lesson illustration. She has written an article for the Sunday School Times, in which she describes the making of a sand-map and its varied uses.

The "North-western European" edition of the Minneapolis Times contains over a hundred closely printed pages of information about the North-western States, the opportunities and advantages they possess, and the advance they have made. Climate, soil, lands, stock interests, dairying, lumber, mineral wealth, fuel, transportation, education, and other subjects are fully treated.

Under the title, "The Elia Series," G. P. Putnam's Sons will issue a series of famous books, offered as specimens of the best literature and of artistic typography and book-making. The first group of the series will comprise Lamb's "Essays of Elia," "The Discourses of Epictetus," Ruskin's "Sesame and Lilies," Franklin's "Autobiography," and Long's translation of "The Thoughts of Marcus Aurelius."

"The Journal of the Countess Krasinska in the Eighteenth Century" is soon to be published by A. C. McClurg & Co. The author was the great-great-grandmother of both the present rulers of Italy; and her journal is filled with interesting events of her own life and of the times in which she lived. The personality of the countess is confirmed by the excellent frontispiece portrait, after the original painting by Angelica Kauffmann.

The Open Court Publishing Company of Chicago announces for publication early in October a highly unique collection of popular sketches of the religious and secular history of Israel by Prof. C. H. Cornill, one of the foremost orthodox authorities on Old Testament history in Europe. This book will embody all the results of the new higher criticism, and will be written in a spirit of the highest and most enthusiastic reverence for the religious aspects of its subject.

Messrs. A. C. McClurg & Co. have in press a book by the late Ward H. Lamon, entitled "Recollections of Abraham Lincoln, 1847-65." All readers of current history know the close relation that existed between Mr. Lincoln and his old friend, Mr. Lamon. This work contains much new material. The chapter on what has been called "The Antietam Episode" is said to be especially interesting and reliable; for the author was not only present, but took a leading part in that affair. The book is carefully compiled by Miss Dorothy Lamon.

Miss Milicent W. Shinn, formerly editor of the Overland Monthly, has been studying a subject that has lately called out some speculation, "The Marriage Rate of College Women." She has carefully gathered statistics from all of the women's colleges of the country; and these she includes in an article with the above title, written for the October number of the Century. She finds the ultimate probability of a college woman's marriage to be below 55 per cent. against 90 per cent. for other women,—not quite two-thirds as great. Location has something to do with the question. The college women marry most in the Middle West, and least in the North Atlantic States. The reason is largely because they are employed as teachers in girls' schools,—a station in life more inimical to marriage than any other save that of a nun.

Books Received.

From the Arena Publishing Company, Boston.
Song Blossoms. By Julia Anna Wolcott.
From Ginn & Co., Boston.
Responsive Readings. Selected from the Bible and arranged under subjects for Common Worship. Price 85 cents.
From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.
Morelli. A Sketch of the Life and Work of the Painter, Domenico Morelli, with Eight Heliotypes. By Ashton R. Willard. Price $1.25.
The Madonna of the Tuba. By Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. Price 75 cents.
The Whittier Year-book. Passages from the Work and Prose of John Greenleaf Whittier, chosen for the daily food of the lover of thought and beauty. Price $1.00.
From D. Appleton & Co., New York.
The Stark Munro Letters. Edited and arranged by A. Conan Doyle. Price $1.50.
From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.
A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Judges. By George Foot Moore. Price $3.00.
A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. By Rev. Wm. Sanday, D.D., LL.D., and Rev. Arthur C. Headlam, B.D. Price $3.00.
Margaret Winthrop. By Alice Morse Earle. Price $1.25.
From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.
Elizabeth's Pretenders. By Hamilton Aidé. Price 50 cents.
From Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York.
Zoraida. A Romance of the Harem and the Great Sahara. From the Central Conference of American Rabbis.
The Union Prayer-book for Jewish Worship. Part I. The Union Prayer-book for Jewish Worship. Part II.
From Harper & Wallis, Columbus, Ohio.
The Forces of Nature. A Study of Natural Phenomena. By Herbert B. Harrop and Louis A. Wallis.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.
Savoy March. Two-step. By John Francis Gilder. Price 50 cts.
The Passing of the King. Song. By J. C. Macy. Price 50 cts.
The Summer Girl. Two-step. By H. M. Capps.
Mazle. Words and music by J. Ed. Lakeman.
Angel-land. Song. Words by F. E. Weatherly.
Hidden. Words by S. T. Livingston. Music by Gertrude H. Swift.
Violet Polka Mazurka. Composed for Guitar. By C. de Janon.
Up to Date. Waltzes. By Rudolph Aronson.
I'll tell your Mother on you; or, You can't bite my Apple. Words by Flora Meyers. Music by Collin Coe.
Girl who owns my Heart. Song. Words by George Cooper. Music by Chas. E. Pratt.
Sweet Little Mary. Song. Words and music by Alfred Wooler.
When de Shadow of de Moon am on de Levee. Plantation Song. Words and music by Chas. Gardner, Jr.
Irene McNulty. Comic Song. By Chas. Gardner, Jr.

Standard Piano Methods

"Richardson's New Method."
The new edition. Revised, enlarged, and embodying the latest ideas in teaching, including Dr. William Mason's celebrated system of Touch and Technique. The recognized standard among music teachers. 500,000 of the old edition sold. American or foreign fingering. $3.00.
"New England Conservatory Method."
The official book of piano instruction in this famous school. American or foreign fingering. Three Parts, each $1.50; Complete, $3.00.
"Bellaks' Analytical Method."
Paper, 75 Cents; Boards, $1.00.
"Peters' Eclectic Piano Instructor."
Over 300,000 of this standard work sold. $3.00.
"Mason's Pianoforte Technics."
By Wm. Mason and W. S. B. Matthews. $2.50.
"Mason and Hoadley's System for Beginners."
American or foreign fingering. $3.00.
Any book sent postpaid on receipt of price. Descriptive Circulars on application.

Oliver Ditson Company
453-463 Washington St., Boston
C. H. DITSON & CO., N.Y.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,
Author of "A Year of a Miracle," "Blessed be Drudgery," etc. Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. (In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents; 10 copies for 30 cents.)
CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."
In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition, on rich, tinted paper, silk-stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "tuck in with wedding-gifts."
"In 'The House Beautiful,' Rev. Wm. C. Gannett describes, with a rare combination of good sense and poetic insight, the essentials of a beautiful home, giving to flowers, books, and guests, for instance, their due place in its furnishing, while love is the bond that binds all together in gracious influence."—Literary World.
"It is on the side of sincerity, quietness, and simplicity. Meets with our entire approval."—The Critic.
"Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on 'The dear Togetherness' is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. Our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and, if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so."—The New Unity.
Sent postpaid on receipt of price by
JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - - Boston.

The New Church Hymnal!

New, yet old! The popular and loved songs are the best. In the quiet gloom of a lantern service a congregation will sing the old favorites with a vim and power so wonderful that every pastor will recognize that "a new church hymnal" has been discovered. For genuine, hearty congregational singing there is absolutely nothing to compare to the Stereopticon.

RILEY BROTHERS,
Branches: 26 Beekman St., New York.
BOSTON: 244 Washington St. CHICAGO: 196 La Salle St.
KANSAS CITY (Mo.): 515 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS: 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA: 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO: 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND: 411 Couch St.

Another Volume of LOWELL'S POEMS.

MESSRS. HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN AND COMPANY take pleasure in announcing a very interesting volume:—

LAST POEMS OF JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

A volume of admirable and characteristic poems, artistically printed on the best paper, with rubricated title and initials, and exquisitely bound in polished buckram. With a fine new Portrait, regarded by his family as the best likeness of Mr. Lowell in his later years 12mo, $1.25.

A Charm for Every Day. THE WHITTIER YEAR-BOOK.

Passages for Each Day from the Verse and Prose of JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER. A beautiful little book, with a fine new Portrait of Whittier. 16mo, $1.00.
This is of the same character as the Holmes Year-Book, which has been exceedingly popular.

A Notable Book and Life.

TOWNSEND HARRIS, FIRST AMERICAN ENVOY TO JAPAN.

By WILLIAM E. GRIFFIS, D.D., author of "Japan: In History, Folk-Lore, and Art," "The Lily among Thorns," "Brave Little Holland," etc. With Portrait. Crown 8vo, $2.00
The material of Dr. Griffis's book is of very high historic value, and is new to Americans, Europeans, and Japanese. It consists largely of Mr. Harris's journal while Envoy to Japan, and fills the gap in Japanese books between Commodore Perry's work and the treaties made afterward by Japan with the United States and European nations. Mr. Harris's life in New York was exceedingly useful, and is admirably depicted.

A Solution of Present Problems.

CHRIST'S IDEA OF THE SUPERNATURAL.

By Rev. JOHN H. DENISON, D.D. Crown 8vo, $2.00.
Dr. Denison offers this book as a contribution to the solution of pressing problems,—of material phenomena, psychic phenomena (including hypnotism), and spiritual experiences. It is thoughtful, sincere, eloquent, and worthy of the earnest attention of good readers.

A Book about Butterflies.

FRAIL CHILDREN OF THE AIR.

By SAMUEL H. SCUDDER, author of "The Butterflies of the Eastern United States and Canada," etc. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, in decorative binding, $1.50.
Dr. Scudder knows all about butterflies and their life. This book is written in an engaging style; and the reader will have the satisfaction of knowing that, while reading a delightful book, he is following a thoroughly competent guide in fascinating excursions.

A Touching Story Retold.

THE MADONNA OF THE TUBS.

New Popular Edition of one of Miss Phelps's most striking stories. With Illustrations. Uniform with Mrs. Wiggin's "The Birds' Christmas Carol." Square 12mo, 75 cents.

Fourth Edition.

CHRISTINE ROCHEFORT.

By HELEN CHOATE PRINCE. $1.25.
"A very delightful story, full of sweetness and light."

Sold by all Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., BOSTON.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1885, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

Single copy, 2 cts.; per hundred, 50 cts.

Address Christian Register Association,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

The Home.

LOST AND FOUND.

Where have they gone, the happy summer days,
With all their loveliness of earth and sky,
Which we have seen so gayly passing by,
Till now the last a moment more delays?

Whither have fled their mornings cool and sweet?
Whither their dreamy haze of highest noon?
Whither their sunset glories, and the croon
Of many waters murmurously fleet?

O friends, dear friends, who have been with me here,
To-night, for all the miles that intervene,
There is no inch of space our hearts between:
Come, hark with me a voice of hope and cheer.

These summer days that have so sweetly fled
Have their Avallon wherein they abide,
Like good King Arthur after he had died,
Or seemed to die, when still he was not dead.

It is a quiet place within the heart,
Where they live on for many an after day,
Blessing alike our labor and our play;
And nevermore from us do they depart.

And when we know not why we are so gay,
And when we laugh, nor know the reason why,
God sees in us a gleam of summer sky,
Or hears some brook go laughing on its way.

And so in you, I know, God keeps for me
The sweetness of the unreturning days,
Safe from all harm, and better than all praise:
Be mine, at least, such immortality.

—John W. Chadwick.

For the Christian Register.

AMONG THE THURINGIAN FAIRY-FOLK.

BY S. ALICE RANLETT.

Thump! clump! patter! clatter! go the wooden shoes over the rough cobble-stones of Ruprechtsdorf, a little hill-encircled village of Thuringia. See the chilly, gray twilight of the German autumn morning. The children are running to school. The boys' yellow hair slopes like a little thatched roof over their weather-browned foreheads, and the girls' tight, smooth, flaxen braids fly out beneath their brown and red kerchiefs; and the blue eyes of boys and girls alike smile amiably from the ruddy, apple-checked faces.

"Auf! Weg da! Juchhe!" they cry, darting through the market-place, not pausing even to look at the delights of the booths just set in order for the weekly market-day. Bright kerchiefs, cabbages, red and white, gay shoulder-shawls, cackling geese, bleating sheep, and even gingerbread dainties with their stuffing of nuts do not stop the children in the morning race. Later they will return and feast their eyes, at least, on all these things; but now the important question is, who will first and who will last lay hand upon the fountain's rim. For the first is, by the common consent and the long custom of the Ruprechtsdorf children, their ruler in play-hours for the day and is called the Kinder-Kaiser; and the last, unless excused by the Kaiser, is compelled to be the story-teller at the children's second breakfast, or luncheon-time.

"He! Heinz comes first," is the merry cry, followed by, "Ach! Lieschen, thou lazy one!"

"But the children are always glad when Lieschen is their story-teller, and this, indeed, is often; for, being the poorest runner among them, she is by far the best story-teller; and besides she has great advantages; for she lives outside the village, just where the green Moritz valley narrows into a dark, gloomy notch between the rocky hills, and on the edge of the great forest, which has always been regarded as the home of nixies, and kobolds, dwarfs, gnomes, moss-children, giants, and "queer little people."

The children do not venture alone into this Moritz wood; and sometimes, when they wander there in company, they think they hear a faint, silvery laugh or a light footstep or they catch a glimpse of some fluttering shadow among the flickering leaves which, they are sure, belongs to the weird people of the forest.

On the rocky crest of the hill which overhangs this valley and wood is perched the ruined Moritzburg, one of the old Thuringian castles, whose broken walls and crumbling towers and dungeon-like apartments are full of charms and mystery.

About the Moritzburg and the forest, and the river which runs through it with foaming rapids and still pools, Lieschen knows many a wild story; and the children gather eagerly about her at luncheon-time, contentedly munching their hard rolls, sometimes seasoned by a slice of savory sausage, and, looking up over the village roofs to the ragged tower of the old castle, they listen with delight and shiver with ecstasy.

"In our forest river," Lieschen begins, "there lives a nixie, and she has an invisible castle far down in the green water, near the sheep-bridge, where the river bends and is wonderfully deep; and my grandfather has told me that once, long ago, when a little maid and some grown-up people were walking through the woods near the sheep-bridge, suddenly the child saw a grand and beautiful young lady, with long yellow hair and a floating white dress, walking up and down upon the other shore. And the child fell to trembling and crying, and told the others what she saw; but they could see nothing, and they laughed at the little thing. You know, children can see things that grown-ups can't.

"They say the nixie keeps, down in her castle under the water, a great pot of shining gold pieces, and she gives the gold to those who go down with her to the palace; but, then, if you go down there, you never come back. So where's the use of your gold?

"My grandmother says once, when she was very little, the nixie tried to make her go down to the beautiful hidden castle. She was going by the sheep-bridge, when she heard a splashing in the water and then a merry laugh; and, when she looked about, she saw there in the river a wonderfully beautiful lady, with long shining golden hair, who beckoned to her, smiling graciously and calling her by name. But my grandmother had heard of the nixie; and she was afraid, and ran fast away to other people.

"And long ago, they say, the nixie used to go about quite openly, and often went to a butcher in the village to buy her meat. She used then to look like any lady. Only her teeth were queer and shone like gold, and her dress was always dripping wet because she had come out of the river, you know.

"But the butcher was much displeased because the water-lady, without saying a word, used just to point at the pieces of meat she liked, and make him give them to her; and she always liked the best. So, then, a friend foolishly advised him that, when next the nixie should point out her choice of meat with her proud white hand shining with green emerald rings, he should chop it off. And this he tried to do; but the nixie swiftly drew away her hand, and then she looked at the man with furious, angry eyes, and said,—

"Remember well what you would have done, and beware evermore of water.' Then the butcher was greatly frightened, and he never went near the river or the lakes; but one day he was crossing a little gurgling brook, and the water in it would come scarce higher than his ankles, when out popped the nixie, laughing scornfully, and dragged him into the water, and held him with her strong white hands face down till he was quite dead. You see, it's better ever to make friends with the nixie.

"They say that the water-lady appears sometimes in one form and sometimes in another, and sometimes she has jet black hair instead of yellow; but always she wears the shining white dress and always the rings with glittering green stones.

"The fisher-folk often see the nixie when they are fishing on the river-banks late into the night, and they put silver pieces on a certain rock, and then they see a white hand reach silently out of the water and take away the silver; and, after that, the nixie sends them good luck, and they catch fish fast and merrily. But sometimes they hear her call out the names of men, and then they shudder; for they know that she is calling those who will some time be drowned in the river.

"She is not willing that any one should bathe in the deep pool by the sheep-bridge; and once, when a baker from the village was swimming there, he felt some one seize him by the ankles and try to drag him down, but, when he screamed for help, his companions ran to him, and succeeded in pulling him ashore, but on his ankles there were the blue, bruised marks where two great, awful claws had clutched him.

"And once a painter, passing over the sheep-bridge, played on his guitar till the nixie came to listen,—for she ever loves music,—and he thought he had pleased her so much that she would do him no harm. So then, because the day was warm, he sprang into the cool, green water for a bath; but he was swiftly dragged down into the deep pool, and no one ever saw him afterward.

"Yet sometimes the nixie is so kind and does such good deeds to people!

"Long years ago there lived here in Ruprechtsdorf a poor little orphan maid who had no friends, and who lived among strangers who gave her little bread and many blows, and she was so wretched that at last she thought she would end her trouble, and go and drown herself in the deep, dark pool by the sheep-bridge; but, when she went there, it chanced that many persons were passing on that day. The fishermen were fishing up the stream, and the country folk were going and coming from the market, and the noble ladies and knights were riding on a journey through the wood; and so the little maid lay down beneath a green shady tree which hid her, thinking to wait there till nightfall.

"Now, when the sun was setting and all was still, the poor child rose, thinking her time was come, when she saw walking along the shore a young and beautiful lady, dressed like a princess in shining silken clothing and wearing glittering precious stones upon her white hands and in her golden hair. This strange lady came up to the child and gently stroked her hot brow, and spoke in a sweet voice to her and told her she had been watching her and knew the dreadful thing she was intending to do, and told her how wicked it was and talked to her of the dear God and how he had put her into the world to live while he pleased, and told her what holy religion teaches about self-murder; and, when the poor child promised to think no more of such a sin, the beautiful lady stooped and kissed her, and suddenly she disappeared.

"And once a poor widow and her children were going through the wood on their way to Albrechtsdorf, and they had no food, and the children were crying and begging for bread, when suddenly a beautiful lady came stepping lightly under the green trees, carrying a basket of white, shining woven silver; and from it she took bread and honey cakes and fair red apples and fed the children till they were no longer hungry, all the time singing in a sweet voice which made them glad, and then she gave the costly silver basket to the poor mother, and she was gone. But the widow sold the basket for money which bought bread for many months.

"They say that once a year at the midnight before the holy day of all the blessed saints the nixie goes to the village church to say her prayers; and they find in the morning a great golden piece of money in the poor chest, which the water-lady has left there for her offering."

As Lieschen paused, the little Kinder-Kaiser from his throne on the highest of the school-house steps gives his imperial command:—

"Now, Lieschen, I would have thee tell some stories of the queer little people." And Lieschen opens her mouth to obey, when the school-bell rings. Play-time is over, and the little emperor and all his little subjects march silent and orderly in to masters and lessons.

A FIGHT WITH GRAVITATION.

Slow at his books Tom Gordon certainly was, yet he had a good mind. It took him a long time to learn a lesson; but, when he had once learned it, he never had to look at it again. In athletic sports, too, he was not brilliant; but he could be relied upon. He was like a stone wall at first base, though he was not so successful as a batter. In football he was not aggressive enough to suit his school-fellows; but he was fearless, and he could carry an indefinite number of opponents on his back. In the tug-of-war he was unconquerable.

There was a story that, when Mr. Brown's school, with Tom for anchor, pulled the Normal Stars, Tom's three ropemen, after having, with Tom's assistance, secured an extra foot or two, went off and got a drink of soda water, leaving Tom to mind the rope alone. Tom always denied this story, and I must confess that it sounds unlikely. I think the probability is that, if they went away at all, they went away one at a time.

That day Tom pulled anchor, but generally he pulled on the rope. He was captain, of course; and his thundering "Ready! Heave!" was enough of itself to take away the strength of the other side. It was a great disappointment to Tom when Mr. Brown forbade the tug-of-war, on the ground that it injured the boys.

"I suppose it is bad for you," Tom was heard to say; "but a boy ought to learn how to keep his back straight and put his strength to a thing. He may have to lift something heavy some day."

For the rest, Tom was a tender-hearted fellow, who could not bear to hurt any one. When he was a little boy in the sixth class, one of his classmates, mistaking gentleness for cowardice, forced Tom into a fight. Tom hit out so quickly that one knock settled the other fellow, and then he fell to crying because the blood came out of the little rascal's nose.

One evening after supper Tom took the electric cars and went in town on an errand for his father. His business accomplished, he set out to walk home; for, although a few flakes of snow had fallen, the night was fine, and he wanted to get some good fresh air into his lungs before sitting down to spend an evening with Cicero.

He had reached a deserted part of the street, and was walking up a long hill not far from home, when he saw coming toward him a heavy two-wheeled coal-cart drawn by one horse. The wheels were on the car-tracks, the driver's head had fallen over on his shoulder, and he was fast asleep. Meanwhile the brave old horse plodded on, with the contentment of a veteran in the coal business who has left his load of coal, whose driver is asleep, and who is going down hill on his way home.

From out of sight far along the street came the singing of wires, which means that an electric car is approaching. A moment later the car, coming on like mad,

- ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh
- ANCHOR,
Cincinnati.
- ATLANTIC,
New York.
- BEYMER-BAUMAN,
Pittsburgh.
- BRADLEY,
New York.
- BROOKLYN,
New York.
- COLLIER,
St. Louis.
- CORNELL,
Buffalo.
- DAVIS-CHAMBERS,
Pittsburgh.
- ECKSTEIN,
Cincinnati.
- FAHNESTOCK,
Pittsburgh.
- JEWETT,
New York.
- KENTUCKY,
Louisville.
- JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS. CO
Philadelphia.
- MORLEY,
Cleveland.
- MISSOURI,
St. Louis.
- RED SEAL,
St. Louis.
- SALEM,
Salem, Mass.
- SHIPMAN,
Chicago.
- SOUTHERN,
St. Louis and Chicago.
- ULSTER,
New York.
- UNION,
"

Don't Buy

barytes if you want White Lead. Pure White Lead is the best paint—barytes is the poorest, is worthless. Barytes is often sold under the brand of White Lead, Pure White Lead, &c. Be careful about the brand (see list of genuine brands). Don't take what is said to be "just as good."

Any shade of color is readily obtained by using the National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead tinting colors. One pound of color tints a 25-pound keg of Pure White Lead. Send for color-card and pamphlet—free.

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,
1 Broadway, New York.

hove in sight some distance behind the coal-cart. As it reached the summit of the hill, and began the descent, its speed did not abate.

Nearer and nearer it came, but the motor-man did not seem to have any fear of running into the coal-cart. He even turned round and said something to the conductor, who was standing behind him. Then he turned back again, but he turned too late. He was nearer than he thought. He jammed on the brake, and reversed the power just as the old horse turned aside to draw the cart out of danger; but the tracks were covered with a little layer of snow, and the car-wheels slid over them like the runners of a sleigh.

The whole weight of the car struck the corner of the coal-cart, and flung it from the tracks. The wagon fairly surged up in the air, and came down on its side, with the man underneath it and the horse still in the shafts. Neither man nor horse stirred after they fell.

The conductor and driver were both unhurt. "This is a bad business, Phil; an' we'd better git out!" the driver said.

The conductor nodded, and pulled the bell twice, and the car swept away. The only passengers were three ladies, who probably did not know what had happened.

Tom was not a hundred feet away when the thing happened. His horror at the sight itself was not greater than his astonishment and anger when the car moved on. For the first time in his life he would have liked to have some one by the throat.

He rushed up to the cart excitedly. It had been thrown to the right of the track. The driver's leg was underneath one of the great wheels; and he had evidently fainted, for he did not move nor speak. Tom seized him by the shoulder and shook him roughly. The man roused up a little.

"Pull your leg out when I lift," Tom shouted; and then he stooped down, and got hold of the edge of the wheel.

He straightened his back, bent his knees, and gripped the wheel tight. Then, with a great effort, he flung back his head and straightened his knees. Up came the cart, wheel, frame, and all.

"Pull your leg out!" Tom shouted again. The man started, tried to sit up, pulled his leg a little way out, gave up, and rolled over on his face, with his head directly under the wheel.

It was too much. Tom thought he would rather have died than see such a thing happen. He could not hold up such a load for more than a few moments, and it would kill the man when it fell. No one was in sight. He could not move, not a muscle, or he would have to let go. Oh, if he had only let the fellow lie there, and brought help!

"Get out of there! Rouse up!" he cried; and then, as the man did not move, "Help! help!" he yelled. "There's a man dying! Help!"

There was only one house near enough to send him aid in time, and he directed his cries at that. There were lights in the windows, but no one seemed to stir to help him. At last the strain became so great that he could shout no longer. He clenched his teeth, and resigned himself to despair.

A door slammed. He looked up at the house, and saw a girl running down the steps. Could he hold out till she got to him. "I'll make a good bluff at it anyway," thought Tom, grimly; and he held on. He had not strength enough even to hurry up his rescuer.

The girl, who was well built, strong and ruddy, reached his side quickly.

"What are you wanting, sorr?" she said.

Tom was gasping. Great drops of sweat ran down his face. His feet staggered about from place to place. His legs were strained past bearing, his hands perfectly numb. He felt that he was all but done for.

"Pull out the man!" he muttered, and then shut his lips tight, as the wheel almost slipped from his grasp.

The girl looked down, and without a moment's hesitation crawled under the wheel to pull him out.

"Don't go under!" Tom gasped, in agony. "I may drop it."

"Faith, then, you won't," came her voice, without a tremor. "You'll hold on a bit longer. You won't let it hurt me."

That was enough for Tom. He bent his knees a trifle, renewed his grip on the wheel, leaned his head forward a little; and then a "Ready! Heave!" burst out on the night air that made the street ring. Back flew his head again, his great knees straightened themselves, and once more wheel, frame, and wagon shot up in the air. A moment later the girl had pulled the coal man out of danger.

Then Tom shifted his feet a little back, and with an involuntary gasp let go. Down came the heavy cart with a crash, but only on the uninjured earth.

Tom thanked the girl as best he could, and then, utterly at the end of his strength, sank right down where he was in the mud and dirt. It seemed as if he could never move again.

"Sure, 'twas an illigant pull entirely!" said the Irish girl, admiringly. "What shall I be doin' now?"

"Run for the doctor," Tom said, rousing himself; "or—no. I don't think it will be necessary."

A car was coming, this one out from town. It was crowded. With a great effort Tom stood on his feet and ran to the track. "Stop, stop!" he cried. "Some one's hurt!"

The motorman stopped. Tom climbed on board, and slammed open the front door. "Is there a doctor here?" he inquired. A middle-aged man rose from his seat, and came toward the front of the car. Tom led the way to the coal-cart. "The team fell on him, and hurt his leg," he said.

The doctor stooped down, and began to make his examination. A crowd from the car gathered about the spot.

The girl's father was one of the number, and he eagerly questioned his daughter about what had happened. She told him what she knew, and all who heard her turned eagerly to get a sight of the young fellow who had borne so much to save the injured man's life.

But Tom was no longer to be seen. He liked to do his duty, but he hated to talk about it. He was on his way home, and hard enough it was for him to get there.

Some of the more curious of the crowd tried their hand at lifting the cart. Two young men, working together, raised it half a foot and dropped it.

The next morning at breakfast Mr. Gordon read from the newspaper a very ornamental but substantially correct account of the strength and bravery of an unknown young man who had preserved Michael Daly, of Woodhouse's Coal Company, from instant death. Mr. Gordon read well, and his wife and daughters could hardly breathe till he had finished.

"O-o-oh!" cried Gertrude, when the end came. "What a splendid man! And so modest, too, not letting any one know who he was! He was a real hero, wasn't he, Tom?"

"Why, no," said Tom, unconcernedly. "I can't say I see anything especially heroic about it."

"Well!" Gertrude exclaimed, turning to her mother. "Tom is the most unromantic boy! I don't believe he knows what a hero is!"—Robert Beverly Hale, in Youth's Companion.

THE OLD CLOCK.

Inside of the cottage all was cosy and bright. The firelight gleamed on the walls, flashed across the old clock that stood in the corner, and shone on grandma's face as she sat knitting in her high-backed chair. Harry and Ned lay on the rug, their heads pillowed on shaggy old Nep, the great dog, who had been their friend ever since they were babies. Outside the snow fell thickly, and the wind howled down the chimney. The boys had been out in the snow; and now, after their supper of roast apples and bread and milk, they were ready for one of grandma's stories.

"This is a story that my mother told me," she began; "and it happened when she was a little girl. It was during the War of the Revolution, and the New England villages and towns were overrun by the British soldiers, houses were burned and the men and boys forced to hide in the woods to avoid being taken prisoners. My mother's father owned a large farm on the outskirts of the village. He had gone to the war with his two eldest sons, leaving my grandmother at home with three children, of whom the eldest was a boy about Harry's age. His name was Harry, too. Although only fourteen, he was a well-grown, manly boy, large for his age.

"One cold, snowy night in December, as the mother and children had gathered about the fire, thinking sadly of those who were in camp, perhaps in battle, a loud knock resounded through the room; and a neighbor entered hastily, without waiting for a response.

"'I came to warn you,' he said excitedly, 'that a large party of British soldiers have entered the town, and are compelling the people to quarter them in their houses. There has been a fight, and a number of Americans taken prisoners. Harry there had better escape while he can. I am on my way to warn others.'

"As he left the house, they could hear in the distance the clatter of horses' hoofs.

"'Go, my son, before it is too late,' cried his mother. 'The Lord will protect the innocent: go quickly.'

"'I cannot leave you and my little sisters,' replied the boy. 'Father told me to take care of you, and my place is here. I am not afraid.'

"'Tramp, tramp, tramp came the hoofs, nearer and nearer.

"'Oh, my son' cried his mother, as she heard the sound, 'you must go: you will break my heart if you stay here.'

"'I cannot, mother,' said Harry, firmly: 'my place is here.'

"Just then the great clock rang out the hour, and they could now hear the voices of the soldiers. A sudden thought struck the mother, and she opened the door of the clock.

"'Quick, Harry,' she said. 'I will hide you in the clock: they will never think of looking there.'

"She pushed him into the clock and closed the door. There was just room enough inside for the boy to stand upright. The clock stood in the corner, and in its back was a hole that a little mouse had gnawed. Harry blessed that mouse for the breathing-place thus provided for him. The mother whispered a prayer, as she soothed the frightened little girls and sat down to her spinning. Soon she heard the laughter of the soldiers, as they dismounted and came up the steps. As she opened the door and the light from inside streamed out over the advancing group, she saw to her relief that they were all officers and looked like gentlemen.

"'We must have supper here, my good woman,' said the foremost, as they entered the house, 'and as quickly as possible; for we have far to ride to-night.'

"'My little daughters and I will do what we can for you,' she replied with quiet dignity.

"'This is a warm nest,' said the officer, as he glanced around the bright room. 'Are you on the side of the king?'

"'The King of kings is on my side,' she answered, as she bade the little girls prepare the table for the unwelcome guests.

"It did not take long for the hungry men to dispose of the generous fare provided for them, but to the mother and children it seemed hours. How long could her boy live in his close hiding-place? Agonized prayers went up from her heart, as she waited on the men.

"'Where is your husband, and have you no sons?' asked the captain, as they left the table.

"'My husband and sons are fighting for their country; and may the Lord give them the victory!'

"The captain flushed angrily. 'A nest of rebels, I perceive. Well for you, woman, if you had not spoken those words. I will search the house, to be sure that none of the brood have been kept at home. Two of my men will stay here, to see that none escape from the door; and you can go with the rest and show us the way.'

"The mother never knew how she lived through the next half-hour. Forced to go from room to room with her persecutors, trembling at every sound from below, her courage nearly failed as she thought of her brave boy in his hiding-place, which might be discovered at any moment. But at last the long agony was over, the search had revealed nothing, and the officers left the house. As the last one reached the door, however, the door of the clock slowly opened; and Harry stepped out into the room. He stood transfixed at the sight of the young Englishman, who was a bright-faced, sunny-haired lad not much older than Harry's eldest brother.

"'My boy, my boy!' exclaimed the poor mother. 'You will not take him from me? Perhaps you have a mother at home who is praying for you now. Think of her, and spare another mother.' And she knelt at his feet. 'My boy would not leave his mother, although he might have been in safety now.'

"The young officer raised her gently: the tears were in his blue eyes. 'I will not betray you,' he said. 'I have a mother at home.'

"He touched his cap, and hastily joined his companions; and Harry clasped his mother in his arms."

The fire flickered and burned low as grandma finished her story. It was bedtime. But still the old clock ticked on, as it had done all through the years, telling to each succeeding generation the story of youthful courage and faith and patriotism. Mary B. Ferry, in the Congregationalist.

HOSPITAL DOLLS.

Ever since the election of the President of France he has devoted two mornings a week to visiting hospitals. Instead of marching through the various wards, escorted by the hospital officials, he goes from bed to bed, shakes hands with the patients, inquires into their condition, and encourages them with cheering words. It is said that he tarries longest by the bedside of little children. He always asks them what he can do to make them forget their pain, and the answer is almost invariably, "Une poupée." The result is that on the following morning there arrive at the children's ward of the hospital boxes containing dolls. As M. Faure has now given away over a thousand dolls in this way, it will be seen what a philanthropist he is, in deeds as well as in words. Of course, his example has been followed by his imitators and by other well-doers.—The Outlook.

NONE
SUCH MINCE MEAT

Two large pies are made from each package of None-Such Mince Meat. For sale by all grocers. Be sure and get the None-Such.

MERRELL-SOULE CO.,
Syracuse, N.Y.

CAUTION.

Spoons and forks not our make are frequently sold as "Rogers." Our trademark is 1847 Rogers Bros. "1847" guarantees original genuine goods, silver plate that wears, on nickel-silver. Look out for imitations.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO., Meriden, Conn.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S
STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

"DON'T BORROW TROUBLE." BUY

SAPOLIO

'TIS CHEAPER IN THE END.

THE ARMADILLO AS A PET.

In Central America the armadillo is frequently domesticated to rid houses of insect pests. They also make as nice pets as one could desire. No animal is cleaner or less objectionable about the house. They are as desirable in this respect as well-trained cats or lap-dogs, and there could be no higher praise than this.

It is not merely the odd forms and ways of my rare pets that have made them the objects of my peculiar interest. I have been equally charmed with their intelligence and with their evident attachment to myself. If, when they are near me, I suddenly move away from them, they come trotting at my heels in their comical way as fast as their short legs can carry them.

Their gait is always a walk or brisk trot, never a gallop. Most of their movements when in motion resemble those of little pigs. They have learned to answer to their names, and come quickly when called. Curiosity is a prominent characteristic of the animal. If allowed free scope, they will explore every part of a strange place, trying to run their sharp noses into every opening. Much of the daytime is spent in sleeping. In lying down, one generally rests its head and forefeet on the neck or back of the other, in a very affectionate manner.

Their attachment for each other is remarkable, all the more noticeable when one becomes separated from the other. If I shut Jack up in a basket, Jill goes round and round outside, at times standing on her hind feet and reaching to the top with her nose. When Jack is finally liberated, they put their heads together for a few moments; and then off they go on one of their tours of exploration.—Charles H. Coe, in the Popular Science Monthly.

THE FRIENDS WE MAY HAVE.

Squirrels make very attractive pets; but they cannot be attractive unless they are happy. If you live where there are squirrels and chipmunks, you will soon discover how friendly they are. I know one family of children who live in a little house in the woods in summer who have been so kind and tender to the little people of the woods that they come fearlessly to the house. The squirrels and chipmunks know that in the stumps about the house they will find food that loving little hands have put there for them. They know that under the piazza are large bowls of water. The birds know that hanging in the trees are pails of water as soon as the spring gets low, and a visit to the piazza means a particularly dainty morsel. A squirrel can be taught to play with a ball or a spool. The story is told of a pet squirrel who would stop in the midst of a game of romp and disappear, to return with a couple of nuts which he would drop down the back of the neck of the lady or little girl who was playing with him. The family thought that the squirrel did this as a mark of approval, for he never looked for the nuts again. It is worth while, if only for the amusement afforded, to make friends with the birds, squirrels, and chipmunks about our homes in the woods.—Outlook.

TOBACCO AND LUMBER.

Few travellers—not one in a thousand—suspect there is anything behind the legend which greets them in an ordinary railway carriage: “The penalty for smoking in a carriage other than that marked ‘smoking’ is forty shillings.” That it has anything to do with the depreciation of the company’s rolling-stock never enters their heads.

A smoking-carriage, however, only lasts about half as long as an ordinary vehicle, and, once well broken into its mission, it is completely spoiled for all other purposes. It can never be rid of its smell.

“Literally speaking,” remarked a well-known car-builder recently, “a railway carriage smokes. The fumes of the tobacco are absorbed into the timbers, penetrate into the mortices, and grow into a kind of gas that eats its way into the structure. On the Northern Railway in France a few weeks ago twelve ‘smokers’ were taken to pieces at the shops. The fumes that oozed forth from every crevice would have sickened an English workman: only the French are accustomed to a kind of tobacco that has not been inaptly compared to half-burnt linen rags flavored with glue and assafoetida.

“The timber of a smoking carriage—if it is ever used again—can only be employed in building another ‘smoker.’ But the best oak rolling-stock only lasts about a quarter the time that soft pine would last if stationary; and the tenons of ‘smoker’ timbers rot in about half that length of time.”

What about the smoker’s throat and stomach?—English Paper.

Spirit of the Press.

The Examiner discusses a question of modesty:—

One of the ablest of our Southern preachers has been lifting up his voice against those audacious “females”—as they say in that locality, meaning women and girls—who have presumed to indulge in the fascinating pastime of bicycle riding. We are disposed, for several reasons, to think that the preacher has been misdirecting his able artillery of invective. In the first place, the mere fact that the bicycle is an innovation on established modes of locomotion does not in itself make it worthy of censure. In the second place, we are very sure that the kind of women who would be at all affected by our friend’s vigorous admonitions would be the last to engage in anything that could be accounted immodest. And, thirdly, we are equally sure that there is nothing immodest in bicycling per se, any more than in the kindred pastime of horseback riding,—an approved manner of locomotion for women in the South. As to the costume of the woman bicyclist, with occasional exceptions it is, so far as our observation has gone, modest and becoming, and much more convenient and healthful than the ordinary street costume of to-day. We hesitate, indeed, to pass judgment in so great a matter; but, really, it does seem to our unsophisticated mind that our womenkind are quite as capable of settling questions of modesty and propriety as any “male person” of us all.

Temperance.

The St. Paul Railroad Company recently discharged eleven engineers and thirty-five firemen on one division, because they frequented saloons while off duty.

Germany heads the list of beer-drinking countries in 1893 with 1,202,132,074 gallons,—an increase of 34,000,000 over 1882, the consumption being 33 gallons per head.

The Anti-cigarette League has been established in all of the ninety-five grammar schools of New York City. The league now numbers forty thousand public school boys.

Charities and Reforms.

The fourth Indiana State Conference of Charities will be held at Fort Wayne, October 15, 16, and 17. Its object is to gather and diffuse information respecting the benevolent, charitable, penal, and reformatory work of the State and the counties, and that of private institutions and societies; to learn how best to do the work and then to make the best methods popular is rapidly becoming recognized as a valuable aid to the cause of progress in all the subjects with which it is concerned. Its members are mostly practical men and women, actively engaged in some of the many and various departments of the work which they come together to discuss. At the coming meeting important papers will be given on City Charity Work, Care of the Insane, Child-saving Work, Penal and Reformatory Work, and the Care of the Feeble-minded.

How to Fry with Cottolene

Fry everything from potato chips to doughnuts in Cottolene. Put Cottolene in a cold pan—heat it slowly until it will delicately brown a bit of bread in half a minute. Then put in your food. It will pay you to try Cottolene just this way—see how delicious and wholesome it makes the food.

Get the genuine, sold everywhere in one, three, and five pound tins, with trade-mark—“Cottolene” and steer’s head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY, CHICAGO, 224 State Street, BOSTON, PORTLAND, ME.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY
FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:
The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Post-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by
GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

A College Town Pulpit.

MR. SUNDERLAND’S MONTHLY SERMONS.

50 Cents a Year. 5 Cents a Number. Reduced rates in quantities.

Series for 1894-95.

1. The Soul’s Cry for God.
2. Jesus as Humanity’s Ideal.
3. Sectarianism: Its Evils, Causes, and Cures.
4. The True Cross of Christ.
5. Was Jesus God? How he came to be worshipped.
6. Loyalty to Conviction.
7. Is Life a Blessing?
8. Robert Ingersoll’s Treatment of the Bible.
9. A Religion for a Republic.
10. The Surest Way of Doing Good.

Order from Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND, Ann Arbor, Mich.

MESSAGES OF
Faith, Hope and Love.

Selections for Every Day in the Year from the Writings of
JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE.

PRICE $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by
GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Scraps of Travel.

BY
MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage’s letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of
GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The “Unitarian” unites
many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods
in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus,
love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR SEPTEMBER.

The God we Serve. Rev. William M. Brundage, Ph.D.
I can Become but What thou Art. J. M. S.
Col. Ingersoll’s Views about the Bible. II. Howard MacQueary.
The Ethical Value of Jesus. John M. Scott.
Richesse Oblige. George W. Cutter, M.D.
Responsibility. Hattie Tyng Griswold.
Prayer. Pastor Quiet.
The Religion of Jesus as a Creed.
Night. William Brunton.
The Ministry. Rev. John Page Hopps.
The Forward Movement. W. H. Lambelle.
Unitarianism a Rational Hope and Faith.
Ethical Culture and Unitarianism. Harry White.
The Real Redemption. H. Hayes Robbins.
One Upward Look Each Day.
Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:
American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;
Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; Guilds;
Literary Notes.
Children’s Corner.
NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

. Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Register Tract Series.

No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. F. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William L. Lawrance. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 7. OF MAKING ONE’S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William B. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. F. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. O. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 14. WHAT O’CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
No. 20. THEODORE PARKER’S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crocker. $1.50 per hundred.
No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.
No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

VILLAGE IMPROVEMENT.

It is in the Western States that the greatest progress in rural improvement has been made during the last ten years. Here one finds illustrations of co-operation and enterprise surpassing the more staid East. The Wyoming Village Improvement Society is the foremost organization of its kind in Ohio. It was formed in 1880 at a public meeting where several spirited addresses were made. The mayor of the village was made president, and a directory of four women and four men was appointed. These were divided into committees on trees, on sidewalks, on sewerage, on finance, and on entertainments, concerts, and lectures. Though the population of the village was only seven hundred, they began work with thoroughness and enthusiasm. Nearly every man and woman in the village joined the association. They first undertook one conspicuous improvement,—the enlargement and adornment of the unsightly grounds of the railroad station. They collected $1,200 by subscriptions. The railroad company added $400, and hauled the needed gravel and soil without charge. The result is the most attractive station park on this line of railway. In 1881 there were planted in this park one hundred and eighty-five trees and sixty-three shrubs of flowering varieties and flower-beds, all arranged by a competent landscape gardener. In 1882 seven hundred and seventy trees were planted along the streets. The aggregate number of trees planted by this association is about four thousand. During its first three years the society raised, through membership dues, private subscriptions, entertainments, and the like, nearly $3,000. The membership fee was $3 for the first year, and annually thereafter $2; for persons not of age $1, or the planting of one tree under the direction of the tree committee. The society has secured an efficient street-sprinkling service. The property holders have laid miles of artificial stone sidewalks, and public-spirited citizens have given to the village a commodious and elegant hall in which is a fine library and reading-room. The Village Improvement Society has been the leader in these and many other improvements.—B. G. Northrop.

CLAY FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

How papyrus could be employed for the purposes of correspondence we can easily understand, but that clay should have been commonly used for the same purpose would a short time ago have been thought incredible. And yet we now know it to have been a fact. One of the largest and most important collections of ancient letters ever brought to light is that which has been found at Tel-el-Amarna in Upper Egypt. It consists entirely of clay tablets, inscribed with cuneiform characters, and written for the most part in the Babylonian language. The letters were sent to the Egyptian court from the kings of Babylonia and Assyria, of Mesopotamia, Cappadocia, and Northern Syria, as well as from the governors and "protected" princes of Canaan; and they belong to the century before the Exodus. They prove that at that period the language and syllabary of Babylonia were the common medium of literary intercourse throughout Western Asia, and that the cuneiform characters had not as yet been superseded in Palestine by the letters of the Phœnician alphabet.

Education.

At the University of Brussels three ladies from East India recently passed their examinations in the medical department. Two of them received the title of M.D. "with great distinction," the third "with distinction." On the basis of their diplomas the ladies have received appointments in women and children's hospitals in their native land, and are also permitted to practice in the harems.

Conscious instruction, moral or intellectual, is often resisted by the pupil. Children are by nature conscious imitators of stronger natures. It also seems to be an iron law that they must always unconsciously imitate and rapidly become like their teachers. In this process there is no friction. In the domain of intellect the fact is important, because the habit of mind which they silently imbibe from the teacher is a far more potent force in their growth than the few facts they gather. But in discipline the truth, so often unobserved, that the pupils acquire the disposition of the teacher, is the central principle of the science of school government. It explains the strange successes and failures which puzzle and please or pain the friends or beginners in teaching. In its light we may often make a profitable self-examination.—Henry S. Baker, in Education.

Science.

Monazite, a rare mineral which neither melts nor burns, is found in the rich metallic heart of the Appalachian Mountains that lies in North Carolina.

Platinum has been drawn into smooth wire so fine that it could not be distinguished by the naked eye, even when stretched across a piece of white cardboard.

It has been supposed that nothing could take the place of ivory in the manufacture of the sensitively elastic balls used in playing billiards. But the scarcity of ivory has set inventive wits at work, and now in Sweden hollow balls of cast steel are found to be a satisfactory substitute.

A young man of St. Louis has invented an electric carriage, which can travel, with six passengers, at the rate of fifteen miles an hour, and can climb a hill with ease. It is run by storage batteries, which require ten hours to be charged, and which can then run the carriage at the rate of twelve miles an hour for four hours.

A Canadian blacksmith claims to have solved the problem of tempering aluminum so as to give it the consistency of iron. He has made and hardened a cannon of the metal, which has lately been tested in the presence of government officials. A charge, consisting of a pound of powder, has been successfully fired out of this little piece of ordnance without leaving any appreciable effect upon it.

Here and There.

One grain of gold, after leaving the gold-beater's hands, will cover fifty-six square inches.

Snakes are said to live to a very old age. A large boa in London some time ago was estimated to be about two thousand years old.

A recent English writer on trial by jury says it was derived from Normandy. But it existed in Iceland from the earliest times, where the Normans certainly did not introduce it. As the Icelanders and the North Saxons were practically the same people, it is hardly open to question that their primitive customs were as nearly identical as their language.

The inhabitants of the small group of islands situated on the south of Iceland possess a very curious method of communication in their so-called "bottle post." When the wind blows from the south, and one of the islanders wishes to communicate with the mainland, he puts his letters into a well-corked bottle; and, to insure their delivery, he encloses at the same time a plug of twist tobacco or a cigar. The wind speedily impels the bottle to the shore of the mother island, where people are generally on the lookout who are willing to deliver the contents of the bottle in return for the enclosed remuneration.

All other salts contain lime and dirt—lime is unhealthy and dirt is dirty.

We want to send free to every woman in New England a sample bag of the whitest and purest salt in the world—Bradley's "Yorkshire" Salt. Won't harden in damp weather.

Grocers don't keep it—they sell it. Your dealer can supply you—see that he does. Send your address for a sample to

BRADLEY SALT CO.,

49 Jay St., New York, 4 Commercial St., Boston

Just a little Gumption, in the matter of washing, will lead you to use Pearline. Look about you, and see the work of your friends who use it. Isn't the work easier? Isn't it better done? Can't you see that it must be easier and better without all that rubbing that tires out women and wears out clothes? Gumption is the seeing why and the knowing how. You can't know how to wash with the least work and the most saving, unless you use Pearline.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back.

370 JAMES PYLE, New York.

Spiritual Life.

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMANDIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSLEY; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOK; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Important Works.

Members of One Body. Six Sermons by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS. 132 pages. Cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

CONTENTS: I. Roman Catholicism; II. Calvinism; III. Methodism; IV. Rationalism; V. Mysticism; VI. The Unity of Christendom.

In the whole list of Liberal Religious books, past and present, it would be hard to find any series of utterances freer with the true freedom—more ingenious, more appreciative, more prophetic of the unity that is to be, more religiously "satisfying"—than Mr. Crothers gives us in these six discourses. The outline alone, which each chapter contains, of the stronger, more helpful points in the various schemes of religious thought and life discussed, renders the book invaluable.

The Work of the Ministry. Lectures given to the Meadville Theological School. By Rev. W. P. TILDEN. 186 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Ministry; Object of Preaching; Pastoral Work; Sunday Schools and Guilds; Pulpit Services; Usages and Duties; Personal Influence; Sealed Orders.

Written in a delightfully fresh style, free from pulpit tone and theological terminology, but serious, earnest, and up to the high plane of ministerial responsibility.—Independent (New York).

Seeing and Being, and Other Sermons. By JOHN W. CHADWICK. 234 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Great Hopes for Great Souls; "A Mere Man"; The Constructive Achievements of the Higher Criticism; Tempted of God; The Price of Moral Freedom; Orthodoxy, what is it? Morality and Religion; The Conversion of Energy; Two Meanings of Religion; The Undiscovered Country; Samuel Longfellow; The Old, Old Story; The Fulness of Time; The Unbridled Tongue; Immortality; Seeing and Being.

Kindling Thoughts. By ELIZABETH P. CHANNING. 315 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

Contains fifty-seven brief essays, such as Dev upon the heart; The angel in the shadow; A disappointed life; Plain living and high thinking; The spiritual tangle; The charm of the old; Accepting ourselves as we are; etc., etc.

It is a long time since anything so brightly refreshing as these Kindling Thoughts has come to us. They are full of that best cheer which comes from the deepest, clearest springs of faith.—Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Mozoomdar's BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

15. THE EFFECTS OF EVOLUTION ON THE COMING CIVILIZATION: Plans for social regeneration as tested by evolution. By Rev. MINOT J. SAVAGE.

16. THE SCOPE AND PRINCIPLES OF THE EVOLUTION PHILOSOPHY: Agnosticism, materialism, idealism, practical problems. By DR. LEWIS G. JAMES.

17. THE MORAL AND RELIGIOUS ASPECTS OF HERBERT SPENCER'S PHILOSOPHY: The relation of religion to morality. By SYLVAN DREV.

18. THE RELATIVITY OF KNOWLEDGE: The nature of sense-perception; sight, sound, taste, smell, feeling; the doctrine of the Unknowable. By ROBERT G. ECOLES, M.D.

19. A STUDY OF MATTER AND MOTION: An excellent digest of a much vexed question, with quotations from many authorities. By Hon. A. N. ADAMS.

20. PRIMITIVE MAN: Pliocene, paleolithic and neolithic races; the ages of bronze and iron, cave-men and lake-dwellers; mound builders; primitive tools. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.

21. GROWTH OF THE MARRIAGE RELATION: Its earlier forms; polygamy; polyandry; marriage by capture; monogamy; divorce and divorce laws. By C. STANILAND WAKE.

22. EVOLUTION OF THE STATE: The growth of political institutions; family tribe, clan, city; the State's final form. By JOHN A. TAYLOR.

23. EVOLUTION OF LAW: How law begins; statute law and judge-made law; the conversion of customs into law. By PROF. RUFUS SHELDON.

24. EVOLUTION OF MEDICAL SCIENCE: Supernatural ideas of disease; the beginnings of medical science; modern sanitary science. By ROBERT G. ECOLES, M.D.

"Replete with facts and suggestions; not only interesting, but a substantial contribution to sociological literature."—Christian Register.

"The mode of presentation seems to me admirably adapted for popularizing Evolution views."—Herbert Spencer.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Pleasantries.

She (on her voyage): "What is that place down there?" He: "Why, that is the steerage." She: "And does it take all those people to make the boat go straight?"—Selected.

A facetious visitor: "See yat 'ittle boy over zare?" said Mabel. "Yat's my 'ittle buzzer, an' his name is Nat." "Indeed?" said the visitor. "Well, I think gnat is a very good name for a buzzer."—Harper's Young People.

Henry: "But how can you afford to go abroad every summer?" Richard: "That's easy enough. When I come back with my trunk all covered over with steamer checks and foreign labels, I can always sell it for more than the entire cost of my trip."—The Transcript.

"My friends tell me that there is a magic spell about my writings," said the author, complacently, as the editor glanced at his manuscript. "There is; but I prefer Webster's style of orthography myself," said the editor, as he handed the manuscript back.—Exchange.

"What do you think of the present State House?" I asked, proudly looking up at the golden dome shining through the trees. "Well, I've circumspected that creatur' afore and behime; and, ef you don't watch out, the tail of the thing will swallow the head."—The Southern Unitarian.

Warburton: "Mamma, may I have a slice of bread and jam now?" Mamma: "No, you must not think of eating now, because you will spoil your appetite for dinner. It will be ready in three hours." Warburton: "I only had lunch three hours ago, didn't I?" Mamma: "Yes." Warburton: "Then I don't see how the bread and jam can spoil my appetite for dinner, when my lunch did not spoil the appetite I have now for bread and jam."—Florida Times-Union.

A contemporary informs us that "two-cent literature, a Zulu Chief," was asked for in a book-store the other day. It turned out that the asker really wanted a life of the martyred Haytian general, Toussaint L'Ouverture, although why he thought him a Zulu is not easily explained. But "Toussaint L'Ouverture" does sound a little like "two-cent literature," curiously enough. Another book-store oddity was the memorandum from a Harvard student, who wanted "an ad valorem Shakspeare." Philadelphia papers please copy, for the benefit of Mr. Furniss, the editor of the "Variorum."—The Outlook.

FAMILY WEATHER.

A very characteristic and delightful note is that given in a recent Century from Dr. Holmes to J. T. Fields, thanking Mr. Fields for the gift of a barometer. The gift was so much appreciated that it was wanted by the sunny Autocrat for his study and by Mrs. Holmes for the parlor, a difference of opinion which prompted him to impart to his friend the following quaint dialogue,—imaginary, no doubt, in the indications of bad weather; for weather in the Holmes household is well known to have been perennially fair and fine.

I have observed some extraordinary movements of the index of the barometer during the discussions that ensued [wrote the doctor, after mentioning the domestic difference], which you may be interested to see my notes of:—

Barometer

Fair

Dry

Change

Very Dry

Rain

Very Dry

Much Rain

Set Fair

Stormy

Mrs. H. My dear, we shall of course keep this beautiful barometer in the parlor.

Dr. H. Why, no, my dear: the study is the place.

Mrs. H. I'm sure it ought to go in the parlor. It's too handsome for your old den.

Dr. H. I shall keep it in the study.

Mrs. H. I don't think that's fair.

Dr. H. I'm sorry. Can't help it.

Mrs. H. It's—too—too—ba-a-ad.

Dr. H. (Music omitted.) 'Mid pleasures and paal-a-a-c-es.

Mrs. H. I will have it! You horrid—

You see what a wonderful instrument this is that you have given me. But, my dear Mr. Fields, while I watch its changes it will be a constant memorial of unchanging friendship; and, while the dark hand of fate is traversing the whole range of mortal vicissitudes, the golden index of the kind affections shall stand always at SET FAIR.

Yours ever,
O. W. HOLMES.
—Youth's Companion.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON.

EUROPEAN PLAN,

J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

Its Screw and Plunge Lift (a) for regulating Wick; Its Lift Attachment (b) for Lighting Without Removing Chimney; with other Original Improvements, combine to make the

MILLER Lamp

Superior to All Others.

Illustrated Catalogue Sent Free.

EDWARD MILLER & CO., MILL AND FACTORIES, MERIDEN, CONN. } 63 Pearl St., Boston.

In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sell

CHURCH CARPETS

at manufacturers' prices.

John H. Pray, Sons & Co., Wholesale and Retail CARPETS and UPHOLSTERY, 658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston. Correspondence Solicited.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin.

BLAKE BELL CO., Boston, Mass.

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71

LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94

$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.

ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.

S. F. TRULL, Secretary.

WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

USE "DURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING"

GEO. H. ELLIS,

Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excurrence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1895.

NUMBER 39.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; Free Italy.	609
Melancholy; The National Prison Congress.	610
MUSINGS.	611
BREVITIES.	611
PRO AND CON.
Pricked Cards; A Correction Accepted; Liberal Organization.	611
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
International Prison Congress, III., by Rev. Samuel J. Barrows; Our Young People's Societies, by Rev. George W. Cooke.	612
The "Next Thing," by Junia Stafford; No Heretics need apply; American Unitarian Association; Conference Notes.	613
The Mozoomdar Mission.	614
List of Delegates.	615
A Catechism of Liberal Faith, by Rev. Charles F. Dole.	617
Rev. George W. Briggs.	622
The Suffrage Referendum; Jostah O. Low.	623
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.	614
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.	614
THE PULPIT.
"What must I do to be Saved?" by Rev. M. W. Chunn, Ph.D.	616
LITERATURE.
"Punishment and Reformation"	618
Other Book Notices; Miscellaneous; Literary Notes; Books Received.	619
THE HOME.
Molly White-foot's Vacation, by Anna H. Smith; The Sample Quilt.	620
A Pair of Pigeons; Dot's Tame Crow; A Clean Town; A Friend in Need; A Clever Dog.	621
POETRY.
The Spirit's Persuasion, by Sarah E. Burton.	612
"As We are Known," by Edward W. Stone.	616
Armenian Cradle-song, by Alice Stone Blackwell.	620
SPIRITUAL LIFE.	622
EDUCATION.	623
HERE AND THERE.	623
PLEASANTRIES.	624

Editorial.

THE question of parochial schools in this country has been considered a great deal in relation to the policy of the Catholic Church. But it would seem that in Canada it is likely to be the policy of the Episcopal Church. The triennial session of the Church of England of the ecclesiastical province of Canada in session in Montreal, has passed a resolution to the effect that the Church, having in view her highest interests, should as soon as possible, wherever practicable, secure the establishment of her own schools. The conditions in Canada and the United States are different. But every church that goes into the business of setting up ecclesiastical schools makes a drain on the public school system, and there is no education secured in ecclesiastical schools which wholly replaces that which may be obtained in the best secular school. Fortunately, the Protestant bodies, as a whole, have not felt it necessary to establish sectarian schools; and their competition with the public-school system is mainly through private schools established on social and fashionable lines.

SOME time ago the pope of Rome wrote an encyclical, in which he appealed to the people of the East and West to acknowledge his supremacy. The letter was received with courtesy and in a friendly spirit by some of the officials of the Eastern Church, though it is perfectly evident to any one who knows the condition of the Eastern Church that the dogma of papal supremacy has not a ghost of a chance of acceptance. The Greek archbishop of Smyrna was not content to pass the papal letter by without giving it a theological whack. The archbishop characterizes the demand of the pope as counter to the teachings of the Gospels, to the apostolic traditions, and to the decisions of the ecumenical councils, and counter to the doctrines of the Holy Fathers of the Eastern and Western Churches of the first nine centuries. The archbishop brands as heretical innovations the doctrine of the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son, the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Mother of God, the Roman practice in regard to sprinkling in baptism and of unleavened bread at the Eucharist, and the doctrine of the supremacy and the infallibility of the pope. "In short," says the archbishop, with a good deal of temper, "these men who have come from the Occident into the light-bringing Orient for the unholy and profane purpose of contaminating the orthodox with their false doctrines are false teachers and lying prophets, who have closed their eyes to the true light and have darkened their understanding."

MR. BOOKER T. WASHINGTON won a decided victory for himself and his people at the opening of the Atlanta Exhibition last week. The electric impulse which the President's daughter gave with her finger from Gray Gables, which started the machinery of the exhibition several hundred miles away, will not be so far-reaching in its consequences as the electric impulse of Mr. Washington's eloquence at the same exposition. The Boston Transcript, which has long given an earnest support to Mr. Washington and his work at Tuskegee, says: "The speech of Mr. Washington at the Atlanta Exhibition this week seems to have dwarfed all the other proceedings and the exhibition itself. The crowd that listened to it were carried away with enthusiasm, and the sensation it has caused in the press has rarely been equalled. The Southern papers themselves pronounce it epoch-making, and call it the beginning of the end of the war between the races. All this is no great surprise to those who have kept informed upon the development of industrial and other education for Negroes in the Negro-populated districts of the country. Intelligent and sympathetic observers have long been aware that it was through the silent and serious and steady work of the schools for the Negroes that the solution of the race problem was coming, and not through the passions of politics, stirred and kept hot by tricky professional party managers for use in presidential elections. Mr. Washington is no different from what he has been: he is saying no more than he and his backers have been saying for years. But he is a great revelation to those who have hitherto regarded the Negro question as one simply calling for slangwhanging partisan and sectional abuse instead of philosophy, patience, and study."

IN another column we have treated the more political aspects of Italian unity in relation to the temporal power of the pope. But we cannot overlook the fact that, although the movement for the establishment of Italian unity was a political one yet there were also in it intellectual and religious forces of considerable power. We do not deny for a moment the spiritual elements which enter into Roman Catholicism, and which have been beautifully embodied in the lives of its saints. But, on the other hand, there has been another tendency in the same Church which can as little be overlooked: it is the tendency to place stress upon external elements in religious service. One may turn to the catechism of the Council of Trent, and find, of course, that a spiritual interpretation is given to all these forms, ceremonies, sacraments, and images. But it is nevertheless true that the clergy have from time to time fallen into a most mechanical administration of them and even the Church, in its highest authority of pope and council, recognizes the salvatory magic of a simple external service. Thus, if no priest is at hand to baptize a dying infant, anybody, man or woman, Catholic or Protestant, may perform the ceremony; and the outward act is supposed to have salvatory power. This is externalism of the most absolute and dangerous character, and it has not been confined to Roman Catholicism. In the revival in Italy twenty-five years ago the reaction against papal supremacy was also a reaction against the mental and social oppression of an army of priests, who represented the tradition of mechanical service and external authority in religion.

THE papal delegate in this country, Mgr. Satolli, in defending the right of the pope to temporal sovereignty, based it on the ground that "the pope, as head of the Catholic Church, must be independent of all human authority." With thinking people, however, such a statement will not help in the slightest the claim of the pope's temporal supremacy, because it is as indefensible as the doctrine it is supposed to support. There is no reason in history, philosophy, ethics, or common sense why the pope should be "independent of all human authority": there is every reason, on the other hand, why he should submit to constituted authority wherever it is legitimately exercised. "Some sort of restraint," says Mgr. Satolli, "is inevitable, so long as the territory in which the holy see is located belongs to another power." This is undoubtedly true. The pope is obliged to obey the laws of the country in which he resides. This is what every good citizen ought to do, if he is to share the protection which allegiance secures. The doctrine of Archbishop Satolli is not that set forth by Paul or observed by Jesus, whose teachings the popes have mistranslated into, "Render unto the popes the authority which belongs to Cæsar." In overthrowing papal supremacy, the Catholics of Italy set themselves squarely in opposition to this doctrine that "the head of the Catholic Church must be independent of all human authority." It may be humiliating to the pope to receive coins with the image of the king of Italy on them; but it means that the Italian people have begun to distinguish between the functions of the Church and those of the State, and, while they are willing that the pope should exercise the first of these, they do not mean that he shall exercise both.

A CURIOUS form of superstition has appeared in connection with the administration of asylums for the insane in Germany. It is made the subject of an extended article in Das Protestantenblatt of September 7. Some of these institutions in Bielefeld, Kaiserswerth, Elberfeld, and Münster, are mentioned as being under a controlling ecclesiastical influence which directly interferes with the doctors in their treatment of mental disease. An active controversy has sprung up between the doctors on the one side and some of the chaplains of these institutions on the other. Much of this controversy has appeared in print, and it is strange enough to find the religious founders and administrators of these institutions maintaining doctrines which take us back to the ideas of demonic possession revealed in the Gospels. A distinction is drawn between diseases of the body and diseases of the soul; and the soul doctors, as these pastors declare themselves to be, are of the opinion that, the less the medical doctors have to do with patients suffering from mental disease, the better.

OF course, they have established a jargon of their own, and talk about "the positive and negative functions of life" and the danger of having these crossed, resulting in bodily sickness. There is talk of "somatic and psychic and pneumatic negative, as well as positive functions," which might mean a good deal if it really meant anything. We are told that the world contains material, psychical, and pneumatic elements which can work us harm. "The psychic is the demonic, the pneumatic is the Satanic." Evil works personally in the last, though not in the first. The criminal is Satanically sick: the insane are demonically sick. These two elements, the demonic and Satanic, may be in strife with one another. There is some recognition of personal responsibility; but sin and possession appear as causes of mental disease, especially of epilepsy. Cure, therefore, is to be sought on the pathway of religion. Pastor Bodelschwing of Bielefeld distinctly declares that it is in the highest degree essential that those who are mentally diseased, especially epileptics, should be brought into the spirit of prayer; for "epilepsy is, if not in all cases, to be traced to the direct influence of Satan." It is not surprising, after reading this and much more superstition of the same kind, that the Centralblatt für Psychiatrie und Nervenheilkunde should say that a "few steps further in that direction, and no cultivated physician will take a position in an insane asylum." The assembly of German alienists in 1893 wisely declared that "the acceptance by a physician of a place in an institution not under medical control is in opposition to the interests and dignity of the medical profession." Sixty-five prominent physicians of Bremen have sent an address of thanks to Dr. Scholz, director of a Bremen hospital, for bringing these facts before the public.

FREE ITALY.

Italy has been rejoicing in the twenty-fifth anniversary of her unity and freedom, and she certainly has something to rejoice over. Twenty-five years have shown that the victories of Garibaldi and Victor Emmanuel were not empty of lasting and valuable consequence. Even the most casual and superficial observer cannot go to Rome without seeing striking proof of the progress which Italy has made since her freedom from papal dominion, and one who looks deeper into the life and history of Italy will find still greater reason for satisfaction.

The uprising of Italy was not distinctly a war between Roman Catholicism and any Protestantism or any other form of religious faith. Italy was and is still essentially a Catholic nation. The victory is primarily a political one. If it involved the overflow of the papal dominion, it was simply because the Catholic Church had usurped political powers, and stood opposed to modern ideas. It was not a conflict between politics and religion as such, but between sectionalism and nationality, between mediævalism and the nineteenth century, between democracy and hierarchy; for, though Italy is still monarchical in form, it became essentially democratic in spirit. The papacy was altogether an artificial despotism, a relic of an age and an order when the Church, forgetting its proper mission, became in its greed for power a stern, despotic hierarchy. Its despotism was shown not merely in the burdens which it imposed upon the people of Italy, but in the development it kept them from attaining. It was part of the policy of Rome, as it was under the slave-holders' oligarchy, not to educate the masses of the people. The enormous illiteracy in Italy was a strong indictment of the papal government. In 1870 sixty-four out of every hundred of the male population of Italy could not read or write. Beggary is still bad enough in Italy, but it was still worse then.

What Bismarck did for Germany Victor Emanuel did for Italy. He developed a feeling of national unity. Italy, like Greece, was for centuries swayed by the animosities and recriminations of sectional feeling. While Greece has always been distinguished for patriotism, it has been difficult until recent years to secure anything like real national unity. Italy has been similarly divided into Venetians, Tuscans, Romans, Neapolitans, and Lombards. This sectional feeling has not wholly been annihilated, any more than it is absent between North and South, East and West, in our own country. But it is now subordinate, there as here, to the unity represented by the national flag. In a visit to Italy two years ago the writer was impressed with the warmth of Italian patriotism and the development of a democratic sentiment in connection with the national spirit.

The establishment of the temporal power of the pope and the sway it exercised, not only over Italy, but over Europe, compelling emperors to cringe to its authority, is one of the most remarkable examples of the perversion of Christianity. Nothing would seem further from the spirit of the young Nazarene who preached the Sermon on the Mount than the establishment in his name of temporal dominion over the world, enforcing its claims at the edge of the sword, and imposing curses in this life and the life to come on those who resist its power. The yoke of papal authority was broken in England, in Germany, and in France; but it was laid heavily on the neck of Italy, and its threatening shadow was cast over other countries. Under the inspiration of great leaders, the Italian people rose and broke the yoke which galled them; and it is safe to say that, if left to themselves, they will not suffer again from this particular form of oppression. There is just as much likelihood of the renewal of American slavery as of the renewal of papal supremacy in Italy. The only way this can be brought about is by the interference of foreign powers who may be jealous of Italy as she is, but who would have little occasion to fear the temporal power of the pope. The people of Italy cannot be hoodwinked by the part which the pope plays in his assumed rôle of prisoner in Rome. They know perfectly well that he can have just as much freedom as rightfully belongs to him, and that he has no right to rob them of theirs.

An intelligent observer and writer communicated to the Christian Register a few years ago the results of interesting observations in Italy. In this article he said:—

Two things seem to me to be as irrevocably settled as anything in human affairs can be: first, that the once called "States of the Church" are permanently States of Italy, owing sole and undivided allegiance to the Italian government; second, that the Rome of the popes has vanished forever, to make room for the Rome of the people,—the capital of a free and united Italy. The spiritual sovereignty of the pope is possibly as strong as it was two hundred years ago: his temporal sovereignty has been completely abolished, with not the remotest prospect of restoration in any shape or on any conditions. He may call himself what he pleases, and his friends may call him what they please; but he is now, and will remain, simply the head of the Catholic Church, with no more real civil authority or power than one of his own chamberlains. He and his successors may cling to the fiction of temporal power as long as they choose; but neither he nor they can get rid of the hard and stubborn fact that the temporal power of the papacy is as much a thing of the past as the rotten borough system in England or African slavery in America, and the sooner this is fully understood and accepted in England and America and everywhere else, the better for all concerned. The work of abolition has been deliberately done by those who felt the temporal power longest, and know it most thoroughly from its beginning to its end,—the Italian people themselves. Who can doubt their absolute right to do it? Who can doubt that they knew precisely what they were doing, and precisely why? And who can doubt that the work thus done will stand?

Let Italy be kept free from foreign interference, and this verdict, we believe, will stand.

The papacy lost a great opportunity,—the opportunity to promote and gratify the aspirations of the Italian people. This lost opportunity cannot be easily regained. The present pope has done something for Catholicism by seeking to adjust it to certain aspects of human progress. But he has not yet fully discerned that the real progress of spiritual religion is not in the direction of political domination. Christianity has been spread greatly by the sword, but every conquest thus gained has been in violation of the Christian ideal of peace and love.

The Catholic Church in the United States has shown that it can prosper without temporal sovereignty, that it can adjust itself to free democratic institutions; and some of the strongest champions of the separation of Church and State in this country are Catholics. Christianity in Italy has nothing to lose, but everything to gain, by this new infusion of liberty and patriotism in the Italian people, who, in spite of the drain on their resources imposed by a heavy standing army, have made remarkable progress in education, civil and political freedom, and in the embodiment of the humane sentiment in laws and institutions.

MELANCHOLY.

Melancholy is not a fixed quantity, always and everywhere the same thing. It has as many complexions as Fortune herself, varying from the most delicate shade of blue, which is hardly more than a pleasing foil to happiness, through deepening gradations of gray, down to the blackest hues of despair; and Shakspeare has even described it as sometimes green and yellow. Poets have sung of the charm of melancholy long before Fletcher or Milton or Rogers; and then, again, they have written words when under its blighting influence that almost succeed in withering health and joy and hope in the heart of man. Our own moods are sufficiently varied to reflect at one time or another nearly all the changes of feeling which poet may picture or pathologist analyze.

Sónya Kovalevsky, in her "Recollections of Childhood," describes certain stages in the girlhood of her sister Aniuta which may be taken as symbolic of moods that are not uncommon, especially in the lives of young girls who have plenty of time to think about themselves. One of these stages was the period when Aniuta indulged herself to the full in the luxury of melancholy. It followed the romantic period when she imagined herself a young damsel of the Middle Ages, and preceded the time when she was convinced that her vocation in life was to become an actress. Aniuta saturated herself with thoughts of the questions she could not answer and of the longings she could not satisfy, as if she were the first person who had ever had to meet them. The outcome was this period of gentle melancholy, when she took Saint Thomas à Kempis for her model. Her words, her actions, her whole person, were expressive of renunciation and soul-crushing resignation. She tasted the joys of a painless martyrdom, and every one in the house was touched with respect for this unusual seriousness. Poor little Sónya felt ashamed of not being sufficiently depressed herself, and she envied the depth of her sister's feelings. It would show a shallow knowledge of human nature to find anything uncommon in the state of mind thus depicted; and the sentimentality of this "most humorous sadness" is hardly worth noticing, since it is as transient as the ripple of a wave.

Half-way between the melancholy which is a pleasure to poets and maidens and the bitterness of actual pessimism is that expressed in the Greek epigrams, which mourn that the joy of life disappears and that men are in reality less than nothing, yet are all the more sensitive to present beauty and pleasure. This is akin to the melancholy of Omar Khayyám, which is so mingled with philosophy and beauty as to almost convert us for the time being to the delight of sadness, even in this more persistent form.

The great "Melancholia" of Albrecht Dürer, which Thomson has chosen for the tutelary goddess of his "City of Dreadful Night," is a fit emblem of the despairing, unrelenting misery of such men as Leopardi, Heine, and Thomson himself. She sits on her granite pedestal, leaning forward, with her cheek on her clenched left hand, deep in sombre thought. The instruments of science are scattered about her feet, but none of them has availed to unlock the dreadful mysteries of Time. Her passionate endeavor has been in vain; and she believes that struggle brings defeat because there are no prizes to crown success, that the oracles cheat because they know no secrets. Leopardi and Heine suffered the severest physical ills; and Bertram Dobell says of Thomson that he had "much of that self-torturing spirit which afflicted Rousseau and drove Cowper to insanity." Mrs. Cavazza thinks that these incurable sufferings sufficiently account for the gloom of their poetry. She adds that Leopardi was like a "divine, sad nightingale, singing amid a moonless grove"; while Heine had in his sophisticated song "the mocking-bird's cries and laughter, broken and feverishly alternated,"—a bit of comparison most just and effective.

It is not worth while to study too closely the various forms and expressions of melancholy, especially in its most despairing utterances; and yet it is but a superficial optimism that does not take such experiences into account. On the whole, how few are the examples of such continued sadness! The majority of men and women accept simply and bravely the ordinary duty of cheerfulness, and hardly anything increases our respect for human nature more than this. Sorrow comes to all, but the common relations and duties of life demand that we hide our grief in our hearts, and go on living our own lives with unabated helpfulness. Earnest people have little time to indulge in the luxury of melancholy. Thoughtful people discover that there are compensations for sorrow always and everywhere, and even he who is most tempted to rebel against his fate needs only to look about him to see that he is not bearing it alone. "It makes men dumb to see what others have to endure."

In the feeling of brotherhood and mutual helpfulness there is the beginning of comfort; and other reasons for happiness reappear later, till life widens once more to peace and joy. It is better to be manly than to be a coward, better to suffer in silence than to live on the alms of pity from those who have their own troubles to bear, better to face life as it is than to sigh for an impossible world of ease and pleasure.

THE NATIONAL PRISON CONGRESS.

The annual session of the National Prison Association was held in Denver from the 14th to the 18th of this month. Wardens from Massachusetts to California and from Minnesota to Texas were in attendance, besides chaplains, secretaries of State boards of charities, and scientific students of penology. It was a good meeting. The papers were brief, and the discussions pertinent; while the general tone and spirit were all that could be desired.

The subjects that came before the association were familiar ones,—the indeterminate sentence, labor in prisons, prisoners' aid societies, the parole, educative industries, the comparative value of the Auburn and Pennsylvania or the separate and associated systems, the duties of the chaplain, and the introduction of reformatory methods into State penitentiaries as well as into reformatories for so-called first offenders. There was, also, an excellent paper on the water supply for prisons, which, however, was quite as applicable to any public institution or private home as to penal structures.

A paper on "Prisoners' Aid Societies," by Rev. S. J. Barrows, was a summary of what the civilized world is doing in that direction. The work of the United States for ex-convicts is not brilliant as compared with some of the European nations.

Mr. Z. R. Brockway, superintendent of the Elmira Reformatory, was the central figure of the congress, not only in physical stature, but in experience, wisdom, and notably in the affection of the people. Whenever he spoke, his words were received as those of a seer; and, wherever he moved, he was surrounded by loving and admiring devotees. One felt like echoing the toast of one of his loyal friends,—“Mr. Brockway: the World could not down him.”

Two public addresses were given by Mr. Brockway, one at Denver and one at Colorado Springs, in which he summarized the results of his forty-four years' experience in dealing with prisoners, and testified to the value of the indeterminate sentence and the parole system.

A paper by Dr. A. G. Warner on "Politics and Crime" elicited warm discussion. It was carefully prepared, after his usual scientific and painstaking manner, so evident in his admirable work on "American Charities"; but the arraignment of political methods was so severe that, had the paper been written by a less distinguished student and conscientious scientist, it would have seemed an exaggeration. The noble examples of officials who are superior to the sins and vices of those whom he scourged show what is possible, and afford the hope that communities may be educated till they demand no other. For the old saying, "Like father, like child," is no truer than "Like community, like public official." The only remedy for the discouraging state of affairs in many a city is the slow process of education.

Massachusetts was well represented by Warden Scott of the Concord Reformatory, who makes a good impression wherever he goes, and by the moral instructor, Rev. W. J. Batt, of the same institution, who is well known for his genuine goodness and his equally genuine modesty. But no women's prisons or reformatories in the country were represented at Denver. The feminine pronoun with reference to prisoners was not once heard. This might perhaps have been taken as an unconscious compliment to women or a tacit acknowledgment of their virtue; but no one knows better than these experienced wardens the relation of women to crime, and, had Mrs. Johnson or Mrs. Brackett been there, they could have told not only of the female offenders of Massachusetts, but of the wise ways there adopted for reforming these vicious and criminal girls and women. But, as it was, one might have supposed all the women of the land to be saints, though to every eight hundred of the population there is a masculine sinner immured in some prison.

One of the most effective speakers at the congress was H. H. Hart, secretary of the State Board of Charities and Corrections of Minnesota, a good thinker, quick observer, ready speaker, and endowed with an unusual amount of sterling good sense. His address at the chaplains' meeting on Sunday night was a model, and was warmly received. The secretaries of State boards, several of whom attend these congresses, are influential in creating a public opinion in favor of reform, and in many instances achieve more in this direction than the wardens themselves, whom an ignorant public suspect to be "interested" if they favor civil service reform or the parole system.

Gen. Brinkerhoff, the president of the congress, was never more earnest in his advocacy of good methods. His benignant face shone with real joy as he told of his delightful experiences in Europe during his recent visit at the time of the International Prison Congress. He gave a vivid picture of the contrast between receiving jails and prisons of detention in Great Britain and those in this country. There each prisoner, as he is received, goes into a separate cell, and never sees any other prisoner. He characterized certain features of the American jail system as worse than anything to be found in Russia, and, though a guest in Denver, criticised the city jail there as one of the worst in some respects that he had ever seen. The jails of this country are, with a few exceptions, a national disgrace.

No decision as to the place of meeting of the next congress was reached. One thing, however, was determined,—that more time than ever before is to be given to the consideration of the prevention of crime. That decision marks the high plane on which the Prison Congress stands. It is not enough to know how to treat men in prison: it is vastly more important to know how to deal with them, so that, once out, they shall never come in again, and more important yet to know how to set in motion influences which shall keep them from entering the criminal ranks. Theorists may tell how this might be done; but prison wardens and chaplains, who have had a chance to study the convict and his origin, know exactly where the danger lies, and they are the ones who ought to warn the public. The first and chief preventive of crime, they are all agreed, is education of the whole man, hand, heart, and head. Mr. Brockway made the striking statement that in his experience of more than forty years he had never had under his care a convict who was a college graduate. But more valuable to the average man than book education is the training of the hand.

The sessions of the congress were held in the pretty and convenient Unitarian church; and among the wisest words spoken were those by Rev. J. H. Crooker in one of the evening addresses. He himself said that the discussion which followed was one of the most impressive hours he had ever spent.

The unbounded hospitality of the Colorado people added to the delightful memories that were stored away during the ten days that your correspondent sojourned among them. The ascent of mighty Pike's Peak revealed majesty and glory, and a vast world of interest and beauty spread below; but the smaller world of domestic life revealed by admission to the sacred fireside was far more beautiful and of a glory as unfading.

B. C. B.

Musings.

THE English people have the strangest notions of geography. To an American they seem very much mixed up. There is hardly a New England boy of ten years who does not know that Boston is situated on Boston Bay, that Cambridge is about three miles from Boston, and Dorchester about four miles in another direction. But, if you ask an English school-boy, he will tell you that Boston is on "The Wash," that Cambridge is fifty miles away, and Dorchester one hundred and seventy-five. If you ask him how far Weymouth is from Dorchester, he will get the distance about right. He will be decidedly off about the situation and distance of Plymouth; and, if you carry the examination still further, he will show the most remarkable confusion concerning geographical relations. You will be told that Hull is at least fifty miles from Boston by water, and may conclude that it will be of no use to go down there to spend the summer if you expect to come to Boston every day. You will be told that Beverly is high and dry on the land, some ten miles from the water, and that, instead of being able to reach it by electric car from Lynn, it is a railroad journey of several hours. If you dispute the English school-boy, he will show you all this down on the map. You put on your glasses, and look at one of these strange productions; and you begin to think that the map was made in some inebriate asylum, or that England must have suffered some terrible earthquake which has utterly dislocated the whole geography of the isle. To be sure, the island is not very large; and so it is not possible for a town to travel a great distance east or west or north and south, for that matter, without getting into the water. Nevertheless, the disturbance is sufficient to greatly confound your calculations. If you are in Boston, for instance, and want to take a drive on the Brighton road, you will have to go a hundred and fifty miles before you reach the Chestnut Hill reservoir. You will find that Peterboro has thrust itself in between Brighton and Boston, and that, in fact, you pass very close to Hartford, St. Albans, Uxbridge, Kingston, before you even get to Brighton. There is some advantage, to be sure, in being able to take in all these places, as you may do if you have hitched your buggy to a locomotive.

I MAY as well say that the railroad men in England are thoroughly in league with the map-makers, and that it would be of no use for you to correct these errors on the map unless you can reconstruct the country as well. Just what this means will further appear when I say that Exeter has strangely been brought into neighborhood with Tiverton, that Dartmouth is not a great way from King's Bridge, which, when I was a boy, used to be on the Harlem River. Portland is close by Weymouth, but Pembroke is one hundred and seventy-five miles by land from Weymouth. Taunton and Bridgewater are somewhere near where they ought to be, and Bristol is not an unreasonable distance from Newport; but Manchester, Northampton, Winchester, are hopelessly scattered, and Leicester and Lancaster are not within a hundred miles of each other. This being the case, it is not strange that Norwich should have landed about forty miles from Ipswich, and that Maldon should be much nearer Braintree and Chelmsford than Boston; while Waltham, well known as the site of the great American watch factory and the residence of some delightful people, is but ten miles from Hartford, where Dr. Bushnell used to preach with such power. Newmarket, which, when I left America, was peacefully settled in New Jersey, had shifted within a few miles of Cambridge when I reached the other side; and Haverhill, instead of being directly north of Boston and some thirty miles away, as I left it, was about sixty miles south. Bolton and Greenfield are singularly near together, and Wakefield has moved about twenty-five miles east of Greenfield. Chesterfield, the summer home of Rev. John W. Chadwick, is but a few miles south of Sheffield. Newark, one of the principal cities of New Jersey, has got wedged between Lincoln and Nottingham; and Stamford has lost its position on the New Haven Road, and moved in the direction of Peterboro. Tamworth is not far from Sutton; and Worcester, instead of being the heart of the Commonwealth, has moved toward the south-west. Tewksbury is not far from Gloucester. The map of England shows but one Oxford; while every American knows there are at least thirty equitably distributed over the United States. New York and Connecticut seem to have suffered much by this English earthquake; for Rochester and Chatham have collided, while Woodstock and Enfield are miles apart. Andover is reasonably near Amesbury; but Wareham, Milford, Wellington, Dover, Sandwich, Bedford, Glastonbury, Truro, Hartland, are so hopelessly dislocated that no geographical surgeon could set them straight. What shall we say of education in England when this fearful jumble of situations is passed off as modern geography? I suggest that Parliament appoint a board of survey to come to this country, and find out just where these places really are.

THERE is another aspect of this question which is more complimentary to England. It is the fact that, beginning with our Pilgrim and Puritan fathers, and coming down to the present time, the settlers of this country from the eastern coast to the Mississippi and beyond, but especially in New England, have shown their gratitude to the mother country by using the names which history or personal association had there made intimate or famous. It is even pathetic to study the map of New England, and see with what tenderness and affection the Puritan fathers remembered their old homes. They could not bring with them the old soil and the familiar places, but they could perpetuate the music of familiar names. And to this day, when the tide of travel has turned and New England sends its pilgrims yearly to the old country, their interest is greatly enhanced by seeking the old places from which so many New England towns were named. Some of the old English towns have indeed derived more fame from the New World than they could have had without it. The new Boston has long since surpassed the old in fame and beauty, though none of its church towers have reached the height of the grand parish church, the "Old Stump," in which John Cotton preached. This association is far more interesting and natural, and far less ridiculous, than that from which the people of New York suffer, owing to the legislative pedantry which sowed that State with Greek and Roman names. But we have borrowed from England, Greece, and Rome long enough; and I am glad that in the new West many of the Indian names are preserved. They are a little hard to spell sometimes, but not so hard as the Welsh names which our forefathers mercifully spared us.

Brevities.

Rev. M. J. Savage is a grandfather, and has celebrated the event by writing a poem to his grandchild.

Some of our orthodox exchanges do not like the presentations of Unitarianism which Rev. Clay MacCauley has made to the Japanese. But, then, they do not like presentations of Unitarianism in this country.

Rev. M. J. Savage is going to stay by Boston, and Boston is going to stay by Mr. Savage. This will not prevent Mr. Savage from preaching outside of the city, for "Unity Pulpit" carries his sermons every week to a large number of readers.

It is said that in France the bicycle fever has interfered with the business of theatres, cafés, etc. Who knows but it may be taken up by the Evangelical Alliance as a missionary agency? Yet ministers here are wont to complain that it interferes somewhat with church-going.

The State University of California is still under suspicion on account of the liberal views of some of its professors. The fact that Unitarians were allowed to hold services in Stiles Hall has created decided opposition on the conservative side. Of course, the Unitarians pay rent for the building, and only engaged it for temporal occupancy.

The members of the First Unitarian Church of San Francisco have just celebrated the thirty-first anniversary of the pastorate of Dr. Horatio Stebbins. Ladies of the congregation have presented to the church a life-size portrait of their honored pastor, which was painted by Miss Withrow. The portrait is said to be excellent; but the church, we believe, will still value most highly the speaking likeness of its pastor every Sunday morning.

The number of ministers on the roll of the "Congregational Year Book" increased last year forty per cent. more than the number of churches. The Congregationalist says, "If every church were manned, there would be at least one hundred unemployed ministers in Massachusetts seeking settlements." Does this mean that the harvest is small, and that the laborers are a great many? Perhaps it also means that many are not called, and therefore few are chosen.

We are glad to say that Rev. Francis Tiffany, who has been spending a few weeks at the Massachusetts Hospital for a necessary surgical operation, has returned to his home in Cambridge, where, we trust, his progress will be as rapid and as sure as the affectionate wishes of his large circle of friends and admirers would have it. Mr. Tiffany will soon issue in book form the charming letters, carefully revised, which he contributed to the Christian Register during his trip around the world.

Mr. Courtney Guild, private secretary of Mayor Curtis of Boston, is able to turn his hand at short notice to a variety of employments. At an hour's notice he was called upon last week to represent the city at the Italian festival, and paid a warm tribute to the Italian patriots. A few days after he was as suddenly called upon to take the place of an oarsman in a boat-race, and his boat came in the winner by five feet. And last Sunday, at the Unitarian meeting on the Common, he was drafted as chorister. Evidently, Mr. Guild does not belong to the unemployed, and has no difficulty in getting a situation.

We have heard much about the bicycle face, and now it appears that there is a "preacher's face." A writer in the Homiletic Review has discovered it. We should hope it might be such a face as Moses had when he came down from the mountain. But this writer, who quotes the observation of a business man, says: "There is about it a certain set of the muscles, especially in the upper part of the face, the skin over the cheek-bones is peculiarly immobile; and there is something in the face that seems to denote unfamiliarity with the rough ways of the world. 'Oh, yes,' said he, 'if you are a close observer, you can almost always tell a preacher-face.'"

Pro and Con.

PRICKED CARDS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

May I through the columns of your paper thank the friends who so generously answered our appeal for pricked cards? The waifs and the weaklings of our playgrounds have been made contented by sewing the simple designs, while the bright and beauty-loving children have rejoiced in the more intricate patterns. The anxieties of the matrons and the self-imposed labors of Miss Tower have been greatly lessened by being able to give out cards almost daily, —a luxury the children have never before enjoyed. To all those who kindly contributed we send our happy thanks.

KATE GANNETT WELLS.

A CORRECTION ACCEPTED.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Not having now within reach the historical publication to which my memory referred in an incidental remark respecting the Plymouth Pilgrims, I accept the correction courteously made by "E. A." in the Register of the 19th inst., and thank him for it.

C. K. W.

LIBERAL ORGANIZATION.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

In your issue of August 8 is an article from one of your most eminent editorial correspondents, "M. J. S.," touching a vital point of "The American Congress of Liberal Religious Societies." I was a delegate to the congress, in May of the present year, from the Non-sectarian Church of this city. I felt, at the conclusion of its work, that probably there was just a little confusion among some of the leaders as to the real aim of the congress.

It seems to me to be a very simple matter, and one easily solved, if we take a large and judicious view of it. It is probably true that the word "liberal" is out of place in the name of the organization, for the simple reason that men who do not belong to liberal churches take part in its work; and there is a desire that evangelical churches should become members. The congress is, first of all, a kind of religious and ethical "clearing house," or common meeting place, for "all kinds and conditions of men" and opinions. To this work no one can object.

But it is urged that no movement can live unless it becomes aggressive, lays out a definite work, and pursues that work with wisdom and energy. This is also true. There is one simple, straightforward course for the congress here, it seems to me; and that is to send out active missionaries to do a much needed work. Let there be a clear and frank understanding between the congress and other liberal bodies, and then there will be no need of criticism or disagreement.

There are Unitarian, Universalist, Reformed Jewish, and Ethical Culture organizations for founding new and sustaining weak societies of their respective kinds. Hence this is not the specific, aggressive work of the congress.

Here are two considerations that front all these movements: 1. There are many places "ripe for the harvest" of some form of liberal religion. All the liberal movements combined do not by any means occupy the field. Here is room for the congress to work, and to this no one should object.

2. What kind of societies ought the congress to organize? In the very nature of the case, each locality should settle this matter for itself. We sometimes forget the worth of our plea for congregational independence. Let the society, when organized, choose its own name, and co-operate with as many or as few organizations as it chooses to do. The missionary ought to be a discreet man, and never attempt a new organization where one of the liberal faith already exists. He should encourage people to join freely the liberal church of their choice, after due deliberation and investigation. In the event—and here probably I touch upon the sorest difficulty in the matter—that a Unitarian church desires to become a member of the congress, and cease to affiliate with the Unitarian body, or if an independent church wishes to withdraw from the congress and affiliate with the Unitarians, Universalists, Ethical Culturists, or Jews, in the name of all that is fair, let such society "go in peace." Who has a right to raise a single question against such a change?

If in the organization of societies there are a few Jews or Unitarians or others, and they willingly join and engage in the work of the movements, who can say, Nay? It seems to me that any objection to this line of work, under the circumstances, is out of the question. Let us all work with might and main. Let us co-operate earnestly. Let us think more of the needs of humanity than of any party names, and these seeming difficulties will vanish.

J. W. CALDWELL,

Associate Minister Non-sectarian Church, St. Louis, Mo.

For the Christian Register.

THE SPIRIT'S PERSUASION.

[To L. M. B.]

BY SARAH E. BURTON.

Often, like music from far distant viols
Which soothes and uplifts and dispels all unrest,
A softly breathed whisper, divine in compassion
And tender reproof, brings its balm to my breast:

"Enter, O soul, enter now the fair kingdom
Whither thy day-dreams have evermore flown;
Beautiful is it,—that vast peopled Silence!
Let it to thee be no longer unknown.

"Wait not the future to give thee fruition:
All is but seeming,—this parting and loss!
Know that thou art, as thy loved are, immortal:
Few are the barriers and easy to cross.

"Nearer than aught the eye ever beholdeth,
More real and more precious than all the world's show,

Lo, this thy heritage! Soul, why so blindly
Follow and cling to its shadow below?

"Nor key, gate, nor warder doth hinder thine entrance,

Naught but thyself bars the way to the throne;
Break thou the bondage of doubt and denial,
Enter, O soul, and possess thou thine own.

"Through all the ages my love hath enfolded
My children to lift them from sorrow and strife:
O thou who hath being alone in my bosom,
Awake to the truth, and attain perfect life!"

INTERNATIONAL PRISON CONGRESS.

BY SAMUEL J. BARROWS, SECRETARY OF THE AMERICAN DELEGATION.

III.

Only in the most general way in this closing article can I refer to the work of the other three sections of the Congress.

PRISON ADMINISTRATION.

The adoption of some method of identifying prisoners led to the invention and development some years ago by M. Bertillon of the system which bears his name. Delegates were given an opportunity of observing the working of this system in Paris. It has now been adopted in various parts of the United States, in Russia, Norway, Switzerland, and in Great Britain. The Congress recommended its general adoption.

The question whether female prisoners should receive different treatment from male, and whether a special system of penalties should be applied to them, led to the adoption of resolutions declaring the necessity of establishing special prisons for women, governed by special rules and regulations. The Congress also declared itself in favor of cellulaire imprisonment for women. If it had been possible to transport the Woman's Prison of Massachusetts to Paris for a few weeks, an excellent object-lesson of what a woman's prison ought to be would have been set before the delegates.

The Congress declared in favor of the necessity of labor in all prisons as an indispensable element of order, health, and morality. The question whether prisoners have a right to a salary created a lively discussion. It was decided that, while the prisoner has not a right to wages, it is wise, in the interest of discipline and improvement, to encourage him through gratuities. And here it may be remarked that nearly all the countries on the continent allow prisoners a certain portion of their earnings, part of which they may spend for extras while in prison, and part of which is reserved until the time of their release. Some practical questions of classification were also considered, and the extent to which hope and fear ought to be appealed to in prison discipline, and the treatment of insane criminals.

PREVENTIVE MEANS.

Mendicity and vagabondage received much discussion. A distinction was made between invalid or infirm mendicants and accidental or professional vagabonds. The first, it was held, need to be assisted until they recover strength enough to help themselves; accidental vagabonds should be sent to refuges, or stations, where work is obligatory; and professional vagabonds ought to be the subject of some severe method of repression. It was urged that the most efficacious way of dealing with professionals is prolonged confinement in special labor colonies, like those in Belgium; though objection was made to the aggregation of such large masses of vagabonds.

Prison libraries were approved, and it was thought that some special journal properly prepared for prisoners would be a useful adjunct. The question of alcoholism received the attention it deserves. The necessity of reducing intemperance which fills prisons, hospitals, and insane asylums, was forcibly presented. Among the means for its restriction were mentioned a diminution in the number of licenses, reduction of the production of alcohol, and a monopoly in the hands of the State. Prohibition was even advocated, and also the establishment of the Swedish and Norwegian system, together with the multiplication of temperance cafés. Dr. Magnan, chief physician of the asylum of St. Anne of Paris, made an excellent and earnest report. He gave the history of the progress of inebriate asylums in America, England, Germany, and Switzerland. He emphasized the necessity of requiring dipsomaniacs to remain in an asylum sufficiently long to establish a cure. One of the most successful of these asylums is in Zürich. From 30 to 70 per cent. of the inmates are cured, depending largely upon the length of time spent in the institution. Dr. Magnan maintained that, while natural light wines produced but little intemperance when used as beverages, great harm has come from the adulteration and artificial doctoring of wines; and he believes that all wines which are not absolutely natural ought to be prohibited. The establishment of laboratories for the examination of drinks and the prohibition of those which are dangerous was recommended. Senator Zakrewsky of St. Petersburg said that the Russian government is now occupied in establishing a monopoly of alcohol. It will be followed by a large diminution in receipts. The monopoly has already been introduced in four provinces. It will be introduced into twenty-seven departments next year, and finally in the others. The imperial government will suppress saloons at the same time. There will only be a limited number of licenses issued, held by persons subject to the State. Mr. Lejeune, Minister of State of Belgium, showed the results obtained in Holland from the new law on the consumption of alcohol. They did not appear to him satisfactory.

The Congress finally adopted a unanimous resolution, declaring that, owing to the growth of alcoholism, the main cause of which resides in the consumption of alcohol not rectified, and of artificial drinks whose influence is seen more and more every day in the development of crime, the public authorities should combine their action with that of voluntary associations in curative and preventive measures. Among these measures the counsel recommended the limitation and regulation of saloons and inns, the encouragement of hygienic drinks, and the development of the temperance propaganda. It favored the creation in each country of inebriate asylums, in which work should be well organized.

DISCHARGED CONVICTS.

The question of how best to aid discharged convicts was the subject of some elaborate and valuable reports, one of the best being that of Mr. E. J. Ruggles-Brise, chairman of the prison board of England and Wales. On the continent, as already said, prisoners are allowed very generally to accumulate a fund against the time of their discharge; and the question was what should be done to prevent them from wasting this accumulation and falling again into crime. In some places this is done by sending the balance to the mayor of the town in which the prisoner resides, in other places by placing it in the savings-banks, and permitting the discharged prisoner to draw only a small amount at stated intervals. Or it is put in the hands of the Discharged Prisoners' Aid Societies. To an American one of the most surprising and gratifying features of the Congress were the facts showing the large number of societies in England and on the continent for the aid of discharged prisoners. In this country, while we are ahead of Europe in some things, and notably in our best reformatories, we are far behind in extending rational aid to discharged convicts. There are not more than four or five active societies in the whole of the United States. In Great Britain alone there are ninety societies. In France there are fifty-four such societies, and they are formed into a national union. As a result of this reorganization and the increased interest developed, fifteen new societies were formed between May, 1893, and May, 1894. There are twenty such societies in Hungary, and a large number in Denmark. They exist also in Belgium, Holland, Italy, and Russia. But nowhere, perhaps, has so much been done in this direction as in Switzerland. The Swiss system is not a matter of money aid; nor is it, for the most part, aid through the establishment of labor homes, though this has a place there, as it has in France and England. The distinctive feature of the Swiss system is the fact that every prisoner who is not a confirmed repeater has a patron who acts as his friend and guardian when he comes out of prison. He stimulates his zeal, aids him in finding work, and is able to exercise a surveillance over him which is very different from that which is exercised by the police. The State assists these societies by subsidies, but the most efficient and practical work is that of the friendly and helpful personal relation which is established between the discharged prisoner and his patron. This is a beautiful realization in prison work of the principle, "Not alms, but a friend," which now is recognized in the work of our Associated Charities.

CHILDREN AND MINORS.

Concerning the treatment of children and minors I think we have less to learn from Europe than on many other questions. In this matter we are far ahead of England,—in Massachusetts, Michigan, and some other States, where the placing-out system is preferred to incarceration in houses of correction. Yet other States are woefully behind; and mere children are often committed to prison with older offenders. In the matter of juvenile reformatories a great advance has been made in Europe. Some of the best reformatories I have seen were in Italy; and I recall with satisfaction the visit made under the kind offices of my friend, Prof. George Boros of Kolosvár, Hungary, to the reformatory at that place. The spirit which prevailed was excellent, the accommodations were good, everything was scrupulously clean, and the administration wise and determined.

Interesting reports were given from different directors concerning the management of institutions for the young. Much attention was given to physical education, and a long discussion took place on the proper legal age of responsibility. An earnest discussion on the prevention of prostitution took place, and the subject was carried over to the next Congress,—1900.

In conclusion I may add that the value of the Congress cannot be determined merely by the work it has done during the week of its session. Its influence will be widely felt in a new impulse to the study of penological questions in all their relations, and in the development of wiser methods, better laws, and a more humane administration.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES.

BY REV. GEORGE W. COOKE.

The great meetings of the Young People's Christian Endeavor Societies and the Young People's Christian Union, held in Boston during July, have evidently aroused in Unitarians the conviction that it is time their own young people were organized and brought into active relations with the churches. It is not too much to say that the Endeavor movement is one of the most remarkable indications of the new religious life of our time. It is open to criticism in more than one direction,—for its show without substance, for its tendency to foster cant, and for its want of seriousness. After all is said against it, however, which can be justly urged, it remains true that it is doing an excellent work in a way well calculated to reach those who need its help. It has put new life into many a church, and it has saved the young people to religion.

It was true of most Unitarian churches a few years ago (as it is of many of them now) that they did not interest the young people. The service was not sufficiently attractive, the preaching was too scholarly, the social life too formal, to win their interest and their sympathy. Even now one may enter churches where there are not more than two or three persons under thirty-five years of age. You inquire about the young people, and find that they cannot be persuaded to attend church or that they have been won to the Episcopal Church by its superior attractions of young life, music, and a warm social atmosphere.

Thanks to the active and excellent work of the Unitarian Sunday School Society and other causes, the children are in our Sunday-schools. Much is done for them, and that of a quality and effectiveness which cannot be surpassed anywhere. We have not yet learned to do the same excellent work for those who have outgrown the Sunday-school. We are not reaching those who are from twelve to twenty-five years of age, and in such a way as to draw them from the Sunday-school into the church. The work done by some of the guilds shows what may be accomplished in this direction. This work needs to be extended into all our churches, and it needs to be so organized that all the young people's societies will be closely knit together into a general organization.

We can learn a lesson from the Christian Endeavor and the Christian Union organizations. It were foolish to refuse to learn that lesson because of an unwillingness to copy from others. The idea we may adopt, without the acceptance of the method as a whole. Yet it might be well for us to make use of the method to a large extent. That method has been developed with skill and a rare degree of wisdom, and it has proven abundantly capable of achieving noble results. If we are wise, we will give heed to the lesson which we have thus been taught, and improve upon the Endeavor method if we can. Certainly, the part of folly would be in ignoring it, not in its adoption.

If Unitarianism is ever to be permanently and widely effective, it must win the interest and the convictions of the young. It must so organize its churches and carry on their work that the young people born into them will not care to leave them for any other. That result we may wisely set before ourselves as the test of merit which the Endeavor movement has given us. If our church services are such as to attract the young, we may be sure they will attract the old. If our preaching is such as to interest the young it will be effective in winning the great unchurched. On the other hand, if our services and our preaching are such as to drive away the young men and women of our own congregations, we may be very sure they will never win the masses. The shortest and surest method of learning how to make our churches popular is to acquire the power of taking our own boys and girls from the Sunday-school into the congregation, that they may become regular and interested attendants upon church. When we can win the young, we can win the masses.

It is my opinion that we have before us, as a denomination, no work of anything like such importance as that of organizing our own young people. If it were necessary, we could well afford to drop every other work for the sake of this, that it might be given its real value. The results will not present themselves immediately in their full importance, but in the long run they will be surer and more satisfactory than from any other source. If we look forward to such missionary results as can be secured by the middle of the twentieth century, there can be no question that they will be much larger by the indirect method of training our own young people to a living interest in the religion which is ours than by any other we can follow.

We have now learned quite thoroughly that it is religion which must be the central motive in any attempt to win the young to our churches. All other methods have failed, and in such a way as to bring humiliation and a bitter sense of defeat. We must appeal directly to the religious instincts and needs of the young. We must give them religion in its simplicity and in its sincerity. We have gained nothing by trying to win the young with amusements and social attractions. We have gained even less by trying to win them by means of intellectual studies. These are excellent and greatly important in their way, but they do not afford the true means of making religion a vital power in the lives of boys and girls. Give the young religion. Speak to them from soul to soul, from one heart directly to another. They will undoubtedly prefer a religion which is rational and humanitarian; but it must appeal to the heart, to the imagination, and to the soul's deepest needs. Above everything else, it must give the young ideals; and it must give them a vision of a world which is fairer and better than the present. That fair world should not be a mere theory; but it should be embodied in the service of the church, in its ritual, and in its life. Then it will win the young, and, in keeping them within its fold, the church will find new life and power for itself.

If the Endeavor movement has taught us anything, it is that we ought to organize our young people not only into local guilds (or whatever the name taken), but that we must organize them for the denomination. That is, the local societies should be bound together into a body coextensive with the denomination, with definite aims and methods, with a spirit of comradeship and fellowship, and with some distinct work set before it which shall command the interest and enthusiasm of every member. We need in every church a young people's society which shall be for those between twelve and twenty-five what the Sunday-school is to the children, and which shall definitely and positively continue the work of the Sunday-school. In such a society the young may be led to love the local church and to become thoroughly loyal to it. They may be led to know the history, teachings, and spirit of Unitarianism, and therefore to become loyal members of the denomination. Our beliefs, methods, and aims may become familiar to them. They may be brought into touch with our general church life. They may also be brought to know of our missionary enterprises, and to regularly contribute to them. In a single word, they may be kept in our own churches and in our own denomination.

In order to secure such a result as this, we must take loving and sympathetic interest in the young. We must give them of our best, and in such a form that they can appreciate it. We can win them only through love and sacrifice. We must study their needs, condescend to the measure of their thoughts, and adapt our religious teaching to the capacities of their growing natures. When we have won them, we shall find that in every way our own religion has become truer, more helpful, and of richer promise.

THE "NEXT THING."

BY JUNIATA STAFFORD.

Life is perplexing to any one who looks at it with earnestness; and there are times when all of us would give much to some one who would simplify its problems. It is a bit of such simplifying that I hope to do with my word to-day.

From the first we desire to "fill a place in the world"; but it takes us a long time to realize that it must be our place and not that of another, nor a fanciful, imaginary, heroic place of our own creating that no conditions of our lives make possible. Carlyle gives the key when he says, "Work out the situation wherein thou even now standest," and, "Thy ideal is in thyself: the impediment, too, is in thyself." It is a good deal to know our limitations: it is a good deal more to realize our possibilities within those limitations. We can best know these in their relation to the next thing we have to do, or ought to do, or which is here to do. We waste much time in looking beyond and quite over that which is "next" us, in any sense of next. Perhaps it is next us in duty, perhaps in ability, perhaps in opportunity. At any rate, it is here and ours, and is what we can and may do. We save ourselves wrong and anxiety when we reach the point where we say: "I cannot solve all the problems of life. I may not look far into the future: perhaps I have no great mission to perform. I may not have wisdom to decide the great questions of life; but I can stand here, in my own place, and do the 'next thing' as well as I know how."

It is certainly true that, if we live up to the best we know to-day, it will be given us to know more to-morrow; and, if we ever wish to be heroes in any great emergency of life, we must be heroes-in-the-making all along. "The understanding of highest concern to every individual—that of his duties in this life—is found, not in the speculations about an infinite and unknown future, but in the needs of the present," says Louise Nydegger; and this is a growing belief with nearly all thoughtful persons of whatever creed.

Another simple help is to realize that every day is a fresh beginning. A friend of mine lived for many years with a sister; and they two always "began again" with the day, coming together, after the rest of the night and the "healing that night has shed," to greet each other with affection and fresh hope for the new day,—a distinged, fresh bit of life ready for their best using. In middle life this sister "went away," and my friend went to live in the family of another relative. There life "just went on." Can you realize the difference? No mental or moral vigor that was realized as corresponding to the physical vigor that comes with a new day. Yesterday lapped over on to-day, weighting it, and taking from it its spring; and life lost so much of its strength for this family and those who came in contact with them.

Will it seem very prosaic if I say that the breakfast hour and the manner of keeping it has much to do with this matter? If there is a time set and kept at which all members of the household can come together for the leisurely cheerful breakfast, it creates a very different mental and moral atmosphere and incentive from the irregular, half-attended morning scramble so common to many households.

Elocution teachers used to lay great stress upon the use of the vowels in reading; but the best teachers now realize that, if the consonants are carefully looked after, the vowels will almost take care of themselves, and thus good enunciation will be secured. It is so in the reading of life's lessons. If we look after the little daily "next" things, the great cardinal virtues will almost take care of themselves; and think how the consonants outnumber the vowels! In speaking of a beautiful life that had passed from the here into the beyond, W. C. Gannett once said, "Common sense, duty, unselfishness, self-respect, and a growing reverence from others,—this sums all up: the years held a thousand details and no events." Fortunately, most lives must be ordinary, with few or no events, with thousands of details that can make up the beauty of character and helpfulness, with only "next things" faithfully done, instead of carelessly or blindly looked over in our search for that which is worth while. This "next thing" is what is worth while, we come to find out, if we are wise; and it is often the gateway to the larger thing we desire to do. "The reward of doing our duty is the added power to do the next," George Eliot tells us; and it is true. Let us learn the lesson, if we would help others to solve life's problems; for our best teacher is he who "in his own heart first kept school."

Has life become a tangled hedge or a stone wall against which you beat in vain for a way through? Cease your frantic struggle, look close at hand for your "next thing" to do, and you may find it the breaking of a tiny twig that reveals a thin place in the hedge, or a latch that opens a door in the wall. Wonderful help and light will come if you tread this "next thing" pathway; and you will wonder why you ever weighted yourself down with yesterday and to-morrow, or sought afar for some great thing. What you will be worth to others in your serenity and growing ability can hardly be estimated, and every "next thing" will include more of value and radiating influence.

"So live thou here that, when thy life is fled,
No one may say of thee, 'This man is dead.'"

NO HERETICS NEED APPLY.

Dr. Briggs, the eminent Presbyterian divine who has been declared a heretic by his Church on account of his liberal theories of Bible interpretation, has furnished fresh trouble to the conservatives. This time he has been the innocent cause of agitation in the Episcopal communion. The Brotherhood of Saint Andrew, an organization of men of the Episcopal Church, has an annual convention; and of late years these meetings have partaken largely of the nature of a church congress, where various phases of the Church's work and activities are discussed by eminent speakers. Last year the brotherhood gave much attention to the labor question; and Harry Lloyd, the labor agitator, held an honored place on the platform, and was greeted with great enthusiasm.

As church unity is a subject of intense interest in the Episcopal Church to-day, the brotherhood, in arranging its programme for the 1895 convention at Louisville, secured Dr. Briggs, as one who has been conspicuous in the movement, for a speech on the subject. No sooner was the programme published, however, than a storm of protest went up from conservative or High Churchmen all over the country. Some of these took form in articles in the church papers, others in letters to the brotherhood authorities threatening to disband chapters of the organization in numerous parishes. So the brotherhood has yielded, and Dr. Briggs will not address it on church unity or any other subject.

The course of the conservatives is logical; but it seems none the less narrow, as logical action very often does. It is but fair to give the High Church side of the argument, which is to the effect that the Episcopal Church hardly could win credit for "soundness" in the faith on which it invites the union of Protestantism if it allowed a Presbyterian "heretic," officially so declared, to talk to one of its representative organizations on the very subject involved. But it may be questioned whether the conservatives' victory may not be productive of loss in other directions. Dr. Briggs's condemnation is indorsed by the Episcopal Church, and to that extent no bar raised against Presbyterians coming into the Church with a large "C." But everybody knows that the Presbyterians have no idea of coming into the Church, anyway. As usual with sticklers for letter and canon, the letter has won; but no substance of real, vital, genuine unity suffers a blow.—Boston Transcript.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

The treasurer would like to call the attention of the ministers and standing committees this week to the fact that the treasury of this Association needs early attention if the missionary work of the denomination is to have that effect upon the Unitarian cause that every one so much desires. There is not very much need for remarks from this place; but, if the ministers will make some pointed remarks from their pulpits, and also to the workers in every church, as they are called into consultation in private; it will help matters along. There is only one way for this Association to get money, and that is from our good Unitarians who really care to see the truth, as we understand it, spread abroad in the world.

The contributions to this work ought to be taken up in the fall, whenever it is possible to do it. The financial year ends in May. The work must be planned and largely carried out in the fall and winter. As it is now, the contributions are not taken up until the late winter and spring. The whole thing is exactly reversed, and it is very difficult to manage affairs for this reason. The board does not know how much it is to have to work with. As a consequence, it is obliged to depend upon estimates and to borrow money to carry on operations until the church contributions come in, and to pay interest on its loans. This is all wrong and unbusiness-like. The treasurer would appeal to the churches, as strongly as he can, to change this practice, and make their contributions at the beginning of the year, and not at the end. Suppose it does bring two contributions close together. We ought to have a good extra contribution, anyway; or, what is better, we ought to have quarterly contributions instead of annual, or, what is still better, monthly contributions. Our giving ought not to be spasmodic. Our work ought not to depend upon a chance condition of mind, once a year, of all our givers. We ought to conduct our missionary work as we do our other important business. We ought not to squeeze out a mere pittance for such a cause. Nearly every man, woman, and child in our churches could give the church something every month, if they had a chance. Is it not pitiful that we so persistently attempt to hide behind such transparent pretenses to protect ourselves from the trifling sacrifices this great cause calls for?

Unitarians give liberally to everything else in the world, except the Unitarian church missionary work. Isn't it about time to take care of our own work? It would seem so. It is difficult for any one living at the centre of our denominational activities, and seeing the demand and supply from day to day, to speak moderately and patiently about this matter. Please, brethren, do not waste any more time in talking about machinery, organization, or about "ways and means." Never mind the ways now: our ways are good enough. It is "means" we want, and in time for use this year; and, when we are "caught up," and have a little surplus for the future, then let us see if we can improve our ways.

The treasurer will have to be excused from discussing any other subject this week. There is no other subject worth talking about in the department which he has in charge. He feels as he can imagine the chief engineer of the city's water-works would feel if he saw the water upon which the citizens depended for their life and health going out of his reservoirs just a little faster than it was coming in. He turns to the supply first, and does all he can to increase that. If he cannot do that, then the directors will be compelled to partially shut off the gates and reduce the outflow.

There is no doubt about it: our churches have never yet done half they ought to do and could do if they only wake up and "look out." These notes will close with this question, which is earnestly referred to every Unitarian whose eyes come in contact with it, How many Unitarians are there in the United States who have really and truly made any sacrifice in giving to the missionary cause of the Church?

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer.

CONFERENCE NOTES.

One of the attractive features of the programme at the forthcoming meeting of the National Conference in Washington will be Mr. John Fiske's paper on "The Origins of Liberal Thought in America." Mr. Fiske, in consenting last spring to write this paper, said that he was deeply interested in the subject, and that the working it up would be a pleasant summer occupation. That he will treat the evolution of liberal thought as an intellectual and moral movement making for a more rational religious faith will be accepted as a matter of course by all who know him as a thinker and writer possessing the clearest historical insight and the profoundest knowledge of all the factors with which his subject is concerned.

The Tuesday evening session of the Conference is to be devoted to "Our Young People: Their Relations to Church, Denomination, and Life at Large." One of the five persons who are to speak on different aspects of the subject will be the president of Clark University, Prof. G. Stanley Hall. That so distinguished an educator has taken for his subject "Pedagogical Methods in Sunday-school Work" is a sign of the growing appreciation of the need of introducing into our Sunday-school work the improved methods of study which have been developed and applied so successfully in all our well-conducted day schools.

The fear has been expressed that the New England delegation to the Conference will be smaller than in the past because the trip to Washington costs a little more than that to Saratoga. The round-trip rate between Boston and Saratoga last year was $7. The round-trip rate between Boston and Washington will be, on the certificate plan of one-third reduction, or without certificate by purchasing tickets of Raymond & Whitcomb, via boat and rail, $12.67, or all rail route $16.33. It is true that this is a little more than the cost of the Saratoga trip; but New Englanders should remember that, at the reduction they are given an opportunity to visit Washington, one of the most beautiful capitals in the world, and to spend several days among its various and splendid attractions, historic and artistic, under exceptional advantages as to reduced hotel rates and special privileges of various kinds. The additional cost of travel is but a trifle when compared with the vastly greater enjoyment of the feast of sight-seeing which this trip will afford.

For those who prefer the accommodations of a private house during their attendance upon the Conference in Washington, the following addresses of excellent boarding-houses are given: Mrs. Pond, 910 Fifteenth Street, N.W., rates $1.50 to $2 per day; Miss Owings, 1514 K Street, N.W., rates $1.50 to $2 per day; Mrs. Julia F. Smith, 1447 Massachusetts Avenue, rates $1.50 to $2 per day; Mrs. Mary Marsh, 1015 Connecticut Avenue, rate $2 per day; "The Elsmere," a select family hotel, H Street, between Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets, rate $2.50 per day; Mrs. E. P. Keech, 1817 Thirteenth Street, N.W., rates $2 per day. "Crosby House," Third Street, near C., rates $1.50 to $2 per day; "Westminster," corner Q and Seventeenth Streets, Mrs. Redmond, rates $1.50 to $2 per day; Miss Van Dyke, 1301 K Street, corner Thirteenth Street, rates $1.50 to $2 per day; Mrs. Calley, Fourteenth and H Streets, rates $1.50 to $2 per day; Mrs. Morrison, 1414 H Street, rates $1.50 to $2 per day; Miss Somerville, 1531 I Street, rates $1.50 to $2 per day; Mrs. Birmingham, 206 New Jersey Avenue, S.E., rates $1.50 to $2 per day; Mrs. Ella Brayley, 1012 H Street, rates $1.50 to $2 per day; Miss Smith, 1120 Sixteenth Street, rates $1.50 to $2 per day; Miss Kate B. Wright, 129 E Street, N.W., rates $1.50 to $2 per day; Miss Alice Owens, 1615 K Street, rates $1.50 to $2 per day. Metzgerott's Music Hall, where the Conference will be held, can be reached easily from any of the above-named places by street-car lines.

A "Conference Programme" is just issued from the press of Geo. H. Ellis, 141 Franklin St., Boston. It is for free distribution, and can be procured by writing to the general secretary, Rev. D. W. Morehouse, 104 East Twentieth Street, New York, or at the American Unitarian Association Building, 25 Beacon Street, Boston. The "Programme" has been gotten up very attractively in pamphlet form. It contains the programme of the Conference, together with lists of officers of the various general Unitarian organizations, and much information regarding the American Unitarian Association and its organization for missionary work. Portraits of the general officers of the Conference and of some of the principal speakers who are to address the Conference are scattered through the bulletin, which will be in every way a delightful souvenir of the occasion, as well as a valuable guide to all who go to Washington October 21 to 24.

THE MOZOOMDAR MISSION.

We have received from Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar a report of his work in India from January to June, from which we make the abstract that follows. We trust that contributions to the Mozoomdar Mission Fund, one of the most valuable forms of foreign missionary work, will come in with promptness and generosity. They may be sent to the treasurer, Mrs. William Howell Reed, 37 Commonwealth Avenue, Boston, Mass.

The first week in January is devoted to meetings and celebrations in memory of Keshub Chunder Sen, who departed this life on the 8th of January, 1884. A devotional meeting was held at the family residence of Keshub in the morning; and in the evening addresses were delivered on the aims and character of our great leader, hundreds of young men from the colleges of Calcutta being present. His personal example is the rallying point around which some of the most divergent parties and personalities of the Brahmo-Somaj gather in the midst of their controversies, and his ideals must remain the great object of attainment in the society.

Our own church was established in January, 1830; and we celebrated this year our sixty-fifth anniversary. It is our high festival. There are morning and evening services, public meetings for lecture and discussion, together with outdoor expeditions and feasts. Large numbers of ladies, also, from Brahmo and orthodox Hindu families gather at Peace Cottage for prayers and for a common feast, amid much cordiality and rejoicing. In all these festivals flowers are in great demand, and our places of worship interwoven and garlanded with brilliant blossoms. The proceedings are generally in the vernacular; but there was one English meeting in the town hall of Calcutta which was attended by fifteen hundred people, among whom was the governor of Bengal, Sir Charles Elliott, who has been most friendly to us. There were also other English officials and a sprinkling of European missionaries, the subject of my discourse being "The Relations of the Brahmo-Somaj to Other Religions," which has since been printed in the Interpreter. This festival is a season of hard work, but also of spiritual refreshing. I came from it tired, yet refreshed, weakened, though strong, successful, satisfied, and thankful.

There are three sections in the Brahmo-Somaj. In two of these good feeling has not prevailed. On my return from America a Brahmo-Somaj Union was formed. In this various Brahmo leaders have joined; and the influence of the venerable Devendra Nath Tagore has been strongly felt. This effort at Union has been generally a success, and everything is being done to promote brotherly feeling. I have great faith in the continuance of such efforts.

On the 15th of February I left for Monghyr, which was in Mohammedan times the military capital of Behar and Upper Hindustan; and more than once the sovereignty of Eastern India has been gained or lost around the fortifications and riversides of Monghyr. Twenty-seven years ago this city was the scene of a great revival of the Brahmo-Somaj, and it made an important epoch in the life of Keshub Chunder Sen. It is a beautiful place, with the boundary of the broad Ganges on one side and a low range of dreamy green hills on the other. It has the remnant of the old fort enclosing it, with verdant meadows and picturesque bungalows inside them. Six miles from Monghyr is the great railway town of Jamalpur; and fifty miles to the east is Bhagalpur, which has a large and influential population. Preaching services were held in all these places, and in March the journey was continued into East Bengal. Lectures and addresses were given to large congregations of the Somaj, and, after a week of profitable work there, returned to Calcutta. Early in April I started on an extended tour in Northern India, reaching Lahore at the end of the month. I organized there a Brahmo-Somaj Mission. Its object is to attract the young men of the Punjab. With that object a boarding-house and reading-room has been opened, and a college is in contemplation next year.

In the second week of May, when the plains were too hot for my health, I left for the Himalayas, where I have been in the hermitage of the Brahmo-Somaj. The everlasting snows are overhead, in front of me, the deep, dark forests are around, and enshrined in my heart the adorable spirit of God, to meditate upon whose glory is the privilege and joy of my existence. May this blessing abide with you and all my dear friends in America!

Art is indeed beginning to find out that it must make friends with need or it must perish. It perceives that to take itself from the many and leave them no joy in their work, and give itself to the few to whom it can bring no joy in their idleness, is an error that kills.—W. D. Howells.

The Sunday School.

The third Channing Hall "Talk" will take place next Saturday, September 28, at 2.30 P.M., 25 Beacon Street, conducted by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. The subject will be Lesson III., "The House on the Rock." As we have notified all interested before, Mr. Pulsford addresses the three grades, the Primary being merged in the others. The subjects are of interest to people at large, and ought to attract a great many besides the regular Sunday-school workers. The suggestiveness of the parables is a constant source of applicable lessons for every-day life. All cordially welcome.

"A Catechism of Liberal Faith," by Rev. Charles F. Dole, is nearly ready for sale. It will be a volume of 112 pages, containing thirty-six lessons, each one bearing upon an important matter of liberal belief. Such a book as this ought to be a great source of suggestion to Advanced classes. We can easily conceive of its forming the basis of one of the most satisfactory courses of study ever introduced into Sunday-school work. This catechism and Rev. Minot J. Savage's "Unitarian Catechism" are manual ploughs that go down into the subsoil of belief, where the springs of action are. The price of Mr. Dole's manual, bound in cloth, will be 35 cents a single copy, or $3.50 a dozen.

There is every evidence that there will be a large attendance at the annual meeting of the Unitarian Sunday School Society, to be held in Providence, R.I., Wednesday evening, October 16, and Thursday, October 17. The five liberal churches of Providence invite not only delegates and life members to the hospitality of Wednesday night, but all others who are interested in Sunday-school work and wish to attend. There will be a platform meeting on Wednesday night at the Westminster Church, with three speakers; and the sessions of Thursday will be held in the First Congregational Church, with a very tempting programme. Full details will be given in next week's Register, and notices will be mailed to the churches in a few days.

NOMINATING COMMITTEE.

The Nominating Committee for the Unitarian Sunday School Society will report the following names to be voted upon at the annual meeting, October 17:—

President, Rev. Edward A. Horton, Boston, Mass.; Vice-Presidents, Rev. Richmond Fisk, D.D., East Boston, Mass., Robert C. Metcalf, Boston, Mass.; Clerk, Edwin J. Lewis, Jr., Boston (Dorchester), Mass.; Treasurer, Richard C. Humphreys, Boston (Dorchester), Mass.

Directors for three years.—Rev. William H. Fish, Jr., Dedham, Mass.; Frank A. Page, Wollaston, Mass.; Mrs. Clara Beatley, Boston (Dorchester), Mass.; Rev. Charles E. St. John, Pittsburg, Pa.; Rev. Allen G. Jennings, Toledo, Ohio.

The general officers nominated are the same as last year; but, as by a provision in the By-laws the retiring directors are not eligible for re-election until a year after the expiration of their term of office, the above nominations for directors are all new names. In addition are the following directors, who hold over from previous elections, and who therefore will not be balloted for this year.

Term expires in 1896.—Mrs. Samuel A. Eliot, Brooklyn, N.Y.; Mr. Edwin T. Horne, Boston (Dorchester), Mass.; Mr. Charles A. Murdock, San Francisco, Cal.; Mrs. Mary C. Eddy, Boston (Dorchester), Mass.; Rev. George D. Latimer, Salem, Mass.

Term expires in 1897.—Mrs. Frances E. Colburn, Hopedale, Mass.; Mr. Arthur L. Jones, Charleston, S.C.; Rev. Merle St. C.

Wright, New York, N.Y.; Mr. Roland W. Boyden, Beverly, Mass.; Mr. Frank A. Drew, Boston (Roxbury), Mass.

Horace S. Sears, Rev. George H. Young, Rev. Frederic Gill, Mrs. J. C. Jaynes, Miss Mary L. Hall, Nominating Committee.

Religious Intelligence.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be sent in by Saturday Morning: announcements of meetings which are to take place must be sent in before Tuesday Noon.]

THE first meeting for the season of 1895-96 of the South Middlesex Branches of the Women's Alliance will be held at the Unitarian Building on Thursday, October 3, at twelve o'clock.

THE Worcester Association of Ministers will meet with Rev. L. G. Wilson, Hopedale, Mass., Tuesday, October 8, at 10 A.M. Essay by Rev. W. J. Leonard of Bolton. Subject, "A Study of the State of Religion in Rural New England." Sermon by Rev. G. M. Bartol, D.D., of Lancaster. G. F. Pratt, Scribe.

PARISHES proposing to adopt a new hymn and tune book will be glad to learn that "Hymns for the Church and Home, with Tunes," edited by Mrs. Mary W. Tileston and Mr. Arthur Foote, will be published early next month. The American Unitarian Association will be the publisher, and its advertisement found in next week's Register.

BOSTON.—New South Church: A reception is to be given to Rev. L. B. Macdonald, who has just resigned to accept the call to Concord, Mass. It will be given by the Women's Alliance of the New South Church, and will be held Friday evening, September 27, from eight to ten o'clock.

West Roxbury: The ordination and installation of Alfred Rodman Hussey as minister of the First Parish will take place in the church on Wednesday evening, October 2, at 7.40 P.M. The public is cordially invited to attend. The church is situated close by Highland Station, on the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, of which a train leaves Park Square Station at 7.05 P.M.

Church of the Unity: Rev. M. J. Savage occupied his pulpit last Sunday morning, and announced in the course of the sermon that he had decided not to accept the call from Washington. The subject for the day was, "Some Things we can do for the Church, and Some Things the Church can do for us"; and Mr. Savage concluded his sermon by a review of the twenty-one years during which he has been pastor of the Church of the Unity.

Arlington Street Church will be reopened on Sunday morning. The vesper services will be resumed on the 13th of October; and on Sunday, the 20th, services will be conducted morning and afternoon by Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D. A reception under the auspices of the Herford Club will be given to Dr. Herford on the 17th, from 4 o'clock to 8 P.M., at the residence of Rev. John Cuckson, 288 Commonwealth Avenue, to which all the members of his old parish will be cordially invited.

Boston Common: One of the largest gatherings in the entire series met at "The Unitarian Tree" last Sunday, at five o'clock, to welcome the announced speakers. The interest seemed as deep as ever; and, when it was announced that the meetings would probably be continued another season, applause followed. Mr. Horton spoke first concerning the general results of the course, and made a few remarks upon the views which had been set forth in these meetings. Rev. Augustus M. Lord of Providence followed in a concise address as to the "staying power" or hold-on quality in character. He was followed by Rev. Ida C. Hultin of Moline, Ill., who eloquently refuted criticisms which are often made on Unitarianism as not having sufficient motive power in it. The day was one of the hottest, as all know; but the assembly held together until six o'clock, when it was somewhat dark.

CONCORD, MASS.—The installation of Rev. L. B. Macdonald as pastor of the First Parish will take place Thursday evening, October 3, at seven o'clock, in the church. Trains leave for Boston at 9.12 P.M. The order of service is as follows: voluntary; anthem; invocation, Rev. Alfred P. Putnam, D.D., of Concord; selections from the Scriptures, Rev. Carleton A. Staples of Lexington; sermon, Rev. Samuel M. Crothers of Cambridge; prayer of installation, Rev. Charles C. Everett, D.D., of Cambridge; right hand of fellowship, Rev. Francis B. Hornbrooke of Newton; charge to the pastor, Rev. Edward A. Horton of Boston; address to the people, Rev. Thomas Van Ness of Boston; benediction by the pastor. Delegates to the installation will be provided with supper at six o'clock in the vestry of the church; and all intending to avail themselves of this invitation will kindly advise Mr. Edwin S. Barrett, chairman of the standing committee.

TACOMA, WASH.—The First Free Church of Tacoma resumed services September 15, when Mr. Martin spoke on "The Value of Life." The following topics are announced: September 22, "What is Universal Religion?" September 29, "Universal Religion and Special Religions." The first two Sunday sermons in October will be devoted to a consideration of the late Prof. Huxley and his creed. The winter bulletins will announce details of a special course of sermons on "The Idea of God," and a special course of Sunday evening lectures on six great leaders of liberal thought, —Channing, Parker, Emerson, Potter, Frothingham, and Abbot. A special course of study upon "The Life and Times of Jesus" has been arranged for the Sunday-school.

WEST NEWTON, MASS.—The pulpit in the Unitarian church was occupied last Sunday by Rev. George Batchelor. Next Sunday Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., will preach. A train leaves Boston at 10 A.M., and a returning train leaves West Newton station at 12.17. It is expected that Rev. J. C. Jaynes, fresh from his European tour, will be in his accustomed place on Sunday, October 6.

GUILDS.—The National Guild Alliance some time since appointed a committee, consisting of Rev. George W. Cooke, Miss Kate L. Brown, Mrs. Laura B. Martine, and Rev. B. R. Bulkeley, to prepare a service book for the use of young people's devotional meetings. That book has now been prepared, and is ready for publication. It contains twelve opening services, seven closing services, about fifty tunes, and about eighty-five hymns. The aim has been to make a book well adapted to the needs of guilds and similar societies, though it can be quite as successfully used in Sunday-schools or churches. Those who have examined it think the book a thoroughly good one. In order to secure the publication of the book, it is necessary to guarantee a sufficient sale to meet expenses. Those wishing to use it are therefore asked to say what number of copies they will take. It is proposed to get the book out about November 15; but, in order to do this, subscriptions must be received by October 1, or soon after. The price will be fifty cents per copy in cloth, or forty cents in paper, in any quantity desired. The committee wish to urge upon those interested the importance of immediate action in reference to the book. They feel that it will be a positive help to the guilds, and that the effort to secure its publication should be heartily seconded in a practical way. It will give to the young people's movement a more definite purpose, and arouse a new interest in it all along the line. Orders should be sent to George W. Cooke, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

NORFOLK CONFERENCE.—At a meeting of the directors of the Norfolk Conference held in Boston, Monday, September 16, it was finally decided, after much discussion, not to hold the autumnal session of the conference, which usually occurs about the second or third week in October, on account of the National Conference at Washington assembling about the same time, as well as the annual gathering of the Sunday School Society taking place very near that date. The annual meeting of the Norfolk Conference will therefore be combined with the winter meeting, to be held in February according to the customary arrangement. E. Q. S. Osgood, Secretary.

THE Essex Unitarian Conference will hold its annual meeting at Marblehead, Thursday, October 3. The devotional meeting at 9.30 A.M. will be in charge of Rev. S. C. Beane, D.D. At ten o'clock will be held the business session of the conference; at 11 A.M., address by Rev. E. A. Horton, on "The Relation of Young People to the Religious Life of our Churches," to be fol-

WOULD YOU HAVE THE HANDSOMEST

GLOVES?

THEN WEAR ONLY THE

GENUINE DUCHESS,

Which come in all the popular styles, dressed and undressed Kid, button and Foster lace, long and short wrists,

And cost no more than other makes.

CALL AND INSPECT, OR SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

All Gloves fitted when desired, and every pair warranted.

CHANDLER & CO.,

SOLE AGENTS,

WINTER ST., BOSTON.

Agency Dr Jaeger Sanitary Woollen System.

lowed by discussion. Lunch at 1 p.m. At 2 p.m. Mr. George W. Stone will speak upon "The Saratoga Conference, and its Influence upon our Future Work," to be followed by discussion. Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., is expected to be present and to take part in the conference. Alfred Manchester, Secretary.

CHANNING CONFERENCE.—The sixtieth session will be held in the Unitarian Congregational church, Norton, Mass., October 8 and 9. The programme is as follows: Tuesday evening, October 8, at eight o'clock, religious services, with sermon by Rev. Edward A. Horton of Boston. Wednesday, October 9, 9.30 A.M., devotional meeting, conducted by Rev. Herbert L. Buzzell of Fairhaven, Mass.; 10.15 A.M., preliminary business, after which discussion of the question, "How to enlist our Young People in Church Work?" 1 p.m., collation; 2 p.m., discussion of the same subject continued. The following speakers have engaged to take part: Rev. George W. Cutter of Newport, Rev. William F. Furman of Providence, Rev. John P. Forbes of Taunton, Mass., Rev. Anna Garlin Spencer of Providence, R.I. After the regular speakers, the subject will be open for volunteers.

REV. GEORGE W. COOKE is prepared to address guilds or to help in their organization. He has just prepared and sent out the following circular: "As the agent of the National Guild Alliance, I wish, during the coming winter, to visit as many of the guilds as possible, to find out their ways and methods, and to speak to them on the general guild work. Those who can arrange for such a visit are invited to call upon me or to write me. I may be found in the Unitarian Building (Room 11), Boston, Mondays, from 9 to 12 A.M. and from 2 to 5 p.m. My object in visiting the guilds and other young people's societies is that I may ascertain if it is possible to bring about an effective general organization like that of the Young People's Christian Endeavor Society or the Young People's Christian Union. I have something definite to suggest as to how to secure such a result, and I wish to know what the young people think about it and what they are willing to do."

CONFERENCE OF THE IOWA ASSOCIATION.—The seventeenth annual conference of the Iowa Association of Unitarian and Other Independent Churches will be held at Anamosa, October 15, 16, and 17. Rev. Charles E. Perkins of Iowa City will preach the conference sermon. At the ministers' meeting Rev. Elinor Gordon of Sioux City will read a paper on "The New Pulpit." Wednesday and Thursday mornings will be chiefly given up to business. At the Sunday-school meeting Rev. A. W. Gould of Chicago and Rev. Arthur M. Judy of Davenport will lead the discussion on "Sunday-school Literature and Teachers' Meetings"; and on Wednesday evening three aspects of liberal religion will be taken up, as follows: "What the Bible means to Unitarians," Rev. T. B. Forbush, Chicago; "Our Thought of Man," Rev. A. W. Gould, Chicago; "Our Faith in God," Rev. J. H. Palmer, Cedar Rapids. The closing sermon will be by the president, Rev. Mary A. Safford of Sioux City.

CONNECTICUT VALLEY CONFERENCE.—The annual meeting of the Connecticut Valley Conference of Unitarian-Congregational and Other Christian Churches will be held in All Souls' Church, Greenfield, Mass., on Wednesday and Thursday, October 2 and 3. On Wednesday evening, at 7.30 o'clock, the sermon to the conference will be preached by Rev. Samuel McChord Crothers of Cambridge, Mass. On Thursday morning the conference will assemble at 10.15 o'clock. Committees will be appointed, and preliminary business of the session transacted. At 10.30 there will be a discussion of the theme, "How to reach the Young People." This will be conducted by Rev. Arthur Anderson Brooks of Greenfield, assisted by Rev. Bradley Gilman of Springfield, Rev. Frederic Allen Hinckley of Northampton, Rev. S. R. Free of Willimantic, Conn., Rev. George W. Piper of Northfield, and Rev. Herman Hagerud of Rowe. Addresses limited to seven minutes each. At 11.15 Rev. George Batchelor, secretary of the American Unitarian Association, will deliver an address on "The National Outlook of the Unitarian Church." This will be followed by a general discussion, limited to five minutes for each speaker. At 2 o'clock p.m. a paper will be presented by Rev. Francis Bickford Hornbrooke of Newton. Subject, "Reward and Punishment." This, also, will be followed by a general discussion, at the close of which the election of officers and other business will be taken up.

THE British and Foreign Unitarian Association has arranged with Rev. J. T. Sunderland, M.A., of Ann Arbor, Mich., U.S.A., formerly editor of the Unitarian, who has been spending the last two or three months in England, to go on a special mission on behalf of the Association to India, for the purpose of studying the religious condition of that country, with the special view of ascertaining what openings there may be for Unitarian thought, and to promote closer and more fraternal relations between the Unitarian body and the Brahmo-Somaj. Mr. Sunderland will start on his mission early in November, and will remain about four months, visiting Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, the Unitarian mission stations in the Khasi Hills, Delhi, Agra, Banda, Lahore, and most of the larger cities of India. Mr. Sunderland will be glad to meet, or otherwise put himself into communication with, Unitarians or inquirers regarding Unitarianism, leaders and members of all branches of the Brahmo-Somaj, and with representatives of other forms of progressive religious thought. Communications may be addressed to him at Bombay, care of Thomas Cook & Son, 13 Rampart Row, up to December, 1 or during December and January at Calcutta, care of Thomas Cook & Son, 11 Old Court House Street, or to the editor of the Interpreter or the Indian Messenger.

LIST OF DELEGATES.

Reported as appointed to the Sixteenth Meeting of the National Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches, to be held at Washington, D.C., Oct. 21-24, 1895.

MASSACHUSETTS.

ASHBY—First Parish: Rev. George S. Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Sheldon.
ATHOL—First Congregational Church: Rev. S. W. Sutton, Mr. and Mrs. Leander B. Morse.
Second Unitarian Society: Rev. Carl G. Horst, Mr. and Mrs. Lucien Lord.
BARNSTABLE—Congregational Church and Society: Rev. John A. Bevington, Miss Desire E. Hinckley, Miss Abbie L. Hinckley.
BEACHMONT—Church of the Unity: Rev. Eber R. Butler, Horace Tobey, Mrs. C. J. Shaw.
BEDFORD—First Parish: Rev. O. J. Fairchild, Mrs. Carrie L. Bacon, Mrs. George R. Blinn.
BOSTON—Church of the Unity: Rev. Minot J. Savage, Henry F. Miller, James N. North. Alternates: Alfred Ewer, Frank B. Thayer.
(Dorchester) Society of Christ Church: Rev. B. A. Goodridge, Josiah H. Carter, Mrs. Frank B. Lathrop.
(East Boston)—The Church of our Father: Rev. Richmond Fiske, D.D., Henry Peterson, Arthur D. Rogers.
BRIDGEWATER, EAST—First Parish: Rev. John W. Quinby, Mrs. Susan M. Keith, Charles F. Mann.
BRIDGEWATER, WEST—First Congregational Society: Rev. E. B. Maglathlin, Francis E. Howard, Mary P. Whitman.
CANTON—First Congregational Parish: Rev. Henry F. Jenks, Charles H. French, William O. Chapman.
CHELMSFORD—First Congregational Society: Rev. Granville Pierce, Mrs. Lucy Fletcher, Mrs. F. A. Adams.
CONCORD—First Parish: Mr. Harvey Wheeler, Miss Angelina Ball. Alternates: Prescott Keyes, Mrs. William Wheeler.
DEDHAM—Third Parish: Rev. Obed Eldridge, Mrs. Reuben Colburn, Miss Elizabeth Fisher. Alternates: Mrs. William Colburn, Miss Anna Colburn.
DOVER—First Parish: Rev. Obed Eldridge, Mrs. Sarah Smith, Frank Smith. Alternates: George D. Burrage, Mrs. Mary Smith.
HINGHAM—First Parish: Rev. John W. Day, Ebed L. Ripley, Wilmon W. Blackmar.
HUDSON—First Unitarian Society: Rev. John Mills Wilson, James L. Harriman, Edmund M. Stowe.
LITTLETON—First Congregational Society: Rev. Isaac F. Porter, Mrs. Mary J. Priest, D. G. Houghton.
NEEDHAM—First Congregational Society: Rev. Philip S. Thacher, Mrs. Caroline G. Mills, George K. Clarke.
NORTHBORO—First Congregational Church and Society: Miss Ella Searle, Mrs. L. F. Stratton.
REVERE—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Eber R. Butler, John Y. Pratt, Mrs. C. M. Butler.
ROCKLAND—The Unitarian Society: Rev. Frederick O. MacCartney, Charles A. Townsend, Miss Angela W. Collins.
STOW—First Parish: Rev. J. S. Moulton, Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Stevens.
STURBRIDGE—Unitarian Congregational Society: E. L. Bates, Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Nichols.
TEMPLETON—First Parish: Rev. J. M. W. Pratt, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Lord.
TURNER'S FALLS—Unitarian Society: Rev. and Mrs. Alfred Free, Mrs. Daniel P. Abercrombie.
TYNGBORO—First Parish: Rev. William Brown, Miss Mary E. Bennett, Miss Ellen F. Perham.
WALTHAM—First Parish: Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford, Mrs. John E. Soper, Miss Mabel B. Soper.
WEST TOWNSEND—Liberal Christian Society: Rev. George S. Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. Morton Barrett.
WINCHENDON—Church of the Unity: Rev. A. J. Culp, D. H. Barnes, J. N. Richardson.
WORCESTER—Church of the Unity: Rev. Calvin Stebbins, Hon. George F. Hoar, Cyrus G. Wood.

COLORADO.

GREELEY—First Unitarian Society: Rev. C. Howard Wilson, Oscar B. Hawes.

CONNECTICUT.

HARTFORD—First Unitarian Congregational Society: Rev. Joseph Waite, William Francis, Horace Cornwall.

DELAWARE.

WILMINGTON—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Alexander T. Bowser, Mrs. Frances L. Garrett, Miss Helen L. Garrett. Alternates: Daniel W. Taylor, C. Cameron.

KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE—Church of the Messiah: Rev. Charles J. K. Jones, Mrs. William H. Smith, Mrs. Caroline Thompson. Alternates: A. G. Munn, F. N. Hartwell.

MAINE.

EASTPORT—First Congregational Society: Rev. Hasket D. Catlin, Mrs. S. B. Hume, Miss A. A. Milliken.

MONTANA.

HELENA—First Unitarian Society: Rev. J. H. Crooker, Hon. Henry M. Blake, A. D. Edger.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

ANDOVER—Congregational Unitarian Society: Rev. Lyman Clark, Walter S. Carr, Mrs. Maria Carr.
LEBANON—First Congregational Unitarian Society: Rev. Charles C. Vinal, C. D. Smith, Mrs. J. E. Lincoln.
MILFORD—First Unitarian Society: Rev. A. Judson Rich, Mrs. William Richardson, Miss E. A. Livermore.
NASHUA—First Congregational Society: Rev. E. Powell, Miss Henrietta Prescott, Miss Kate Thayer.
WILTON—Liberal Christian Church: Rev. John C. Mitchell, Dr. and Mrs. Frank M. Pevey.
WILTON CENTRE—First Congregational Church and Society: Rev. John G. Mitchell, Mr. and Mrs. Dwight Abbott.

NEW JERSEY.

PLAINFIELD—First Unitarian Society: Rev. Hobart Clark, Mrs. W. F. Adams, Miss Bessie Reynolds.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PITTSBURG—First Unitarian Church: Rev. Charles E. St. John, R. Q. Whitten, Mrs. Henry Holdship. Alternates: George Faunce, Miss Mary P. Semple.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

CHARLESTON—The Unitarian Church: Rev. Henry A. Whitman, Alva Gage, Miss Caroline H. Marsh.

VERMONT.

BRATTLEBORO—Unitarian Congregational Society: Rev. E. Bradford Leavitt, Hon. Dorman B. Eaton, Mrs. Mary E. Warder.

ASSOCIATIONS.

CONNECTICUT VALLEY CONFERENCE: Rev. F. A. Hinckley, Rev. C. F. Abbott, H. C. Parsons.
HANCOCK CONFERENCE (MAINE): Mr. and Mrs. David B. Flint, Mrs. F. G. Peabody.
LADIES' CHARITABLE SOCIETY OF FITZWILLIAM, N.H.: Miss Alice Ayers, Mrs. Julia Perry, Calvin B. Perry.
NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE ALLIANCE: Mrs. H. D. Catlin, Miss Phoebe M. Waldo, Mrs. J. M. Tyler.
NORFOLK CONFERENCE: E. A. Cushing, Mrs. G. F. Fisher, Mrs. Samuel Phipps.
UNITARIAN MINISTERS' MONDAY CLUB: Rev. Alfred E. Mullett.
UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION OF BOSTON: Frank B. Thayer, Mrs. C. R. Elliot, Hon. Charles H. Porter.
WORCESTER CONFERENCE: Charles H. Blood, John C. Osis, Mrs. W. S. Heywood.

Business Notices.

The low prices that are being made on carpets and rugs by Joel Goldthwait & Co., 169 Washington Street, are astonishing. No one need go without nowadays.

We all want the best; and, when we can secure all the patented improvements of the Miller at the price of the ordinary Centre-draft Lamp, there is no question as to which we will buy.

If you want the BEST for cooking and heating you must be sure to examine the products of the "MAGEE" Furnace Company before deciding on the new Range or Heater. The new "Magee Grand" is provided with their patent Oven Thermometer, said by expert cooks to be the greatest improvement of the age; while the famous "Boston Heater" is winning its way into public favor with every succeeding year. They are honestly, carefully, and intelligently made for USE,—not merely to sell.

The crockery stores were never more interesting in the display of novelties than this season. The new shapes and reproductions of old shapes with the dainty decorations are interesting to connoisseurs in ceramics. The reduced cost, by reason of what Edward Atkinson terms the progressive reduction going on in all industries, is demonstrated in pottery-making, steam power having displaced hands, fuel-saving kilns, the new methods of decorations, together with the reduction in tariff tax, having brought really fine china to the cost of the white ware of a few years ago.

An Interesting Exhibition.—Interesting news is that which is contained in another column in regard to the famous London Club sofa, which has just been placed on exhibition at the Paine warerooms on Canal Street. Imagine a superb upholstered sofa, eight feet in length, on which two persons may recline (at opposite ends), without interfering with each other. How many Bostonians realize the advantages which this city enjoys in having the largest retail furniture store in the world? Where is there such another piece of furniture as this in the ready-made stock of any store in any other American city? Yet this is only one of the scores of famous and interesting creations which these warerooms contain.

The Atlanta Exposition.—The Atlanta Exposition has opened very brilliantly, and is now in full running order. It is sure to attract a large attendance from all sections of the country. Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb, with their accustomed enterprise, have arranged for a series of attractive tours to Atlanta, extending through the autumn and into December. The dates of leaving Boston in October are the 2d, 8th, 14th, 16th, 22d, 28th, 30th; and in November, the 5th, 11th, 13th, 19th, 25th, and 27th. There is a choice of routes, and not less than six days—in most cases a full week—will be passed in Atlanta, with headquarters at the well-known Kimball House, of which Warren Leland, Jr., is manager. These trips will be similar in style to the famous World's Fair tours so successfully carried out by the firm two years ago. A circular giving all needed details may be obtained by addressing Raymond & Whitcomb, 296 Washington Street (opposite School Street), Boston.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

In Dorchester, 17th inst., by Rev. Geo. M. Bodge, of Leominster, Jay Jordan, of East Boston, and Daisy Pelce, of Dorchester.

In Worcester, August 31, by Rev. Calvin Stebbins, Wm. H. Earle and L. Addie Greenwood, daughter of the late Aaron Greenwood, of Hubbardston.

Deaths.

In London, Eng., 1st inst., Aaron B. Champion, of Cincinnati, Ohio.

Mr. Champion was a prominent member of the Cincinnati bar. He was educated at Antioch College during the presidency of Horace Mann, and has always been a staunch supporter of the Unitarian church, serving long on its board of trustees, and also as superintendent of the Sunday-school, until he resigned on account of what he felt the more pressing claims of the House of Refuge, a reformatory and shelter for neglected or criminally disposed children. Of this institution he had long been a director, and was now president; and his interest in it was unflagging, he still faithfully filling all its claims when falling health would have made it impossible to attend to his private business but for an iron will that drove the machinery relentlessly on when life was almost spent. He was a director of the Ohio Mechanics' Institute, and active in other public benevolent work, with always the helping hand ready for a friend in trouble. Leaving home in pursuit of renewed health too late, a few weeks brought the end in a foreign land, with only the devoted wife out of his tenderly loved family by his side.

In Dublin, N.H., 8th inst., Elizabeth J. Faulkner, aged 73 years.

Her death was without warning. While her eye was not dim nor her natural force abated, she was called to the house of many mansions and the rest that follows a life well spent. We cannot think of her as being unprepared. The house of her personal life was always set in order. When we consider the purity of her ideals, her faithfulness, and the prevailing spirit of her life, we can well believe that, whenever the summons might have come, she was ready.

Miss Faulkner was a life-long resident of Keene, N.H., and was fortunate in the community, the home, and friends, where she passed her days. Her life was singularly happy. Though touched at times by sorrow, yet the sunshine of joy most thoroughly pervaded it. Her mind was broadened and enriched by travel, by reading, and by intercourse with many bright minds.

She was a most loyal friend of the Unitarian church in her native city, and generously assisted in building the new edifice. She was constant in attendance upon religious service, and faithful to every duty, however small, which grew out of her church relations. But she was also a friend of the denomination at large, believing that the individual church became strong as the wider cause prospered. The Unitarian Association therefore found her a generous giver of money, and seldom did a good cause appeal to her in vain. Her charities to individuals were countless. To the fine spirit and sentiment of charity taught by Christianity she added a sound common sense and an unfailing knowledge of when and how to give.

The keynote of her life, sounding through many beautiful strains, was faithfulness.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE

OF

Unitarian and Other Christian Churches

AT WASHINGTON, D.C.,

October 21, 22, 23, and 24.

Messrs. RAYMOND & WHITCOMB have arranged for the accommodation of delegates and others who may wish to attend the National Conference an Attractive Series of Excursions at Very Low Rates.

Parties will leave BOSTON Friday, October 18, and Monday, October 21, under special escort. A choice of routes by boat and rail.

Additional Excursions to

GETTYSBURG, OLD POINT COMFORT, Etc.

Send for special circular.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,

296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

Unitarian Excursion

—TO—

WASHINGTON, D.C.

A party will leave Boston on Friday, October 18, returning Friday, October 25, using Hotel Vendome on Penn. Ave.

Drive of three hours through residential part of the city and to Arlington Heights.

Trip to Mt. Vernon.

Guide at service of the party at all times.

J. HOWARD NASON, who accompanies this party, has been very successful in managing Washington Excursions, and is always at the service of the party.

Price of tickets $30.00, including all expenses.

For full information apply to

NASON & DURGIN, 228 Washington Street.

We refer by permission to Rev. GEORGE BATCHELOR, Chairman of the Council.

THE RALEIGH

Pennsylvania Avenue and Twelfth Street, N.W.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

Only two blocks from hall in which Unitarian Conference meetings are held.

The only strictly first-class hotel conducted solely upon the European plan, with its entire construction absolutely fire-proof.

No pains nor expense have been spared to make the sanitary conditions of the hotel as satisfactory as modern ideas and first-class work could make them.

Every room is heated by steam and lighted by electricity. The service and cuisine of the hotel will be maintained in accordance with the best traditions of the culinary art.

Rates for rooms are graded according to size and location.

T. J. TALTY, Manager.

The Ebbitt House

WASHINGTON, D.C.

Special rate for those attending meeting of the National Conference, $2.50 and $3.00 each per day up. Parlor and above parlor at equally low rates. This house is only two blocks from Metzger's Hall, where the Convention will be held.

H. C. BURCH, Manager.

JAMES KAY APPLEBEE

is open to engagements for PREACHING or LECTURING. Address: ALLSTON, MASS.

Rooms To Let.

Single or in suite, with bath. House occupied by owner. Apply at 36 RUTLAND SQUARE.

To Organists and Music Committees.

A large and valuable selection of choir music, made with care by a Boston organist, is now offered for sale. Church committees have an excellent opportunity to obtain, at a reasonable rate, an unusually good selection of modern and classical compositions. Address, MUSIC, Christian Register Office, 141 Franklin Street, Boston.

WANTED—A little boy or girl, delicate or otherwise, or an infant from birth, requiring a mother's care, to bring up in a Unitarian minister's family, the members of which are a thoroughly domesticated and musical household in full view of the Atlantic Ocean and beautiful scenery of the harbor, only four miles from Boston. Abundance of new milk and fresh laid eggs. References: Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D., and Rev. E. A. Horton, Boston. Address "X. Y. Z., Christian Register Office, Boston.

A FRENCH TEACHER, graduated from Paris, highly recommended by a Unitarian lady, desires a home in a family in return for some hours of tuition. Excellent references as a teacher of French. Address MLE. H. B., care Christian Register.

For the Christian Register.

“AS WE ARE KNOWN.”

BY EDWARD W. STONE.

“Seeing as we are seen.” The shadows gather
Too quickly round us in life's clouded day:
We look not up with childlike trust, but rather
We grope with downcast eyes along our way.

“Knowing as we are known.” Too soon we harden
Our simple hearts toward brother and toward friend,
Learn to suspect and doubt, and scorn to pardon,
And walk in lonely pride on to life's end.

Yet, sometimes, from our weary, fretful chiding
We lift our tearful eyes, the shadows flee,
We see God's hand our footsteps gently guiding,
And catch faint notes of heaven's harmony.

And sometimes, when we look at one another,
The veil is rent; the spirit's eyes behold
With clearer sight the soul of friend and brother,
And 'neath the dross we see the shining gold.

Sometimes! And then the glorious vision leaves us,
The clouds return that dimmed our path before,
The shadows deepen and our heart deceives us,
And so we grope and doubt forevermore.

No, not forever! For God's hand shall free us
Some day, and then before the great white throne
We shall see him as his own eye doth see us,
And we shall know at last “as we are known.”

The Pulpit.

“WHAT MUST I DO TO BE SAVED?”

BY REV. M. W. CHUNN, PH.D.

Certainly no man can ask a more important question than the one propounded by the jailer of Philippi, “What must I do to be saved?” In the legend, in the sixteenth chapter of the Acts, the jailer of Philippi, startled by the manifestation of some superhuman power, in fear and trembling asks Paul and Silas, “Sirs, what must I do to be saved?” I would not have any person in this audience emulate the example of the jailer of Philippi in giving way to fear and trembling. I would have every person in the audience banish fear, and calmly and thoughtfully give his attention to the vital question, “What must I do to be saved?”

It is evident that there is no possibility of our being saved from certain things which the world has been accustomed to regard as evils or losses. Physical death has been considered in all ages as one of the very greatest of evils. I could quote much from the standard authors of the world concerning the terrors of the great enemy,—death. These words of Claudio in “Measure for Measure” must suffice for this occasion:—

“Ay, but to die, and go we know not where;
To lie in cold obstruction, and to rot;
This sensible warm motion to become
A kneaded clod; and the delighted spirit
To bathe in fiery floods, or to reside
In thrilling regions of thick-ribbed ice;
To be imprisoned in the viewless winds
And blown with restless violence round about
The pendent world; or to be worse than worst
Of those that lawless and incertain thoughts
Imagine howling! 'Tis too horrible!
The weariest and most loathed worldly life
That age, ache, penury, and imprisonment
Can lay on nature is a paradise
To what we fear of death.”

A few centuries ago men were engaged in a serious search for the fountain of perpetual youth. It was believed that the waters of this magic fountain had power to remove the wrinkles of old age, and to kindle again the fires of strength and vigor within the failing body. Every school-boy is familiar with the story of the fruitless but romantic search of Ponce de Leon for the fountain of youth in this New World. Farther back in the history of the world men who had become renowned for virtue or valor were represented as escaping the pangs of death, and being translated in bodily form into the realm of the immortal gods.

Whether physical death is an evil or not, it enters as a factor into the great plan of nature. Death is natural, as natural as birth; and, consequently, we cannot be saved from death. The world has done wrong in regarding death wholly as an evil. Premature death may be an evil. It is difficult for us to extract any good from the fate of a brave, wise, and honest man who is cut down in the gala-day of his usefulness. It is difficult for us to see anything but evil in the death of the innocent, prattling babe. What advantage is there in being born, if death is to claim the individual before he has had an opportunity to taste the joys or the sorrows of life? What advantage is there in being born, if death is to claim the individual before he has had an opportunity to learn any lesson in the world's school of experience?

But I cannot regard death, when it comes to the man ripe in years, wholly as an evil. It is when the man full of years passes away that death seems most natural. The man has been fully prepared for the end. As the vigor of manhood has departed from his body, the love of the world has departed from his heart. Nature, which is sometimes kind as well as cruel, breathes upon him the spirit of peacefulness. He no longer shrinks from death as he would have done in manhood's prime. Childish superstitions regarding the terrors of the unknown world to which he is journeying are banished from his mind. It is no longer life, but death, that he craves. If I had the power, I should not dare to banish physical death from the world. I would banish premature death. I would have every individual live on until ripe old age. But I should not dare bestow upon mankind the gift of everlasting physical life.

There are other things commonly regarded as evils from which all of us cannot be saved. While travelling from place to place, we may fall victims to accidents that are the result of human carelessness or human limitation. No man can travel from here to Chicago on a railroad train with absolute assurance that he will experience no loss of limb or life. Human skill and foresight may in time be able to reduce to a minimum the dangers of railroad travel. But human skill and foresight will never be able to render railroad travel absolutely safe. We also stand in danger of falling victims to the havoc that is caused by the powers of nature. No person in this audience has absolute assurance that he will not some day be killed by lightning or bruised and mangled in a cyclone. There is not a spot on the surface of the globe where human life is not threatened by the forces of nature. Blizzards, tornadoes, earthquakes, are some of the forces of nature that wage a never-ending war against human life. The best that we shall ever be able to do will be to foretell the approach of destructive storms and other death-dealing forces of nature, and thereby escape to some extent their ravages. We may be able to lessen the danger that threatens us from the forces of nature. We shall never be able to avoid entirely that danger.

Disease is another evil from which some of us will find it impossible to be saved. Regular habits, temperance in eating and drinking, abundant exercise in the open air, will accomplish a great deal toward banishing disease from the constitution. But no amount of regularity in habits, or temperance in eating and drinking, or open-air exercise, will be sufficient to develop a constitution, if there is no germ of a constitution to be developed. There are thousands of children born every year that have not the shadow of a chance in the world. A child is born of diseased parents; and, before the little one has learned to lisp his mother's name, hereditary disease has claimed him for its victim. The child has nothing but a diseased constitution to begin life with, and no amount of skill or care will be able to save him from an early grave. The father of the child had ruined his constitution by making himself a slave to intemperance or licentiousness. The mother of the child had ruined her constitution by tight-lacing, or by yielding to other behests of the tyrant goddess, fashion. What save an early death could you reasonably expect for the offspring of such parents? Common sense and care are antidotes to the ravages of disease. The framing and enforcing of wise statutes regulating marriage would have a tendency to lessen disease. But disease in milder or in stronger form cannot be wholly rooted out of the world. No man has absolute assurance of exemption from the ravages of disease.

Poverty is still another evil from which all the human race cannot be saved. The entire civilized world for months has been experiencing the evil of poverty. In India, in the various European countries, and in the United States, thousands and tens of thousands of men, women, and children know what it is to be cold and hungry and homeless. It matters not in what part of the civilized world a man travels to-day, he hears the cry of “hard times.” There are many valuable antidotes to the evil of poverty. If all men would practise the arts of industry and economy, the evil of poverty would be greatly lessened. Industry and economy will accomplish far more toward bringing on an era of prosperity than will street harangues bewailing the hard times. If all men would learn the wisdom of spending their dimes and dollars for fuel and clothing and wholesome food instead of throwing them away for beer and rum and whiskey, there would soon be a marked change for the better in the financial condition of the world. How many men who indulge in drinking and smoking have cut down their supplies of beer and tobacco since the era of hard times dawned upon us? How many saloon-keepers have experienced a falling-off in their sales since the era of hard times dawned upon us? It is the merchant, who sells the necessities of life, flour, and meat and sugar, who has experienced a falling-off in his sales since the era of hard times began. I venture to assert that, of the 15,560 business failures reported in the United States during the year 1893, not one-tenth of one per cent. of them were failures of saloon-keepers. A saloon-keeper sometimes dies or goes out of business; but “failure” is a word that has no place in his vocabulary. The wife and the children of the tippler must go on half-rations of flour and meat and sugar because of the hard times; but he himself must have his full rations of beer and rum and whiskey, whether the times be bad or good.

The practical application of the principles of human brotherhood would also be a valuable antidote to the evil of poverty. It is the grasping, selfish, heartless money power of the world that is largely responsible for this extraordinary era of hard times. This period of financial depression, through which the country is passing now, is largely the result of the schemes of men who, whatever they may theoretically believe regarding the doctrine of human brotherhood, in practice are seeking to subject mankind to the most intolerable slavery. These men already have their millions, but they must have their millions more. The toiling, struggling mass of humanity have no rights that these men, kings by virtue of the almighty dollar, consider themselves bound to respect. In their mad rush for more millions, these men do not scruple to trample into the dust every principle of the religion of humanity. In their mad rush for more millions, these men have no time to bestow thought or care upon the thousands of their fellow-creatures, whom they drive cold and hungry and naked into the streets.

I have presented a brief list of remedies for the evil of poverty. These remedies, if applied faithfully, would lessen the evil of poverty. The remedies will not be faithfully applied until human nature undergoes a radical change.

“Ah! when shall all men's good
Be each man's rule, and universal Peace
Lie like a shaft of light across the land,
And like a lane of beams athwart the sea,
Through all the circle of the golden year?”

“Ah, folly! for it lies so far away,
Not in our time, nor in our children's time,
'Tis like the second world to us that live;
'Twere all as one to fix our hopes on Heaven
As on this vision of the golden year.”
—Tennyson, in “The Golden Year.”

For centuries more we shall doubtless continue to have the poor with us. Misfortunes will continue to fall sometimes upon the most industrious, most economical, and most temperate of men.

I have dwelt at some length upon various physical evils to which the flesh is heir, such as premature death, disaster, disease, poverty. I have noted the fact that it is impossible for mankind to be saved wholly from these physical evils.

The world is blighted with moral evil as well as with physical. Of the two kinds of evil, moral evil is the worse. The special object of this address is to point out to you the way of salvation from moral evil. Selfishness is a moral evil. As civilization advances, selfishness, unfortunately, does not always retrograde. A half-dozen pioneer families settle in some new country. They are hundreds of miles from the refinements of civilization. Their rude houses are scattered here and there over the prairies, several miles from one another. But two of these farmers, whose houses are four or five miles apart, are better neighbors than two business men who live in the same block in one of our large cities. If one household in this pioneer colony is unfortunate because of sickness or loss of crops, their more fortunate neighbors lend them a helping hand. As long as some of the families have an abundance, their neighbors shall not pass the winter cold and hungry. In time the new country receives a large increase of settlers. Railroads are constructed. Towns and cities are built. The old spirit of hospitality that characterized the early settlers is displaced by a spirit of greed. Some family meets with misfortune; but human hearts are not as tender, and human hands are not as helping as they were a score of years ago. The rich man clothes himself in the finest cloth, and fares sumptuously every day, regardless of the fact that his neighbor is clad in rags and emaciated from hunger. Civilization and selfishness commonly go hand in hand. Ask any man who has lived ten years on a farm in a new country and ten years in a populous city in which place he witnessed the more selfishness, I think he will tell you he witnessed the more selfishness in the populous city.

Lust is a moral evil. Just so far as a man harbors lustful thoughts and desires, just so far is he undermining his moral constitution. When lustful thoughts and desires gain entrance into the human mind, they often increase so many fold that they crowd out chaste thoughts and desires. The more a man allows his mind to dwell on impure things, the harder does he find it to fix his thoughts on pure things. The mind grows to resemble the substance upon which it feeds. If the mind battens long on lustful thoughts and desires, it becomes incapable of appreciating anything better and nobler.

Intemperance is a moral evil. Intemperance weakens the physical constitution, it benumbs the mental constitution, it poisons the moral constitution. The physical, the mental, and the moral in man are so closely connected that what injures the physical or the mental constitution thereby injures the moral constitution. If I am to decide any question that involves an important principle of ethics, I wish my body to be vigorous and my mind to be clear when I render my decision. The man whose brain is stupefied with the poison of alcohol

LONDON CLUB SOFA.

Every week we are adding to our large stock the notable specialties and unique creations which heretofore have only been made to private order at high prices.

As an indication of this fact glance at this London Club Sofa,—eight feet in length, thirty inches deep on the seat, and twenty inches in height at the back.

Here two persons may recline at the same time, using opposite ends of the sofa, without interfering. Five or six persons may sit comfortably on its spacious seat. Where is there such another piece of furniture in the ready-made stock of any store?

The upholstery is of the heaviest character: it has the depth of the longest springs, and these are embedded in the finest curled live-horse hair. The covering may be leather, tapestry, cretonne, or any desired material. We recess the ends for down cushions, and supply these with the sofa at no extra cost.

Paine Furniture Co.,
48 Canal St., Boston.

is not in condition to pass judgment upon any matter of importance.

I might mention many other moral evils to which men fall victims, moral evils from which men need to be saved,—such as pride, anger, covetousness, dishonesty, envy, backbiting, falsehood, obscenity. The list of moral evils is a long one. What must I do to be saved from selfishness, from lust, from intemperance, from pride, from anger, from covetousness, from dishonesty, from envy, from backbiting, from falsehood, from obscenity, from any other moral evil to which human flesh is heir? My answer to this question is summed up in this one sentence: I must put myself in harmony with the trend of the Power that governs the universe. The man who transgresses the moral law is not living in harmony with the trend of the Power that governs the universe. The selfish man, the lustful man, the intemperate man, the dishonest man, is in open rebellion against the Power that governs the universe. The man who continually transgresses the moral law is rushing to certain destruction. He is out of joint with the universe. I would write in indelible letters on the mind of every person who comes within sound of my voice these words, the golden text in my address to-day, There is no other way under heaven offered to men whereby they can be saved except by putting themselves in harmony with the trend of the Power that governs the universe. There are certain moral principles that are as well established as physical principles.

I am not more certain that bodies, when unsupported, fall to the ground than I am that some courses of action tend to moral gain,—salvation,—and that other courses of action tend to moral loss,—destruction. I am not more certain that there is in the universe a Power or Law that holds the sun and the planets and the stars in their orbits than I am that there is in the universe a Power or Law that makes for righteousness. The Power that holds the sun and the planets and the stars in their orbits and the Power that makes for righteousness is one and the same Power.

There is one important fact that I have gleaned from my study of the history of humanity; namely, that the world is slowly, but surely, growing better. In spite of all that pessimists may say to the contrary, I am confident that the world is better to-day than it was a thousand or a hundred years ago. Individual philanthropists a thousand years ago may have taught as lofty moral precepts as our best philanthropists of to-day are teaching. Former ages may have produced as noble and lovable individuals as our late George W. Childs of Philadelphia. I do not know that George W. Childs was a greater benefactor to mankind than was Thomas Paine, who preceded him by almost a century. I do not know that Thomas Paine was a greater benefactor to mankind than was Alfred the Great, who preceded him by nine centuries.

The difference between the world to-day and the world a thousand years ago is that the masses to-day are more enlightened, and consequently are morally better, than were the masses a thousand years ago. A thousand years ago a few of the more intelligent philosophers believed that human slavery is an evil; but the masses had not been educated up to this standard of morality. To-day the masses of the people in every civilized land are thoroughly convinced that human slavery is an evil.

The ancient laws of Justinian uphold slavery on the ground that the victor in war acquires absolute right over his captives. The whole spirit of modern law is opposed to this infamous legal code of Justinian.

A thousand years ago a few of the more intelligent advocates of Christianity believed that the persecution of heretics is an evil. But the great majority of the advocates of Christianity believed that heretics ought to be dragged forthwith to the dungeon or to the stake. To-day the masses of Christian believers are less addicted to the crime of persecuting heretics than they were a thousand years ago. Barbarous methods of punishment that were in vogue a few centuries ago are no longer in operation in civilized lands. It is not necessary for me to cite more facts in support of the proposition that the world has been steadily growing better. That Power in the universe which makes for righteousness has been leading humanity steadily upward.

Our inability to comprehend that Power in the universe that makes for righteousness does not prevent us from putting ourselves in harmony with its trend. To put ourselves in harmony with the trend of this Power that makes for righteousness means to banish selfishness from our hearts. It means to treat our fellow-men as brothers and equals, who are entitled to the same rights and privileges that we ourselves enjoy. To put ourselves in harmony with the trend of this Power that makes for righteousness means to banish lust from our hearts. It means to make our thoughts and desires pure and chaste and God-like. To put ourselves in harmony with the trend of this Power that makes for righteousness means to banish falsehood from our hearts. It means to make our lives truthful and honest and upright. To put ourselves in harmony with the trend of this Power that makes for righteousness means to trample under our feet every vice, and to consecrate our lives to truth, benevolence, purity, and every other virtue. To put ourselves in harmony with the trend of this Power that makes for righteousness means to be saved ourselves; it means to do our part toward saving the race of mankind.

I do not think it is necessary for me in this address to dwell on the false answers that have been given to this important question, “What must I do to be saved?” I have endeavored to refute the errors of the dogmatic theologians,—blind leaders of the people,—not by directly assailing their errors, but by making an earnest presentation of the truth. I will not delay to draw the contrast between the views of salvation that I have presented and those that are commonly presented from Christian pulpits.

You are all thoroughly competent to draw this contrast for yourselves. When the truth once gains possession of the human mind, error can no more abide therein than darkness can abide on the earth after the sun has risen.

A CATECHISM OF LIBERAL FAITH.*

BY REV. CHARLES F. DOLE.

I.

WHAT MAN IS.

What do we think of when we see any person for the first time?

Ans.—We think first of the dress, the form, the face, the body, the outside.

What do we sometimes say, though the body may be good and strong, if a man proves not to have any mind?

Ans.—We say that “the man is not all there.”

Would you say that the man was “all there,” though he had a bright mind, if he had no heart, or kindly feelings? Take the case of the Emperor Nero.

What do you say if one has no conscience, or moral sense? Cite the Pome-roy boy or Tito in “Romola.”

What important things go to make a man, and especially an “all-round” man?

Ans.—A good heart, intelligence, or good sense, a good conscience, a good-will, and reverence.

Is the man all there,—that is, truly a man,—if any one of these things of which we have spoken is wanting?

Suppose, for instance, that a man had lost an arm, but had these things, and another man had all his limbs, but had no reverence or no will power, which would be the “all-round” man?

Give instances of men or women who have been thus “all-round” persons.

Can you see those things—mind, conscience, etc.—which go to make the real man or woman, or are they all invisible?

What may we call the real man of whom the body is the outward form?

Ans.—We may call the real, or inner man, who thinks and wills and does right and loves, the soul, or the person.

Can you think of any quite satisfactory name or definition of what we mean by the soul, or person?

Ans.—No, the simplest facts are often the hardest to describe. Thus it is very hard to describe the common word “matter.”

Is the soul, or person, visible?

*Extracts from a book by Rev. Charles F. Dole, now in press, to be published by the Unitarian Sunday School Society.

Is the person less if his body is little, or even if his limbs were cut off?

Where is the person?

Ans.—He seems to be wherever he acts; that is, where he shows his good heart or his good-will. Thus his presence is not only inside his body, but it may fill a room, so that every one else in the room feels it.

What strange fact is there about persons?

Ans.—The real person, or soul, is not only invisible, but he is one and indivisible. Thus the body is composed of parts, and it may be cut to pieces; but the person, the more completely he is a person, is a unity at every moment.

What word do we use to express this fact?

Ans.—We use the word “I.” Thus we say “my body,” as though it were a tool to use; but, whenever we say “I,” we mean the indivisible person, the self.

What difference in their consciousness is there between young children and grown persons?

Ans.—The young child is not yet conscious of himself as a person.

Do you suppose that any animal has real personality?

What wonderful experience comes to children as they grow mature?

Ans.—It is a great and new experience when a person becomes conscious of himself as a unity, and, therefore, as master of his body and his senses.

What religious name has been given to the complete and all-round human person?

Ans.—Such a person has been called a “son of God.”

A man is a soul, or person, by virtue of the invisible things,—his mind, his good-will, his good heart. Show how a good, vigorous, healthy, well-controlled body is a fitting house for the real person of a man or woman.

What is the most important question that we can ask about another person?

Ans.—The great and real question is not about the outside, or how he looks, but what sort of a person is he?

II.

ABOUT RELIGION.

What great and puzzling questions meet us as soon as we begin to think?

Ans.—We want to know why we are here in this world and what our destiny is; what sort of a world it is; what grand Power makes it; what kind of Power it is; whether it cares for men and loves them; and, if this is so, what we ought to do so as to come into accord with the great Power, or Life.

What is religion?

Ans.—Religion depends upon our answer, and especially upon some positive answer, to the questions just given. It is our thought of the reality and character of the mysterious Power in and behind all things;

it is our feeling toward that Power; it is also the conduct that goes along with such thought and feeling.

How is it that there are different religions?

Ans.—The different religions correspond to the feeling, the thought, and the knowledge of different men in different ages.

What is atheism?

Ans.—Atheism is the denial of the ground of religion. Thus the atheist says that there is no Power above man that cares for him.

Can any one prove atheism?

Ans.—No: on the contrary, there have probably been few real atheists. Those who have been called so have often been misunderstood. Thus Socrates in his time was wrongly called an atheist.

What are agnostics?

Ans.—Agnostics do not think that we can know anything about the subjects of religion.

What fact has often made men agnostics?

Ans.—The fact that there are many different religions.

Does this fact really show that we can know nothing in religion?

Ans.—No, there have also been different ideas about matter and the outward world; but men go on studying these things.

What truth is there in agnosticism?

Ans.—The truth is that the deepest facts are very difficult to describe.

Has there been improvement in religion?

Ans.—Yes: as a man’s thought ought to be better than a child’s thought, so religion to-day is better than the religion of the time when men were living a barbarous life.

Is it humane, that is, is it the part of an all-round person not to be interested in religion?

Ans.—No; for religion is one of the deepest, most universal, and most natural interests of mankind.

How do you account for the fact that some persons are not interested in religion?

Ans.—We account for it in the same way as for the fact that certain persons are color-blind and others have no sense for poetry or music. Many persons also have got wrong and misleading ideas about religion, and do not, therefore, understand how interesting a subject it is.

What does religion claim to do for us?

Ans.—As music and art satisfy certain wants in us, so religion claims to satisfy the deepest needs of our nature.

What facts should you like to be assured of?

Ans.—We should like to be assured that our lives count for lasting good, and that the great Power, or Life, is beneficent and friendly to man. We should like to be assured that there is no evil thing in the world to be feared, and that what men call evil may be overcome or even turned into good.

October Weddings.

By the “Storm King” from Antwerp, the “Cambroman” and the “Victorian” from Liverpool, we have landed handsome designs of porcelain LOVING CUPS from Doultons and the Worcester Royal Pottery.

Rich Coalport and Dresden China LAMPS, as well as an extensive line of American Lamps.

Also LOVING CUPS, Vases, Flagons, and Claret Cup Sets of the rich Carlsbad color and gold glass.

Visitors will find in the Crystal Glass exhibit the “Diamond finish” specimens, which are not equalled in brilliancy and rich cutting.

In the inner Art Pottery Room (3d floor) will be seen a handsome exhibit of genuine Japanese Cloisonné, selected by one of our firm the present season at the source of supply. The exhibit of old blue Delft Plaques is also larger than usual.

—The Dinner Set department, the Glass department, the —Art Pottery Rooms and the Lamp department, and the main floor exhibit, were never more complete.

Never was our stock larger, more valuable and comprehensive than now, the display of Wedding Gift pieces is extensive, ranging from $3 to $50 each, and in the Whist Prizes from 50 cts. to $3 each.

INSPECTION INVITED.

Jones, McDuffee & Stratton,

SEVEN FLOORS,

China, Glass, and Lamps,

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,

120 FRANKLIN.

How should you like permanently to feel about life?

Ans.—We should like to have a prevailing sense of restfulness, trust, and hope.

Practically, and at its highest, what may religion be said to offer?

Ans.—Religion offers the secret of the true or happy life.

III.

ABOUT GOD.

What did we observe about the nature of man?

Ans.—We observed that the most real things in man belong to an invisible world. Thus the self, or person, could not be seen or touched.

What facts do we discover when we study the world of things around us?

Ans.—We find that here, too, the most real facts are quite invisible. Thus we cannot see force, as in the case of electricity or gravitation. We cannot even see or truly touch the atoms of which things are composed.

What wonderful fact is still more mysterious?

Ans.—All things in nature move in measure and order.

What do we call this order?

Ans.—We call it the reign of law.

To what class of things does order, or law, belong?

Ans.—It belongs to the invisible world, or the world of mind.

What great fact does science teach?

Ans.—Science teaches that we live in a universe.

What does this mean?

Ans.—A universe is an orderly system wherein all things work harmoniously together.

How completely is the system in which we live a universe?

Ans.—There is no comet in the heavens nor grain of sand on the seashore that is outside of the order which fits all parts into the whole.

Can a man see this order of the universe?

Ans.—No, to his eyes things often seem to be disorderly, as in a storm; but man thinks this universe with his mind.

Which do we call most true, what the eyes see or what the mind finds out?

Ans.—The mind puts together and explains what the senses merely find.

What other mark of a universe do we discover besides order and law?

Ans.—So far as we can penetrate, the material of the universe is everywhere the same. Thus the same elements of matter which form our bodies are blazing in the star Sirius.

If this is a universe, what must be true about it?

Ans.—All the forces in it must come from one Power.

What else must there be besides Power?

Ans.—There must be mind, or intelligence; and the Power and the Mind must be one.

By what name do men call this wonderful Power or Intelligence?

Ans.—There are many names. The most common name is God.

Is it wrong to use different names for God?

Ans.—No name is sufficient to describe God.

What great idea do we associate with the name "God"?

Ans.—The name "God" carries the idea of the Good, or the Beneficent.

Do we see signs of the Good in the world around us?

Ans.—Order, Law, Beauty, and Unity are good.

What do we discover about the things in the outward world that seem to us disorderly or ugly?

Ans.—The more we study, the more we learn that these things come under the Order, or belong to their place in the great whole and have a meaning. Thus even the particles of dust in the air obey the law of gravitation, and play a part in the beauty of the sunset.

What else do we learn about the things that we call ugly?

Ans.—We learn that the ugly things disappear and do not last, while the beautiful Order and Unity remain.

Is there any beauty in a toad or a snake?

Ans.—Yes, to the eye of the trained naturalist these objects also have wonder, beauty, and significance.

IV.

ABOUT GOD AS THE GREAT CAUSE.

Can we imagine anything—for example, a stone—as moving itself?

Can we imagine the stone as having created itself?

Can we think of the stone as having always existed?

Can we think of the particles of the stone as having always existed?

What do we want to know about the stone?

Ans.—We want to know the cause that brought the stone into being.

Is it enough to say that gravitation brought the particles together?

Ans.—No, we want to know then what made gravitation.

What else do we want to know?

Ans.—We want to know what made the chemical laws that govern the atoms of the stone and compel them to take definite proportions toward one another.

What if we suppose that the atoms of matter and gravitation and the chemical laws have all existed forever?

Ans.—Then we want to know what makes them all work together into order and unity.

What sort of answer satisfies this last question?

Ans.—The great Cause which thus unifies all things must be a Being of thought and will. Thus the atoms of matter are his outward manifestation; gravitation, or force, expresses his will; the laws of matter spell out his thought.

Do we need further to ask what made God?

Ans.—No; for our minds rest content when we say that God always was,—that is, God is eternal.

Can the mind rest content in any other thought of the cause or causes that make the world?

Ans.—No other thought than the thought of God gives us the idea of unity or makes a universe.

What are those called who explain all things as originating in matter?

Ans.—They are called materialists.

Can you conceive that eternal atoms of matter agreed together to form this world?

Can you conceive that thought, consciousness, conscience, and will should arise out of atoms of matter?

Ans.—No; for this would seem to make the atoms a sort of gods.

What idea does our mind seek after besides cause?

Ans.—We want to know a purpose worthy of a universe; in other words, our minds ask, Why?

How does the idea of God give us a fit answer to this question?

Ans.—It is a worthy purpose of the universe when we say that God thus expresses his good will, or beneficence.

How can we state our thought of this purpose?

Ans.—We believe that all things move toward good.

Does this mean that things were once less good, and that God has therefore changed?

Ans.—No, God is always the same; but, as men's minds grow, the universe seems to move and to progress.

V.

GOD IN HUMAN LIFE.

Where does our life come from?

Ans.—We do not make our own life. It is in us, as though by "the breath of God."

Where does our thought come from?

Ans.—We cannot invent our own thought. It comes to our minds as though some one whispered it to us; or we seem to copy it from the thought that is written in the book of Nature.

Where do good feelings come from?

Ans.—We do not produce our own good feelings; but they rise at the touch of beneficence, or love.

Where does our good-will come from?

Ans.—Our good-will is stirred by the good-will that is shown to us.

What is the source of our life, our thought, our good feelings, and our good-will?

Ans.—It must be in God.

Why is it not enough to say that we get these things from other men?

Ans.—Because other men, our parents, our teachers, the inventors, the holy men and women, all in turn derive whatever they have from the one great source.

How, then, do wrong thoughts and feelings and ill will ever come?

Ans.—They come because men are yet childish or disobedient, as when the pure sunlight falls through faulty glass.

Where is God?

Ans.—God is wherever he acts.

Can we ever see God with our eyes?

Ans.—We can see God only as we see the person of our friend. We can see him in what he does; that is, wherever he expresses himself.

In what real ways do we thus see God?

Ans.—We see God in the beauty of his world, in a noble deed that he inspires, in the love that looks out from our friends' eyes; for these all tell us of the presence of God.

What great things may we say of God?

Ans.—He is one; he is eternal; he is power; he is thought; he is cause; he is life; he is beneficence, or love. His universe moves for the good of his creatures.

Can we think of God as a person?

Ans.—We think of him as a person in the sense in which we learned to call the most complete man a person. We mean that he is a real being, and that our higher nature is akin to his nature. Man's thought answers to God's thought, and man's love to God's love.

After we have said all that we can about God, what must we modestly add?

Ans.—"His greatness is unsearchable" and "His ways are past finding out." See Rom. xl. 33-36; also Eccles. xliii. 30-33.

Of what other profound facts may we add that they are "past finding out"?

Ans.—We must say this of our own natures, and we must say it of all things about us. Quote Tennyson's verses,—

"Flower in the crannied rock."

CAUTION.—We use the word "God" in different senses, straining language to express the greatness of the thought. Thus we use the word in the largest sense to include all the reality of the universe. Nature is God. All is God. We use the word also when we are only thinking of the invisible reality behind outward things. We may even say reverently, and in a still narrower sense, that man is God; that is, man is of the divine nature. Possibly, "the doctrine of the Trinity" was an unconscious attempt to express these different uses of the word "God."

It is interesting to see that we use man also in different senses. We use the word for all mankind: we use it also for the individual. We use it in a restricted sense for the invisible being who thinks and loves. We thus use it for the moment as though the man were apart from his body. More accurately, we use it for the whole man, body and soul. The all-around man is thus a unity. God is likewise a unity,—not apart from nature, but in and through nature.

Literature.

"PUNISHMENT AND REFORMATION."*

The lectures delivered by Frederick Howard Wines at the Lowell Institute last winter were written out with revisions soon after, and are now published in the "Library of Economics and Politics" by T. Y. Crowell & Co. They make a volume of nearly 350 pages, and cover the subject of "Penology and the Penitentiary System" from the earliest times till now, with much that is argumentative and instructive, as well as historical. The historical part is, however, of great value, particularly in what relates to the establishment of that method of reformatory treatment of criminals which culminates in the prison system of Mr. Brockway at Elmira, and which Mr. Wines very justly calls "The Elmira System." He shows the gradual steps by which this was evolved slowly and painfully from the old methods of punishment, repression, and exile, the success of the American Revolution by depriving England of a dumping-place for her convict population, leading to the founding of a distinct penal colony in Australia, the abuses and inherent evils of which produced in time the English system of penal servitude in prisons, out of which the talents of Sir Walter Crofton and others developed the more perfect Irish convict system, this in turn by the missionary efforts of the elder Dr. Wines (for the son now holds a confusing though well-deserved title of LL.D.). Prof. T. W. Dwight, Mr. Brockway, and several persons in Massachusetts became sufficiently known in America to produce the establishment of reformatory prisons at Elmira, N.Y., Sherborn, and Concord, Mass., etc. In these, and particularly in the remarkable Elmira prison university which Mr. Brockway has organized and managed now for nearly twenty years, the most perfect form of the new penal system exists, with its indispensable condition of indeterminate sentence, its trade schools (the best yet in operation in America), its physical treatment by baths, gymnastics, military drill, etc., of the mentally or physically defective, and the other features of that elaborate "prison science," here taking the form of an art, which is supplanting the old and crude methods of punishment.

* PUNISHMENT AND REFORMATION: An Historical Sketch of the Rise of the Penitentiary System. By Frederick Howard Wines, LL.D., special agent of the Eleventh United States Census on Crime, etc. Boston and New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.

Perhaps it is hardly accurate to call this perfected institution the "Penitentiary System," as Mr. Wines here does; for that title is getting superannuated, like the thing it used to describe, at Philadelphia, Auburn, Charlestown, Pentonville, and so many other "model prisons" in Europe and America. In the wide range of his learning, theological, historical, economical, and political,—so great that it leads him to make valuable observations by the hundred, in passing, and merely by the way, in course of his argument,—Mr. Wines does not, perhaps, call attention to the fact that this idea of penitential prison reform is based on the distinctively Christian doctrine of penitence and pardon for sin which grew up in the early formative ages of the Church, and, filtering down through the complicated relations of human society, at last created the model prison, which was the modern type of the ancient monastery. It had, consequently, most of the defects as well as the merits of the monastic system, until the later reformers, especially in the last fifty years, or since the genius of Maconochie and Brockway has been dealing with these difficult questions, have introduced those social features which fit the penitent convict to go back into the world. The discipline of the monk and the nun had not this last characteristic: it did not qualify them to resist the temptations and meet the opportunities of social life, but only to avoid them. The peculiar merit of the Elmira system is that it prepares the subject of it for the trials of earth rather than for the distant joys of heaven, and thus runs somewhat counter to the distinctly ecclesiastic spirit in which the requirements of the modern penitentiary were first devised. Like other ecclesiastic arrangements, these requirements were enforced by military methods, and to this, in part, was due their failure to meet the needs

At a Glance

anyone can see the difference between the twin-bar of clear, pure

Sunlight Soap

and other laundry soaps, but you'll know the difference when you use it because it cleanses with

Less Labor

Greater Comfort

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N. Y.

of the criminal; for, as Maconochie long ago pointed out, the military and the reformatory principle, though they are capable of giving external aid to each other, are in fact diametrically opposed,—the one dealing with men in the mass, and the other, like the influences of spiritual religion, addressing the individual man, and winning him to an inward conformity rather than to that external conformity which leaves the heart untouched and the life unreformed.

There is much more in this volume than we have here intimated. It is rich in fact and suggestion, and is generally free of those inaccuracies which beset the thinker with a turn for generalizing, such as the younger Dr. Wines has, like his father before him. To combine exactness with expansive theory is given to but few men: the training of father and son in statistical work has, however, corrected the slight tendency toward assumptions and traditional generalizations which a theological education and some practice in the pulpit had in their case helped to create. F. B. S.

A RINGBY LASS. By Mary Beaumont. New York: Macmillan & Co. 75 cents.—This book is one of the pretty "Iris Series," which means that, in point of convenience and outward form, it is all one can ask. It contains five short stories, all simply and effectively told and in harmony with the best books that have previously appeared in this setting. The first of the stories, that which names the book, is an old-fashioned love story, in which she is fair and he is brave; and the occasional glimpses of Yorkshire gossip and customs that it gives are delightful. The second story, "Jack," is burdened with the pain of hopeless love and the pathos of an early death; but it is true in touch, and not too sad, after all. "The White Christ" is the word of a Norwegian guide,—not a love story, but one that recognizes more heart experiences in a man's life than those which touch his love for a woman. "Miss Penelope's Tale" introduces an element of the supernatural in an entirely new form; while "The Revenge of her Race" is a curious little story of the marriage between a young Englishman and a Maori princess. Mary Beaumont is a new name to us; but, if she can write stories like these, it will soon enough become familiar.

MAUREN'S FAIRING. By Jane Barlow. New York: Macmillan & Co.—There is an originality and freshness about these tales that makes this one of the most charming collections of short stories that has appeared this summer. Those that give us bits of Irish peasant life are the best, and in these the conversations especially are deliciously natural and humorous. There is a refinement and delicacy about the opening tale and in "A Year and a Day" that is not duplicated; but they have less movement and life than "A Cream-colored Cactus." "Mac's Luncheon" and "A Formidable Rival" are amusing stories of a boy who would be less delightful in real life than in fiction, where one feels no responsibility for his freedom of speech.

LEIGHTON COURT. By Henry Kingsley. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.—This is the fourth issue in the set of Henry Kingsley's books as published by this firm. It is more compact in incident and conversation than "Ravenshoe" or "The Recollections of Geoffrey Hamlin," and its interest is quite as well sustained. The revival of Henry Kingsley's novels, shown by the fact that two different firms are now publishing new and complete editions of his works, seems to have been well founded on the basis of their genuine merit, which is quite different in style from that of others, and deserves not to be forgotten. His novels are wholesome and manly, as was only to have been expected from such a man.

Miscellaneous.

A pretty collection of picture-cards and reward-tickets for the use of Sunday-schools comes to us from the publishing house of Ernest Kaufman, New York. The latter are made up of eight or nine small pictures, which may be cut apart for use. The Scripture texts are illumined with bird and flower designs, good wishes for Christmas and the New Year, are enriched by verses of poetry, and there is one set of large, illumined texts. The price of the cards in the set is very moderate. Occasionally there are texts used which the Unitarian teacher or mother will hardly find available.

Messrs. D. C. Heath & Co. publish among their "English Classics," "Coleridge's 'Principles of Criticism,'" with introduction and notes by Andrew J. George, M.A. It is made up of Chapters I., III., IV., and XIV. of "Biographia Literaria." The first chapter, relating to Coleridge's mental development and training, is a charming bit of biography. His "Principles of Criticism," brought out in the chapters which follow, justify Lowell's statement that in criticism Coleridge was indeed a teacher and interpreter whose service was incalculable. "Many of his hints and suggestions are more pregnant than whole treatises." Mr. George's preface makes a good portico to the volume, and his notes clear up many difficulties; and the English reader will be grateful for the translation of hard Greek and Latin.

Literary Notes.

The New England Kitchen Magazine has proved a title too narrow for the scope of this monthly periodical; and it will be henceforth known as the American Kitchen Magazine,—a name more descriptive of its field and aims.

Books Received.

From Leach, Shewell & Sanborn, Boston. Laboratory Exercises in Chemistry. By Edwin J. Bartlett. The Essentials of Arithmetic, Oral and Written. Book II. For Upper Grades. By Gordon A. Southworth. A First Book in Greek. By Frank Pierrepont Graves, Ph.D., and Edward Southworth Hawes, Ph.D. The Educational System of Vertical Penmanship. By Anna E. Hill. Tracing Course, 3 Nos. Regular Course, 8 Nos.

From Joseph Knight & Co., Boston. A Mad Madonna, and Other Stories. By L. Clarkson Whitelock.

From D. Appleton & Co., New York. The Beginnings of Writing. By Walter James Hoffman, M.D. With an introduction by Prof. Frederick Starr. Price $1.75. The Psychology of Number and its Applications to Methods of Teaching Arithmetic. By James A. McLeilan, A.M., LL.D., and John Dewey, Ph.D. Price $1.50.

From Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York. Shakespeare's Heroines on the Stage. By C. E. L. Wingate. Price $2.00. Under the Old Elms. By Mary B. Claflin. Price $1.00. Cuore. An Italian School-boy's Journal. A Book for Boys. By Edmondo de Amicis. Price $1.50. Turning Points in Successful Careers. By William M. Thayer. Price $1.50.

From E. P. Dutton & Co., New York. Studies in Theologic Definition. Underlying the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds. By Frederic Palmer. Price $1.25.

From Macmillan & Co., New York. Ormond. A Tale by Maria Edgeworth. Illustrated by Carl Schloesser. With an introduction by Anne Thackeray Ritchie. Price $1.25. Jacob Faithful. By Capt. Marryat. Illustrated by Henry M. Brock. With an introduction by David Hannay. Price $1.25.

From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. At Odds. A Novel. By the Baroness Tautphoeus. Two volumes. Price $2.50. Echoes of the Playhouse. Reminiscences of Some Past Glories of the English Stage. By Edward Robbins, Jr. An Unlabeled Girl. A Story of School Life. By Elizabeth Knight Tompkins.

From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. At War with Pontiac, or the Totem of the Bear. By Kirk Munroe. Price $1.25. The Preacher and his Place. The Lyman Beecher Lectures delivered at Yale University in the month of February, 1895. By Rev. David H. Greer, D.D. Price $1.25.

College Girls. By Abbe Carter Goodloe. Illustrated by Charles Dana Gibson. Price $1.25. A Knight of the White Cross. A Tale of the Siege of Rhodes. By G. A. Henty. Price $1.50. The Tiger of Mysore. A Story of the War with Tipoo Saib. By G. A. Henty. Price $1.50. The Huguenots and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. By Henry M. Baird. Two volumes. Price $7.50.

From F. Tennyson Neely, Chicago. Washington, or the Revolution. By Ethan Allen. Price 50 cents. Paper covers.

Music Received.

From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. Richard of Taunton Deane. An Old Somersetshire Song. Music arranged by J. L. Molloy. Magnolia Waltz. Composed for Guitar. By C. de Janon. To Thee. English Version by M. J. Barnett. Music by Guy d'Hardelot. Terra Marique. Words by C. H. Goldthwait. Music by Gertrude H. Swift. Carmen Waltz. Guitar Solo. By P. Celorrio. Give my Love to Maggie. Song and Chorus. By Jas. R. Homer. The Dipper in the Park. Song. Words by John F. Palmer. Music by Charles E. Pratt. The Youngest of the Two. Song and Chorus. By Jas. R. Homer.

MUSIC

"College Songs"

Latest edition. 92 songs, including all the famous favorites. This collection is the most popular ever published, having reached its 41st edition. Over 300,000 copies sold.

"War Songs"

55 songs, 96 pages. Including all the great war songs of America. Solos for any voice. Choruses for male voices.

"Royal Four-hand Collection"

38 charming piano duets from the best sources. Easy, bright, and with abundance of variety. Good piano duets in collection form are difficult to find, and this book has proved very popular.

"Royal Reed Organ Collection"

57 of the most pleasing and excellent examples of music for the parlor organ,—waltzes, marches, operatic selections, etc.

"American Piano Collection"

The cheapest strictly high grade piano collection published. Fifty charming pieces. 215 pages. Handsome colored covers.

"Royal Collection of Instrumental Guitar Music"

80 pages, 82 pieces. Most complete and excellent instrumental guitar collection ever published for anything like the price.

"Royal Collection of Vocal Guitar Music"

80 pages, 42 songs. Uniform with the above.

EACH BOOK 50 CENTS POSTPAID

Oliver Ditson Company

453-463 Washington St., Boston
C. H. DITSON & CO., N.Y.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh
ANCHOR,
Cincinnati.
ATLANTIC,
New York.
BEYMER-BAUMAN,
Pittsburgh.
BRADLEY,
New York.
BROOKLYN,
New York.
COLLIER,
St. Louis.
CORNELL,
Buffalo.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS,
Pittsburgh.
ECKSTEIN,
Cincinnati.
FAHNESTOCK,
Pittsburgh.
JEWETT,
New York.
KENTUCKY,
Louisville.
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS. CO.
Philadelphia.
MORLEY,
Cleveland.
MISSOURI,
St. Louis.
RED SEAL,
St. Louis.
SALEM,
Salem, Mass.
SHIPMAN,
Chicago.
SOUTHERN,
St. Louis and Chicago.
ULSTER,
New York.
UNION,
"

Delightful Stories

BY

Kate Douglas Wiggin,
Clara Louise Burnham,
Eliza Orne White,
Bret Harte.

MESSRS. HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN AND COMPANY invite attention to the following

NEW BOOKS.

THE VILLAGE WATCH-TOWER.

By Mrs. WIGGIN, author of "The Birds' Christmas Carol," etc. 16mo, $1.00.

Several short stories containing admirable studies of New England village life,—bright, witty, extremely readable.

THE WISE WOMAN.

By Mrs. BURNHAM, author of "Sweet Clover," "Miss Bagg's Secretary," etc. 16mo, $1.25.

The aim of this charming story is to do away with artificial conventionalities and promote a more sincere social life.

THE COMING OF THEODORA.

By ELIZA ORNE WHITE, author of "Winter-borough," "When Molly was Six." 16mo, $1.25.

A novel that may well cause discussion. The scene is a semi-rural neighborhood, the characters true to life, the incidents natural, and the narrative fresh and attractive.

CLARENCE.

By BRETT HARTE. 16mo, $1.25.
A story of the War for the Union, and President Lincoln figures in it.

THE SONG OF HIAWATHA.

A Popular Holiday Edition of Longfellow's unique poem, with a fine Portrait, and 22 full-page Illustrations by FREDERIC REMINGTON. Crown 8vo, bound in very attractive style. $2.00.

JOHN KNOX.

Another excellent volume in the series of British Leaders of Religion. By FLORENCE A. McCUNN. With a Portrait. 12mo, $1.00.

RIVERSIDE POETS.

A specially attractive issue of the Riverside Edition of the Poetical Works of OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, in three volumes.

H. W. LONGFELLOW, in six volumes.

J. R. LOWELL, in four volumes.

J. G. WHITTIER, in four volumes.

Handsomely bound in cloth, full gilt. Sold only in sets (of each poet, in a neat cloth box), at $2.00 a volume. Particularly desirable for holiday gifts.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

The Deeper Meanings.

BY

FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

CONTENTS:

The Cost of the Divine Spark; The Poet-vision; Looking at Life through New Eyes; Rejoice, we Conquer!

Price 50 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Common Sense

dictates that you use materials when painting that you know something about. Pure White Lead and Pure Linseed Oil are and have been the standard for years. You know all about them; if you don't your painter does. To make sure, however, examine the brand (see list).

For colors, use National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead tinting colors; they are the best and most permanent; prepared expressly for tinting Pure White Lead. Pamphlet and color-card free.

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,
1 Broadway, New York.

Popular Works.

Baltimore American.—There is a tranquil, strengthening, uplifting power in these little books that makes one cherish for them, when they have been enjoyed and laid aside, the warm, grateful sentiment with which we treasure dear friends.

"As Natural as Life."

Studies of the Inner Kingdom. By Charles G. Ames, Minister of the Church of the Disciples, Boston. 109 pages.

"One of the most satisfying treatises we have ever read. The little volume is a spiritual poem, expressed in a human form called prose; but the beauty of its truth has root in the Infinite. It will prove a keen delight to the appreciative thinker."—Boston Ideas.

In Love with Love.

Four Life-Studies. By James H. West, author of "The Complete Life," "Uplifts of Heart and Will," "Poems," etc. 109 pages.

"There is something singularly fresh and strong in Mr. West's way of putting things. Any one of these studies read at night would sweeten a man's slumber, and waken him in the morning to some better sense of his great opportunity."—John W. Chadwick, in the Christian Register.

A Child of Nature.

Studies of the Outward as related to the Inward Life. By Marion D. Shutter, D.D., author of "Wit and Humor of the Bible," "Justice and Mercy," etc. 111 pages.

"One of the most charming little collections of essays that have recently come under notice. Written with lovely simplicity of diction, taking us into a happy apprehension of Nature, and withal habited in the happiest thoughts and conceits. Altogether delightful."—Philadelphia To-day.

Cloth, red edges, neatly stamped, each 50 cents.
Special gift edition, full gilt, each $1.00.

 For sale by booksellers, or sent postpaid by
JAMES H. WEST, Publisher,
174 High Street, - - - Boston.

IMPORTANT WORKS BY

FRANCES POWER COBBE

The Peak in Darien: With Some Other Inquiries touching Concerns of the Soul and Body. An Octave of Essays. 266 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"Vigorous in thought and style. We have read the volume through from preface to the end, and enjoyed it."—Watchman.

Darwinism in Morals, and Other Essays. 422 pages. Cloth, $2.00.

Some of the chapters: Darwinism in Morals; Hereditary Piety; The Religion of Childhood; Prehistoric Religion; The Religions of the World; The Religions of the East; The Religion and Literature of India; Unconscious Cerebration; Dreams; The Evolution of Morals and Religion.

The Duties of Women. A Course of Lectures. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

"The profoundest, wisest, purest, noblest book in principle, aim, and tone yet written upon the true position of woman in society."

The Scientific Spirit of the Age, and Other Pleas and Discussions. 243 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Religious Duty. 311 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

The Home.

ARMENIAN CRADLE-SONG.*

BY ALICE STONE BLACKWELL.

[From the Armenian of Raphael Patkanian.]

Nightingale, oh, leave our garden,
Where soft dew's the blossoms steep;
With thy litanies melodious
Come and sing my son to sleep!
Nay, he sleeps not for thy chanting,
And his weeping hath not ceased.
Come not, nightingale! My darling
Does not wish to be a priest.

O thou thievish, clever jackdaw,
That in coin findest thy joy,
With thy tales of gold and profit
Come and soothe my wailing boy!
Nay, thy chatter does not lull him,
And his crying is not stayed.
Come not, jackdaw! for my darling
Will not choose the merchant's trade.

Wild dove, leave the fields and pastures
Where thou grieve'st all day long;
Come, and bring my boy sweet slumber
With thy melancholy song!
Still he weeps. Nay, come not hither,
Plaintive songster; for I see
That he loves not lamentations,
And no mourner will he be.

Leave thy chase, brave-hearted falcon!
Haply he thy song would hear.
And the boy lay hushed and slumbered,
With the war-notes in his ear.

MOLLIE WHITE-FOOT'S VACATION.

BY ANNA H. SMITH.

When Mrs. Perkins gave Clara Bourne her prettiest kitten, the gray one that had four white feet, she thought Clara loved kittens. She did not know that it was her own amusement Clara loved, but that she wanted a kitten just as she wanted a doll to play with.

Clara carried the kitten home; and, fortunately for the kitten, there was a kind cook there who gave it every morning a saucer of milk, with bread crumbs or oatmeal, and also looked after it at dinner time, so that Mollie White-foot grew large and fat and sleek, and had, on the whole, a very comfortable time, except when Clara played with her too roughly.

When summer came, Clara's mother and father decided to close the house, and go away to board for two months at the mountains. Clara was so delighted that she hardly gave a thought to Mollie until the day before they were to start. Then she asked her mother if she were going to take Mollie with them. Mrs. Bourne told her that it would be impossible, but that she need not worry, as Mollie could very well take care of herself for two months; and Clara, busy with getting her little trunk packed and putting in it her favorite toys and books, gave no further thought to the matter.

The Bournes started off in excellent spirits one pleasant morning; and, as they turned the key in the door, Mollie came and looked at them, and cried as if she understood that they were going away, and as if she were begging them not to leave her alone. This made Clara, and even Mrs. Bourne (who did not like cats), feel a little uncomfortable; but they soon forgot all about Mollie in the excitement of the journey.

They had left enough scraps of bread and meat under the doorstep in the back yard to last Mollie for a few days; but she missed her milk, and, when night came, mew'd sadly, for she began already to feel very lonesome.

In a day or two there was a heavy rain; and Mollie had to crawl under the doorstep as far as possible, and stay there until the storm was over,—an experience which she did not find at all pleasurable. She had never been a cat given to neighborhood wanderings; and, when her little store of food had given out and no human being came near her, and, in spite of her most beseeching mew's at the side door, the house remained closed to her, the creature began to feel very wretched indeed. She got so hungry that she could not sleep at night; and one night her cries reached the ears of a sick woman in a house near by, and kept her from getting the sleep she needed until her husband went out and threw stones and sticks in the direction in which the cries came, and then poor Mollie, frightened nearly into a fit, crept under the doorstep again, and lay in half-dazed silence.

That night Mrs. Bourne and Clara slept soundly in their comfortable room at the hotel among the mountains, and no thought of Mollie came to trouble their placid repose. The days which flew by so rapidly for Clara and her mother dragged slowly to Mollie. Now and then she managed to catch a bird, and once she made a scanty meal upon a very small mouse that ventured across her pathway; but she was getting too weak to do very much hunting, for which, indeed, she was sadly unfitted, owing to the manner of her bringing up. She ventured into the neighbors' yards in her desperation; but she found that the swill-buckets were all kept tightly closed, and, if she was seen, she was driven off with a stone or a broomstick. Many of the houses round about were shut up like her own home; and the families who were left were so indignant to think that the more fortunate ones who could get away should leave their cats behind for the stay-at-homes to take care of that they would not often feed a stray cat, or even tolerate its presence. Mollie saw two little pet kittens bereft of attention crawl away and hide and die; and she felt as if that must soon be her fate, too.

One day, when Mollie was prowling around in search of a bit of food, a boy threw a stone at her. Being weak with hunger, she did not jump aside quickly enough to avoid the missile. In the panic caused by pain and fright, she ran wildly, she did not know where, and by chance took refuge in a garden belonging to a house a few streets from where the Bournes lived. There was a little hole in the fence which she spied out as she ran; and, being thin, she crawled through, and fell exhausted under a low-growing shrub.

The day and night went by, and another day and night; and Mollie still lay under the shrub, aching from the bruise she had received, and too weak to crawl about any longer in search of food and drink. Her mouth was parched with thirst: she slept, and woke with feverish starts. How gladly she would have welcomed a taste of cool water! The third day was slowly drawing to an end when Mollie heard footsteps approaching her. She had met with so much unkindness that she wanted to get up and run away, but she was too feeble to do so. The footsteps paused, and a hand pushed aside the branches that partly concealed her; and, as Mollie raised her eyes and tried to shrink back under the bush, she saw a boy looking down at her. This sight alarmed her very much; for boys, as a rule, had never been kind to her. All she could do, however, was to lie still, and wait for the expected blow. Instead of the blow she felt a hand touching her head softly, and heard a gentle voice say, "Poor pussy!" That was all; and, just as Mollie was trying to purr a faint response, the steps retreated much more rapidly than they had come, and Mollie, thinking herself forsaken, closed her eyes again in a sigh of disappointment.

In a few minutes she heard once more the sound of footsteps, and this time two voices.

"Here, mamma, right here under this bush," said one voice.

"Oh, the poor thing!" said another.

"Is she dead, mamma?"

"No: she is opening her eyes," was the reply. "Put the saucer of milk down close to her head."

Help had come to Mollie at last, but it seemed as if it were too late. Mollie could not take the milk. "Bring a little water, Henry," the kind voice said; and in a few minutes Mollie saw a dish of water placed almost under her nose, so close that she could by raising her head lap a little. She was so grateful that she tried to purr, and, in fact, succeeded in making a faint sound.

"Leave the milk, Henry, and the water," said the voice. "See that faded ribbon around her neck! The poor thing has been left to starve by some family gone away for the summer, and I think she has been hurt in some way. Do you see how wicked it is for people to be so thoughtless?"

From this time on better days came to Mollie. Slowly her strength came back under the ministrations of the kind little boy and his mother; and by and by she grew sleek and fat, and seemed quite like her old self. When the early days of September arrived, instinct drew her back to her former home; and there a great surprise was in store for her. The house was open again; and, as she walked leisurely toward the open door, Clara darted out, and seized her with a cry of delight.

"O mamma, mamma! just look here! Mollie has come back, and see how handsome she has grown!"

"Well, didn't I tell you," said Clara's mother, casting an approving glance at Mollie, "that cats are quite able to take care of themselves when they are obliged to do so?"

THE SAMPLE QUILT.

"There, Elmira," said Mrs. Deborah Sharp, "there isn't another one in the whole town half so handsome." She patted lovingly the bright silk quilt spread out on her front-room bed.

"Indeed there isn't," responded Elmira. "Mrs. Green is the only one I know of that has a silk quilt, anyway; an' hers isn't a circumstance to this. Hers is mostly made of her and her mother's old black silk that she dyed, and black silk don't dye another color so it looks like much."

"No, I should say not," her aunt said grimly. "Remember how I dipped that old black silk of mother's. I guess I shan't try to take black silk and dye it pink again in a hurry. Now let's see. It's all done except that last corner over by you. That won't take more'n fifteen pieces, if 'twill that. Then, when I get that in, I guess we'll have Mrs. Green and Mrs. Badger and her company here to tea. They'll be the first ones to see the quilt except ourselves. How many pieces did you say came yesterday?"

Elmira went to the bureau and picked up a large brown envelope, out of which she shook a handful of silk pieces of all sorts, and counted them carefully.

"There are twenty-one pieces, Aunt Debby; an' there were seven left from the lot we got last month. I put them in the wardrobe drawer."

Mrs. Sharp took the lot from Elmira. "Land!" she said appreciatively: "aren't they pretty? Seem's to me the silks get prettier every month. Now how much is this lavender one with the sprig on it? I'd like to get you a dress off that, Elmira."

Elmira's pale face flushed softly; but, before she could reply, her aunt's voice broke in sharply, "Elmira Horton, just read that, will you?"

Elmira wonderingly took the printed slip that had come with the samples. Her aunt gazed at her with consternation, while she read it.

"Well," the girl said, as she finished it. "I don't see anything the matter: it's the same thing they've always sent."

"What!" her aunt gasped. "Why haven't I seen it before then? Do you mean to say they've been sending that printed notice for over a year, and we've kept right along stealing their silks?"

"Stealing!" echoed Elmira, hopelessly.

"Yes, stealing. What else is it, I'd like to know, when it says it here plainly that"—she took the paper and read in jerks,—

"'You will please return all samples we send you, whether or not you select any goods for purchase.' Now, Elmira Horton, what do you make of that?"

Elmira looked more hopeless than ever. "Oh!" she stammered. "I never thought it meant us. Why, you only got the samples to make the quilt of. We haven't bought anything at all."

"That's all the worse," answered her aunt, severely. "But we have, though. Last winter I bought that yard and a half of black silk for my apron, and this spring you sent for that blue surah for your hat."

"So I did," said Elmira, weakly. It seemed to give a new phase to the matter, now that she remembered their purchases. Then she visibly brightened.

"I don't believe," she said more decidedly, "that, if it was wrong, Mrs. Dunston would have told you you could send for all the samples you wanted."

"I don't believe," replied Mrs. Sharp, "that Mrs. Dunston meant what I thought she did. That summer she was here and kept getting all those samples was when I first thought that, if I could get a lot of 'em, I could finish out this quilt I'd had started so long. And so I asked her if I could send for samples, too; an' she said I could, an' gave me the address of Prince & Co. But I don't suppose she ever thought I was going to send for pieces of silk an' keep 'em to make a quilt of, without paying for 'em. And here I've been cheating that store out of enough silk to make two-thirds of a bed-quilt! And I never thought of it before!"

Poor Mrs. Sharp so far forgot herself that she sat down on the edge of her best counterpane on her best-room bed.

Elmira looked at her dejectedly. It seemed bad enough, and she felt as if she were more to blame than her aunt. The silence in the room was so complete that the ticking of the clock in the next room jarred painfully. At last Mrs. Sharp got up, and began deliberately to fold up the unfinished quilt.

"What are you going to do, aunt?" ventured Elmira.

"I don't know yet," said Mrs. Sharp. "I'm going to think about it to-night."

The next morning at breakfast Mrs. Sharp abruptly announced to her niece that she was going to Boston that afternoon. Elmira almost dropped her cup of coffee. Her aunt had been to Boston just once during the last ten years, and that was when she went to the funeral of her husband's brother.

"I've been thinking all night," went on Mrs. Sharp, calmly, "and I've concluded that's all I can do. First, I thought I'd rip out all those pieces, an' send 'em up to Prince & Co. with a letter. But, what with the turned-in edges an' all the fancy stitches, there'd be little left of the silk of any good to them. So I'm going to take that quilt an' show it to Mr. Prince, and explain to him how it all was. And, of course, I can't do anything but give him the quilt."

"You can get Jane Thomson to stay a few nights with you; an', if anybody asks what I've gone for, you can tell 'em I'm going to visit Brother George's widow, and I am. She's been wanting me to come ever since George died."

That afternoon Mrs. Sharp and the quilt departed, leaving Elmira tearful and contrite. The more she thought of the theft they had been carrying on for so many months, the more heinous seemed her part in it. Her aunt had been away for five days when Elmira received a postal card

JOEL GOLDTHWAIT & CO.

Fall Carpets.

We are showing the finest line of

SCOTCH AXMINSTERS, ENGLISH WILTONS AND BRUSSELS, AMERICAN WILTONS AND BRUSSELS.

ALL NEW GOODS AND STYLES. OUR OWN SPECIALTIES.

Also a full line in open stock at prices lower than ever.

JOEL GOLDTHWAIT & CO.,
163 to 169 WASHINGTON ST., BOSTON.
(NEAR CORNHILL.)

*This lullaby is a favorite in Armenia. Mothers sing their children to sleep with it under the shadow of Mount Ararat and along the banks of the Euphrates.

from her, saying she should be back that afternoon. So Jane Thomson went home, and Elmira waited with tingling nerves for the evening stage-coach.

When Mrs. Sharp arrived, she wore an inscrutable expression; and to all Elmira's anxious questions she responded briefly that she would tell her everything after supper. As soon as the dishes were cleared away, Mrs. Sharp unlocked her trunk, but did not open it. Then she and Elmira sat down together before it, and Mrs. Sharp began her story.

"I didn't tell Hannah what I'd gone up for," she said; "for I'd begun to think that I didn't know but what I could be put in jail for stealing. So I wasn't going to worry her over the mess. So I held my tongue."

"The very next morning after I got there I went right down to Mr. Prince's store. Land! Elmira, it's an enormous store, now I tell you! I should think there isn't anything that grows or is made but is in that store. Well, I couldn't find Mr. Prince that first morning, nor the next; and they weren't going to let me see him the third. But I just told that stuck-up clerk of his that, if he thought I was going to lug that big bundle round any more mornings, he was mistaken. 'And,' says I, 'if I can't see Mr. Prince, you've got to keep the bundle here till I can.'"

"Just then who should come by but Mr. Prince himself. I knew 'twas he before he spoke by the way that clerk began to be all of a sudden most polite and kind."

"Well, Mr. Prince took me right into a little room where there was nothing but a desk and some chairs, an' nobody else but us two. He's a handsome man, about forty-five, I guess; an' he had the sharpest eyes I ever saw on a human being. But they weren't ugly eyes, nor mean. I told him the whole story; and he never said a word, except he coughed hard once or twice, and kept pulling his mustache most of the time. When I got through, I undid the quilt, and spread it out carefully. It made me sick to think of giving it up. I didn't see anything in Boston half so handsome."

"So," says Mr. Prince, "that's the quilt." And he stood looking at it for a long time, while I thought he'd hear my heart beat: it sounded to me louder than all the rattle of the cars outside. Then all of a sudden he leaned over and put his fingers on the pieces of your mother's wedding gown and my mother's and the East India silk of grandmother's and my wedding one."

"My," he said, "what beautiful pieces of silk!" I told him what they were, and he asked me if I had any more like 'em; and I said I did,—a little bit of every piece."

"And, then, what do you think he said? He told me his wife was making a collection of rare pieces of silk, and that she hadn't in all her collection such lovely pieces as those old ones of mine. And he said, 'If you will send me just little scraps of those silks, I shall be much more than repaid for all these samples of mine.'"

"Well! I felt as if all my bones had turned into soft India rubber. And I dropped into a chair and boohooed. Yes, I did, Elmira Horton. An' Mr. Prince didn't know what to do. He sent for some ice-water; and, finally, I made out to tell him that, when a body expects to be taken up an' sent to jail, and instead is treated as the angel of the Lord would treat a poor, unknowing sinner, it was a little too much for my nerves."

"Then he got solemn, and said a funny thing. 'Mrs. Sharp,' says he, 'I didn't know there were any people like you left, even in New England. If I could be sure there were many more, I'd be glad to give my entire silk department to their sole use.' Now, wasn't that queer?"

"Then, don't you think, he got a carriage and put me in, and paid the driver; and I was driven home to Hannah's, an' she opened her eyes, I tell you. And the next morning came a big bundle to me; an' inside there were enough pieces of silk to make three quilts,—whopping pieces, too. And there was Mr. Prince's card; and on it it said, 'For Mrs. Sharp, with Mr. Prince's thanks.'"

"Yes, Elmira Horton; and just let me get into that trunk, and I'll show you. And we'll have Mrs. Badger and Mrs. Green here to tea just as soon as that quilt's done!"—Youth's Companion.

A PAIR OF PIGEONS.

A pair of pigeons named Annie Rooney and McGinty were given to a boy of eleven who lives in New York City. They were very young when they were given to him, and he determined to train them so that they would always make their home at his house. For six weeks he kept them in his room in a mocking-bird cage, and was very careful about the food and water. In the day-time he put the cage outside the window, and, when it rained, covered it with a cloth; for pigeons, while they use a great deal of water both to bathe in and to drink, do not like to be out in the rain.

When six weeks were passed, he opened the cage door, and fastened it so that the birds could go out. At first they were contented to poke their heads out of the open door; but, finally, after a great deal of conversation (pigeons are great conversationalists), out they flew. They seemed hardly to know the use of their wings at first, and circled around in a dazed way, alighting on the top of a neighboring roof, where they apparently had again a great deal to say to each other. For twenty minutes they talked, then seemed to have made up their minds to try a long flight; for, with one graceful swoop into the air, off they flew. Hours went by, and they did not return; and, when it was nearly dark, all hope was abandoned. But suddenly there was a whirr of wings, and Annie Rooney came home. McGinty still was absent. Annie Rooney perched herself on her roost, every feather ruffled up most disconsolately; while the boy who owned them went to bed very low in his mind. At daylight next morning he was awakened by such a cooing as he had never heard before. Rushing to the window, there he saw McGinty in the wildest excitement, and with his head almost buried in the little dish which held the drinking-water.

From that day the cage was left outside, and the door taken off, so that the birds might come and go as they chose.

Then, alas! began their troubles. So pleased were they with their little journey into the world that they at once set out to explore the houses near by; and every day a note was sent in from some neighbor to the effect: "Extremely sorry; but your pigeons fly into my bedroom, and knock down all the ornaments." "Your birds insist upon walking up and down under my bed, making most unearthly sounds. I am afraid of birds, and cannot stand having them in my house." "Again your birds have flown into my windows, and are in the children's doll-house. They refuse to come out, and make such a hideous noise as to alarm the children."

These three notes were only samples of others; and, after a family conclave, it was decided the pigeons must be sent away. Summer was coming on, and it was finally concluded the country was the best place for them.

Their owner took them in a covered basket to a farm on Long Island, where they were put into a pigeon-house, and provided with water and food. The next day they were apparently happy. So, with many regrets, they were told good-by; and the boy returned to town.

It was a long journey,—some hours; and it was rather a sad-faced youth who mounted the steps, and told his mother he had left his birds in the country. It was then six o'clock in the evening. At ten minutes past six there was a great fluttering of wings; and, lo and behold! Annie Rooney and McGinty had returned, and prouder and happier pigeons never were seen.—Anne Helme, in Harper's Round Table.

DOT'S TAME CROW.

There are many animals that can be tamed to pet besides cats and dogs. I have seen sheep, foxes, coons, white rats, and even toads; but the best bird is a crow. My little Dot heard papa say there were some crows near by, high up in the crotch of a tree; and she wanted to see them, but she could not climb so high. Her big brother Tom said he would get them for her. How brave he looked climbing that tree! He found two little crows; and, as he did not wish to rob the mamma crow, he only brought one down. Oh, what a plump, funny-looking, featherless bird he was, with bright, beadlike eyes, and his heart beating so rapidly with fright that Dot said,—

"O Tom, take him back to his nest!" But Tom replied, "We will put him in a cage and feed him bread and milk, and see what he will do."

In a short time little Mr. Crow grew into a beautiful black bird, and would fly in and out of the cage at any time, he was so tame; and, when he wished to be fed, he would cry, "Caw! caw!" so sharply that Dot knew just what he wanted.

Dot said, "I think he must brush his feathers to have them so glossy, and I wonder if it hurts as much as when nurse brushes my hair."

Mr. Crow grew to be a great thief, and would take anything he could lay his hands on—I mean claws—on, even grandma's silver spoons, and would fly into the ridge-pole of the house, and not even Dot could call him down. Once he hid some spoons, and we never could find them. Dot taught him to say "Halloo" quite as plainly as a parrot; and such long conversations as they carried on when he perched himself on Dot's knee! He would look at her, wink his eyes, turn his head first one way and then another in a very wise way; and Dot thought he understood every word she said.

Dot had a flower-bed, and he used to help her weed it by scratching the earth. One day I heard her say, "Naughty Mr. Crow, you have scratched up my pansy." Then he flew on to her shoulder, tried to peck her lips; and she said, "That's the way he kisses me and asks forgiveness."

Once a lady came to the house, and Dot took her into the garden to pick some flowers. Mr. Crow went, too; and he would fly about and snip off the flowers with his bill, and the lady asked Dot "where he kept his scissors." He was so fond of red flowers that he snipped off every bud from the red rose-bush.

Sometimes he would be gone a few days, and Dot said he was "visiting his relatives." Once, when he returned, he looked so funny. He had tried to swallow a wee little mouse; but the tail still hung out, and he had such a time trying to get it down his throat! But he succeeded at last.

One day Dot's mamma put a kettle of red raspberries on the stove to boil for canning. She left the room a moment; and, when she returned, what did she see but Mr. Crow in the middle of the kettle, eating berries as fast as he could! He looked up just long enough to say, "Halloo," which meant, "I am having a good time!"

He grew so mischievous that, at last, Dot's mamma had him carried a long way off. Dot felt very badly, and—yes—she cried, too; and wouldn't you? But she told me very quietly that the next spring there were so many tame crows about that she knew Mr. Crow had sent all his little children back to see how she was.—The Examiner.

A CLEAN TOWN.

The cleanest town in the world is said to be Broek, in Holland. It is only a few miles from the capital, and has been famous for its cleanliness from time immemorial. It is also notable on account of the fanciful style of its houses and yards and gardens and streets. The people, though only peasants, are well-to-do; and all feel a pride in their town. It seems to be the first business of their lives to keep their houses freshly painted, their gardens in perfect order, and their yards and streets as clean as a parlor, according to the Pall Mall Gazette. No carts are allowed in the streets, and no cattle. Though the raising of stock and the making of butter and cheese are their occupations, a stranger would never imagine that there were any cattle in the region unless he went to the beautiful green meadows at the back of the houses or the stables out there, where cows are kept in stalls scrubbed and washed like a kitchen. The streets are too fine and neat for the feet of the animals to step on. All are paved with polished stones, intermingled with bricks of different colors, and kept so scrupulously clean that a lady could walk anywhere in white satin slippers.

A FRIEND IN NEED.

An English boy wrote to the London Times an account of how he cared for some birds during the severe cold of last winter.

"I thought perhaps you would allow a school-boy to tell you how very tame and fearless the cold and hunger have made the wild birds around our house."

"Of course, we feed them with bread and all sorts of odds and ends, and the ground is simply black with our hungry visitors. Even the suspicious rooks come quite close to the house for their share."

"A little blue-tit passes its day in our basement, heedless of sleepy pussy baking herself before the stove."

"Most of all, I wish to tell you about my strange bedroom companion, a little robin, which has taken up its residence in my bedroom; and, though I leave the window open, he never goes out, except to take a short fly. We pass the night together, and he makes his bed in one of my football boots."

"The other morning he woke me up by singing on a chair at the side of my bed, I suppose he thought I ought to be at my lessons."

A CLEVER DOG.

The London Spectator tells the following story:—

"A collie in Scotland, whom I know well, is in the habit of fetching from his master's room slippers, cap, keys, or anything he is sent for. One day, sent on the usual errand, he did not reappear. His master followed, and found that the door of the bedroom had blown to, and that the dog was a prisoner. Some days later he was again told to fetch something; and, as the wind was high, his master, after a few minutes' delay, followed him. He found him in the act of fixing the door firmly back with the door-mat, which he had rolled up for the purpose; and, having taken this precaution, the prudent animal proceeded to look for the slippers. This same collie, when walking with me, ran on in front, and rang the gate-bell of the house to which I was going, so that I had not to wait when I arrived there."

The largest State building in the United States is the capitol of Texas. It is also seventh in size among the great buildings of the world. It cost $3,500,000.—Popular Science.

NONE
SUCH MINCE MEAT

Two large pies are made from each package of None-Such Mince Meat. For sale by all grocers. Be sure and get the None-Such.

MERRELL-SOULE CO.,
Syracuse, N.Y.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S
STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

"A FAIR FACE MAY PROVE A FOUL BAR-GAIN." MARRY A PLAIN GIRL IF SHE USES

SAPOLIO

REV. GEORGE W. BRIGGS.

In the Third Congregational Society (Unitarian), Cambridge, yesterday morning, there was a special service in memory of the late Rev. George W. Briggs, D.D., who had been pastor of the church for over a quarter of a century.

The assistant pastor, Rev. W. H. Johnson, occupied the pulpit, and preached the memorial sermon. Appropriate music was rendered by a quartette. Prior to the sermon the assistant pastor explained that the service of the day was not intended to attract public attention, but was merely a testimony of the love and esteem which the members of the society felt for their late pastor. He then read the testimonies to Dr. Briggs which three of the older parishioners had been invited to give. The first letter referred to the circumstances under which Dr. Briggs became pastor of the church. Hearing that he had resigned his pastorate at Salem and was coming to Cambridge to educate his sons, the Third Church gave him a call, which he at first declined because of his advanced age, thinking that a younger man could do more good. He finally, however, accepted, and on April 3, 1867, began a ministry which continued for twenty-eight years with perfect harmony. Since the organization of the society in 1805 there had been no longer term of service by any pastor. "We shall never look upon his like again," the letter concluded; "and it remains for us to profit by his example. Dr. Peabody once wrote that Dr. Briggs had always held a foremost position among Unitarian ministers and in the hearts of all who knew him."

The second testimonial spoke of the five years of suffering which preceded the pastor's death, which was, perhaps, indicted by Infinite Wisdom only to round out a noble life. Dr. Briggs was a power in the pulpit. His sermons, while emotional, were never sensational. His texts were so carefully chosen and so strictly adhered to that the text always recalled the sermon, or a passage from a sermon the text. The influence of his whole life was one of uplifting and inspiration. Old and young loved him, and all gave him their confidence.

"Having been a member of this church under all its pastors," wrote a third parishioner, in part, "I may say that, from the very first of his coming, Dr. Briggs drew us all into closer harmony. We became one joyous family. He sympathized with us in our joys, and was beside us in bereavement, and led us in his prayers up to the Father's throne." After speaking of the joyousness in the late pastor's life, which was one of his most attractive characteristics, and the sacrifices for his people's good, which his generous heart prompted him to make, the writer said, "His influence over our lives will never be lost."

The assistant pastor announced that the parish committee had decided to hold, at some date in the near future, another service in memory of Dr. Briggs, which would be of a more public character, and at which all the friends, as well as the parishioners, of the late pastor would be welcome. After the singing of a hymn Mr. Johnson preached the memorial sermon from the text, "A Cloud of witnesses," Hebrews xii. 1. He spoke with eloquence and feeling of the departed. Honored and loved as men may be, he said, in brief, they seldom show all that is noble in them until after death.

When death has lifted one out of earthly environment, he went on to say, his true character shines forth as the moon when lifted above low-lying vapors. Every life which is worthily lived bears testimony to some enduring principle. As a minister, our beloved pastor bore faithful witness for Christ in all his ways.

In the consecration of his life to his people, even more than in his eloquence as a preacher, he was the faithful shepherd of his flock. He was the constant friend and father of his people, and his presence was a perpetual sunshine. His throne was preeminently in the heart. His sermons glowed with the fervor of intense personal piety.

Doctrinal points had little interest for him compared with the sorrows and joys and daily needs of his people. He did not argue, but presented his own deep convictions so powerfully that his hearers believed and accepted them. To him the life hereafter was a vital reality. The spiritual world was not a land of shadows: it was only passing from the home below to the home above. Dr. Briggs had an intense conviction of the value of the testimony of the spirit as superior to that of reason. He believed that the truths of religion might be hidden from the wise and prudent, but revealed unto babes. The statements of the Bible were accepted by him as conclusive. He believed that in heaven the Messiah was still carrying on the redemption work which he began on earth: his ministry was not closed when he parted from his disciples.

The late pastor had a conviction of the supernatural mingling with the natural which was characteristic of a past age.

His ministry had in it the same elements which made some of the preachers of old so powerful. He was filled with faith and the power of the Holy Ghost; his eloquence thrilled his congregation. With his conservatism, he was yet in warm sympathy with the progress of modern civilization.

In one of his sermons, written in 1891, he said: "One day now does more for human progress than a thousand days of patriarchal time. Life was never so well worth the living." He regretted that his years were not before instead of behind him. In all his work he had the same energy, faith, and sincerity which marked him as a preacher.

In conclusion, the speaker referred to the wonderful harmony which had existed between pastor and people all through Dr. Briggs's long ministry, and the influence which the life of the late pastor was now exerting and would continue to exert in the future.—Boston Herald.

Spiritual Life.

The use of trials and temptations is to lead us to see our own helplessness, our dependence upon the Lord, and to make us willing to go to him for guidance and safety. Chauncy Giles.

The everlasting arm! I think of that whenever rest is sweet. How the whole earth and the strength of it—that is, almightiness—is beneath every tired creature to give it rest, holding us always! No thought of God is closer than that.—Selected.

To find life full, then, of good opportunity in the little kindnesses, daily, unrecorded acts, and to fulfil these in love, is an important part of the true blessedness of life that goes far toward writing it on our hearts that "each day is the best day of the year." The Churchman.

Love is like the diamond,—pure, white. Other graces shine like the precious stones of nature, each with its own hue of brilliance, the diamond uniting all colors with one beautiful and simple white. Love uniting all graces is "the fulfilling of the law," the beauty of holiness, "the image of God." The Standard.

More divine life is distilled into the soul by good deeds than is distilled by learning. Franklin says, "I have always set greater value on the character of the doer of good than on any other kind of reputation." It was meat and drink of Christ to do the will of God.—W. M. Bicknell.

So long as sorrow and death cross the threshold of the home, so long as mutual love seeks holy union, so long as sweet childhood is dedicated to a "life of love and service," and the soul in its diviner moments hungers for truth, so long the church, tolerant, positive, reverent, helpful, has its indispensable place in our social economy. He who wilfully neglects it neglects in that degree his own best life.—W.

The process of character-formation goes on through the action and interaction of many forces. The totality of a life, at any moment, is the product mainly of little things. Trifling choices, insignificant exercises of will, unimportant acts often repeated, things seemingly of small account,—these are the thousand tiny sculptors that are carving away constantly at the rude block of life, giving it shape and feature.—Philip Stafford Moxom.

Show me the sublime presence of the highest spiritual cause lurking, as always it does lurk, in these suburbs and extremities of nature; let me see every trifle bristling with a polarity that arranges itself instantly on the eternal law; and the shop, the plough, and the ledger, referred to the like cause by which light undulates and poets sing,—and the world lies no longer a dull miscellany and lumber room, but has form and order. There is no trifle, there is no puzzle, but one design unites and animates the farthest pinnacle and the lowest trench.—Emerson.

For Cleaning Silver

there are many articles, a few good, many bad—and but one best; that is

SILVER
ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH

Nearly a million housekeepers who use it say it's best; once tried, you'll so decide.

Trial quantity for the asking or box post-paid, 15 cts. It's sold everywhere.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York

GLENWOOD
RANGES AND HEATERS

MAKE HOUSEKEEPING
EASY.

TWO GOLD MEDALS.

Made by WEIR STOVE CO., Taunton, Mass.

Important Works.

The Evolution of Christianity. By M. J. SAVAGE. 178 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Old World Religion; Judaism and its Hopes; Conditions when Christianity was born; Jesus and What he attempted; The Influence of the Christ Idea; The First Church and Paul; The Problem of the Trinity; The Church of Rome; Growth away from Jesus; The Protestant Revolution; Science and the Church; Free Christianity.

"One would seek in vain for a more enlightened application of the scientific method to the history of religion; and one can believe that, if close reasoning and rational faith could convert, Mr. Savage's words might bear a message to those who are without the churches and within. One reads with pleasure and confidence and hopefulness, and finds the end come all too quickly."—Boston Times.

Vexed Questions in Theology. A Series of Essays. By JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE. 250 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

The remarkable faculty possessed by James Freeman Clarke for presenting difficult problems in a simple way—clearing away all non-essentials, and having the heart of the subject stand out vividly and helpfully—is nowhere better seen than in the present volume. For any earnest seeker after the more reasonable thought of God, duty, life, religion, the book has very much of help.

Sermons for the Church. Twenty-five Discourses by CALEB DAVIS BRADLEE, D.D. Cloth, gilt top, 275 pages, $1.25.

They have for their object the dissemination of pure religion rather than sectarian beliefs. They are strong and honest.—Boston Times.

A Living Faith. By GEO. S. MERIAM. 300 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

The Way of Life. By GEO. S. MERIAM. 206 pages. Cloth, gilt top, $1.00.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

SOCIAL TOPICS.

Problems in American Society. By JOSEPH HENRY CROOKER. [Some Social Studies.] 294 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

I. The Student in American Life; II. Scientific Charity; III. The Root of the Temperance Problem; IV. The Political Conscience; V. Moral and Religious Instruction in our Public Schools; VI. The Religious Destitution of Villages.

"Out of all the confusion of current theory, fanatical bitterness and shallow arrogance, comes now and then a calm and considerate work, treating burning questions with catholic liberality, really helpful to the seeker for wisdom, and giving hint of the survival we shall find when all this clamor and fermentation is over. Such a work is 'Problems in American Society.'"—Detroit Free Press.

Social Equilibrium, and Other Problems, Ethical and Religious. By Rev. GEORGE BATCHELOR. 286 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

The capacity for broad sight, the calmness of the judicial mind, the earnestness of the prophet, the sympathy of the humanitarian, ought certainly, when combined, to produce something of value in the way of the solution of tangled problems, whether social or religious. In this book we find manifested this broad sight, this calmness, this earnestness, and this sympathy; and in their product we are not disappointed, but inspired and helped.

Social Problems. By M. J. SAVAGE. 189 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

Preliminary: Religion for this World; The Social Dream; Social Beginnings; Social Achievement; Social Barriers; The Rise of the Individual; Socialism; Social Responsibility; What is at Present Possible? Common School Education; Poverty, Personal and National; The Diminution of Evils.

Man, Woman and Child. By M. J. SAVAGE. 200 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: The Man; The Woman; The Evolution of Marriage; Marriage To-day; The Child; The Home; Society; Celibacy; Divorce; Woman's Sphere; Careers for our Daughters; The Transfiguration of Humanity.

How we made a Nine-cent Dinner. Explained in Full, with some other Economies. By Mrs. E. S. TURNER, the New Century Cooking School of Philadelphia. Paper, 10 cts.

Coffee Houses and Coffee Palaces in England. Compiled by JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE from English pamphlets. Paper, 20 cts.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR SEPTEMBER.

The God we Serve. Rev. William M. Brundage, Ph.D.

I can Become but What thou Art. J. M. S.

Col. Ingersoll's Views about the Bible. II. Howard MacQuary.

The Ethical Value of Jesus. John M. Scott.

Richesse Oblige. George W. Cutter, M.D.

Responsibility. Hattie Tyng Griswold.

Prayer. Pastor Quiet.

The Religion of Jesus as a Creed.

Night. William Brunton.

The Ministry. Rev. John Page Hopps.

The Forward Movement. W. H. Lambelle.

Unitarianism a Rational Hope and Faith.

Ethical Culture and Unitarianism. Harry White.

The Real Redemption. H. Hayes Robbins.

One Upward Look Each Day.

Editorial.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor;

Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; Guilds;

Literary Notes.

Children's Corner.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

*.*Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Register Tract Series.

No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyon. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William E. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. C. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.

No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 17. REFORMS ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT AGREE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 8 cents.

No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.

No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.

No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thom. 60 cents per hundred.

No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.

No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.

141 Franklin Street, Boston.

THE SUFFRAGE REFERENDUM.

ACT OF 1895, ENACTED BY THE MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATURE, JUNE, 1895.

SECTION 1. All persons qualified to vote for school committee shall, at the next State election, have an opportunity to express their opinion by voting yes or no in answer to the following question: Is it expedient that municipal suffrage be granted to women?

SECT. 2. Equal opportunity shall be given to men and women to register prior to said election.

Believing it to be for the best interests of the Commonwealth that men and women should share equally the responsibilities of its government, we hereby urge the women of Massachusetts to respond to the invitation of the legislature, as set forth in the act of 1895, by registering and voting in favor of municipal suffrage for women.

And we ask all legal voters to consider seriously that, while Massachusetts is now governed by an aristocracy based strictly on sex, it is possible, by voting in the affirmative under this law, to insure "a government of the [whole] people, by the [whole] people, for the [whole] people."

George F. Hoar, John D. Long, J. Q. A. Brackett, Elisha S. Converse, Samuel May, Albert Clarke, T. W. Higginson, Josiah Quincy, William Lloyd Garrison, Francis J. Garrison, Charles G. Ames, Charles Carleton Coffin, Minot J. Savage, William W. Crapo, William E. Barrett, Henry B. Blackwell, Thomas Riley, W. W. Doherty, Edwin D. Mead, George S. Hale, Joseph E. Fiske, E. A. Hall, George A. O. Ernst, William I. Bowditch, Philip S. Moxom, Henry H. Faxon, Alfred S. Roe, Sara C. Bull, Julia Ward Howe, Mary A. Livermore, Ednah D. Cheney, Judith W. Smith, Alice Stone Blackwell, Eliza R. Whiting, Helen M. Winslow, Mary Q. Kinsman, Clare H. Burleigh, Fanny B. Ames, Ellen Hayes, Sarah H. Southwick, Mary C. Sawyer, Susan S. Fessenden, Lettie S. Bigelow, Eliza Trask Hill, Emeline Doane Whipple, Electa N. Walton, Abby E. Davis, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps Ward, Mary H. Taylor, Lucy Newhall Sawyer, Mary Clarke Smith, Anna Gardner, Anne Whitney, Ada C. Bowles.

JOSIAH O. LOW.

On September 16 another strong, earnest, devoted member of our household of faith was called up higher. For many months, at his quiet, beautiful home at Newport, Mr. Low has been slowly, gently, declining in bodily strength, although his reason and judgment, his faith and hope and love, were wonderfully sustained to the last. He was born in Salem, Mass., in 1821, the son of Seth Low and Mary Porter, who were among the most prominent and respected persons of that place. Josiah was for many years associated as partner with his brother Abiel in the well-known importing firm of A. A. Low & Brothers of Brooklyn, N.Y., who were leading merchants with China and the East Indies.

Both were deeply interested in and earnest supporters of the First Unitarian Society in Brooklyn; and, when the beautiful Channing Memorial Church was erected at Newport, they not only contributed most generously of their means, but gave their strong personal influence to the success of that worthy enterprise. Josiah survived his brother by two years. Inheriting the sterling qualities of his ancestors, he was himself a superior man marked by unusual force of character. He possessed a cultured mind stored with useful knowledge, matured and enriched by long and varied experience and by wide observation of life and manners. As a man of affairs, he was sincerely respected for his clear, sound judgment, his liberality of sentiment, his unwearied industry, and inflexible integrity. His impulses were all generous, his principles those of scrupulous honor and justice. In religious concerns he was devoted to the highest aims of liberal Christianity, insisting upon a reasonable faith and the practical application of that faith to the simplest duties of daily life. He believed that "religion is life, and the life of religion is to do good." His personal trust in the goodness and mercy of a heavenly Father was not merely a verbal creed, but a happy part of his daily experience. By this trust he was strengthened and sustained through the many tasks and trials of his long, active life, and also cheered and comforted in the hours of weariness and days of suffering and suspense which came upon him as the earthly pilgrimage drew toward its close. With remarkable patience, fortitude, and resignation, he waited for the final change, perfectly assured that, whether here or there, "in the body or out of the body," nothing could separate him from the love of God. Those who knew him best will long cherish the memory of a brave, consistent, conscientious man, of unfeigned piety, fixed in his religious convictions, just and generous to all, and humbly striving as best he might to put in practice the simplest rules of Christian duty.

G. W. C.

Education.

OLD SOUTH LEAFLETS ON PURITANISM. Seven new leaflets have just been added to the Old South series, all relating to "English Puritanism and the Commonwealth." They are numbered 58 to 64, and are as follows: No. 58, "Hooper's Letters to Bullinger"; 59, "Sir John Eliot's 'Apology for Socrates'"; 60, "Ship-money Papers"; 61, "Pym's Speech against Strafford"; 62, "Cromwell's Second Speech"; 63, "Milton's 'Free Commonwealth'"; 64, "Sir Henry Vane's Defence." There are many earlier leaflets in the series relating to the same period, including "Vane's 'Healing Question,'" "The Petition of Rights," "The Grand Remonstrance," "The Scottish National Covenant," "The Agreement of the People," "The Instrument of Government," and "Cromwell's First Speech." With these Old South leaflets, which are sold for five cents a copy, just enough to cover their cost, our students can come into immediate touch with the men of the English Commonwealth, and the great scenes in which they acted. These men and events were as truly a part of American as of English history, as it has been a main object of the "Old South Lectures" of the present year, on "The Puritans in Old England," to point out. It is pleasant to know that these leaflets are coming into general use in the schools, and being circulated throughout the country. Their publication in this cheap form is one of the best features of Mrs. Hemenway's noble benefaction.—Directors of the Old South Work, Old South Meeting-house, Boston.

Here and There.

Michigan is entering the lists as a peach-growing State. Orchards are being formed of 500, 1,000, and even 10,000 trees.

In this country alone the sales of bicycles for this year are estimated at half a million. The total number of bicycles in use is estimated at a million.

It is said that, of the three thousand visitors to the National Yellowstone Park during the last three years, hardly one hundred were Americans. Probably more Americans have climbed the Alps than have visited the Yosemite Valley.

In Greece, excavations will be shortly resumed at Eleusis, and researches will be made in the prehistoric tombs at Cephalonia. At Delphi the French will soon begin work again, as they have received from their government a sum of 150,000 francs for the purpose.

Every Paris school has its "canteen," where free meals are given to the children who cannot pay, while those who are better off pay in part or in full. Each child brings his clean napkin, his little bottle of vin ordinaire, and sometimes fruit or a bit of cheese for dessert. The cooking is usually done by the janitor, and the meals are served at little tables in the play-room. The cost of the portions, generally stews of meat and vegetables, is about two cents for each child.

Some conception of the constant danger to the public health of New York may be had by reading the last quarterly report of the Board of Health. The sanitary inspectors, who are kept more steadily at work now than ever before since the organization of the Department of Health, in addition to their other labor, destroyed 600,000 pounds of vegetables unfit for food, 300,000 pounds of meat, 13,000 pounds of fish, and 50,000 pounds of confectionery, so called,—the poisoned sugar stuff sold to children at the penny shops all over town.

Walter Baker & Co. Limited,
The Largest Manufacturers of
PURE, HIGH GRADE
COCOAS and CHOCOLATES
On this Continent, have received
HIGHEST AWARDS
from the great
Industrial and Food
EXPOSITIONS
IN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

Caution: In view of the many imitations of the labels and wrappers on our goods, consumers should make sure that our place of manufacture, namely, Dorchester, Mass. is printed on each package.

SOLD BY GROCERS EVERYWHERE.
WALTER BAKER & CO. LTD. DORCHESTER, MASS.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Spring No. 1.—For Dyspepsia, Female Complaints, Malarial Poisoning, Tonic Properties, Etc., Etc.

The late Dr. Thomas P. Atkinson, ex-president Medical Society of Va.

"For more than fifty years I have been a great sufferer from that Protean disease (Dyspepsia), to find relief from which I have made many visits to nearly all of the mineral Springs in Virginia—including the Allegheny, the Montgomery White, Coyners, the Yellow Sulphur, the Greenbrier White Sulphur, the Old and the Red Sweet Springs, the Salt Sulphur, the Hot and Warm Springs. I have also tested the virtues of the Ballston, the Saratoga and the Lebanon Springs in the State of New York, and I can say with confidence that I derived more benefit from the water of the BUFFALO Springs, in the county of Mecklenburg, Va., than from any and all of the others. It is invaluable in many of the affections peculiar to women, in Chills and Fevers, and all diseases originating under Malarial influences. The most valuable properties of this Water are those of an alterative and a tonic character; it is powerfully diaphoretic and diuretic; indeed, it affects all of the secretions, but its crowning glory is that it is the best tonic in all the land. To a person debilitated by the long and imprudent use of medicine (and there are many such) or by the disease or by overwork (and in this category, too, there are many sufferers), it has no equal in all the range of medicines of which I have any knowledge."

Dr. John H. Tucker, Henderson, N. C., President of the Medical Society of North Carolina.

"The action of the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER decided Nerve Tonic. Nervous Dyspepsia, with its train of distressing symptoms, is promptly and permanently relieved by it. In many of the diseases peculiar to women I prescribe this water with almost the same confidence that I do quinine in Chills and Fever.

"I have observed marked beneficial results from its use in the disorders of teething infants. I have sent many patients of this class to the Springs for the use of this water, and without exception, they have returned to be cured or greatly benefited."

This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

Thomas F. Goode, Proprietor, Buffalo Lithia Springs, Va.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.

ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

ATLANTA EXPOSITION

Parties will leave BOSTON for ATLANTA October 2, 8, 14, 16, 22, 28, and 30; November 5, 11, 13, 19, 25, and 27; and December 3, 9, 11, and 17.

Visits to Chattanooga, Lookout Mountain, Washington, etc. An entire week in Atlanta, with headquarters at the Kimball House, Warren Leland, Jr., manager. A Choice of Routes.

Autumn Tour to Southern California Oct. 22. Other Tours to California Nov. 19, Dec. 10, Jan. 7, Jan. 23, Feb. 11, and Feb. 13.

Tours to Mexico in January and February. Tours to Europe in January, February, March, etc.

Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines; also Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular trip desired. (Special circular for Atlanta tours.)

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,
296 Washington Street (opposite School St.), Boston.

Literary Lectures

—FOR—

UNITY CLUBS, WOMEN'S ALLIANCES, Etc.

By Rev. GEO. H. YOUNG

—ON—

Louisa Alcott. Charlotte Bronte.
George Eliot. Jane Welsh Carlyle.
Dorothea Dix. Margaret Fuller.
E. B. Browning. Jane Austen.
Alice and Phoebe Cary.

For circulars and terms address
LAWRENCE, MASS.

Series of attractive lectures.—Lawrence American.
Delightful lectures.—Lawrence Eagle.
Large and select audience gathered to enjoy the literary treat offered. Mr. Young is a very interesting speaker, and held the attention of his audience closely. All who listened to this lecture will be anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity offered for the remainder of the course.—Portsmouth Times.

"Unity Pulpit"

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season.

Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery.

Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents.

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

Spiritual Life.

In Spirit and in Truth. Essays by Younger Ministers of the Unitarian Church. 163 pages. Cloth, $1.00.

CONTENTS: Introduction, by Rev. JAMES DE NORMAN-DIE; The Philosophy of Religion, by Rev. GEORGE CROSWELL CRESSSET; The Revelation of God in Nature, by Rev. L. D. COCHRANE; The Bible as Literature and as Revelation, by Rev. W. W. FENN; The Thought of God in the Bible, by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE; The Revelation of God in Man, by Rev. S. M. CROTHERS; The Christ, by Rev. ALBERT WALKLEY; The Use of a Liturgy in Worship, by Rev. JOHN TUNIS.

A Year of Miracle: A Poem in Four Sermons. By Rev. WM. C. GANNETT. 106 pages. Cloth, limp, red edges, 50 cents. Fine edition, bevelled edges, full gilt, heavy paper, $1.00.

"A dainty little book, full of delicate fragrance. Love of nature is in it, and a longing to interpret that secret of nature's power over the soul which no man has yet understood. There is devotion in it, too, and neither clashes with the other."—Critic.

The Insight of Faith. Brief Selected Paragraphs from the Writings of Rev. HENRY W. FOOTE. 115 pages. Flexible cloth, 50 cents. Morocco, full gilt, $1.50.

"Rarely does one find a little volume so full of helpful and precious words. Devotional in spirit and uplifting in aim."—Christian Inquirer.

Ecce Spiritus. A Statement of the Spiritual Principle of Jesus as the Law of Life. 238 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

"Nothing more remarkable has appeared since 'Ecce Homo.' It is as ingenious and original as that famous book, and far more subtle, inward, and spiritual."—St. Louis Spectator.

For sale by all Booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

25. EVOLUTION OF ARMS AND ARMOR: The struggle for existence; Nature's methods; individualism and co-operation; final universal peace. By JOHN C. KIMBALL.

26. EVOLUTION OF THE MECHANIC ARTS: Development of the human hand; earliest use of implements and tools; inventions; the laboring classes. By JAMES A. SKILTON.

27. EVOLUTION OF THE WAGES SYSTEM. The definition of wages; economic characteristics of the wages system; wages the outgrowth of slavery; development of the system. By PROF. GEORGE GUNTON.

28. EDUCATION AS A FACTOR IN CIVILIZATION: Early methods in Egypt, Persia, China, Greece, and Rome; early Christian ideas of education; Catholic and Protestant views; the common-school system. By MISS CAROLINE B. LE ROW.

29. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. I. The Theological Method. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.

30. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. II. The Socialistic Method. By WILLIAM POTTS.

31. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. III. The Anarchistic Method. By HUGH O. PENTECOST.

32. EVOLUTION AND SOCIAL REFORM. IV. The Scientific Method. By DANIEL GREEN-LEAF THOMPSON.

33. ASA GRAY: His life and work. By MRS. MARY TREAT.

34. EDWARD LIVINGSTON YOUNG. The Man and his work. By PROF. JOHN FISKE.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Pleasantries.

He was fond of singing revival hymns; and his wife named the baby Fort, so that he would want to hold it.—Our Dumb Animals.

Boy: "I want to buy some paper." Dealer: "What kind of paper?" "I guess you better give me fly-paper. I want to make a kite."—Philadelphia Record.

A teacher requested each scholar to write a sentence containing the word "toward." One boy of nine years wrote, "I toared my pants!"—Youth's Companion.

"Can you give me any good reason for these impressionist pictures?" She: "Yes, indeed: they can be hung either side up with equally good effect."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

Old Lady (to motorman on trolley car): "Ain't you afraid of the electricity, Mr. Motorman?" Motorman: "No, ma'am, I ain't got no call to be afraid. I ain't a conductor."—Philadelphia Record.

Mrs. Teechum: "That small engine pounding away in the corner, Toby, is called a donkey-engine." Toby: "And yet the engineer says it works with a four-horse-power. That's funny, isn't it?"—Harper's Round Table.

A little boy asked at the dinner-table one day, "What is chilli sauce?" Little Mary, his sister, who had just begun to read, answered as grave as a judge, "It's the sauce that chills, but not mebrates."—Youth's Companion.

Bessie was just finishing her breakfast as papa stooped to kiss her before going down town. The little one gravely took up her napkin and wiped her cheek. "What, Bessie," said her father, "wiping away papa's kiss?" "Oh, no," said she, looking up with a sweet smile, "I'm wubbing it in."—Zion's Herald.

The story is told that a woman had a very fashionable silk waist made, which she sent to her sister in a little Western Kansas town. She received in reply a letter of thanks, in which the sister said that she found the sleeves much larger than her thin arms needed, and had cut them over, getting enough out to make her five-year-old girl a dress. "You must have thought I had awful fat arms," the sister out West wrote. Zion's Herald.

A tourist was being driven over a part of the country in Ireland where his infernal majesty appeared to have given his name to all the objects of interest in the locality; for there was the Devil's Bridge, the Devil's Cauldron, the Devil's Glen, etc. Said the traveller, "The devil seems to be the greatest land-owner in these parts!" "Ah! sure, your honor," replied the jarvey, "that is so; but he lives in England. I think he's what they call the absentee landlord in Ireland."—London Gentlewoman.

"Borde never visits us now," said Mr. Tyrer. "It's more than two months since he was in the house." "Yes," answered Mrs. Tyrer, "it's rather singular, certainly." "It is—very singular. The last time he was here I did my very best to be entertaining. I sat with him two solid hours relating to him the smart sayings of our children; and you helped to entertain him, too." "Yes, I showed him the baby and told him all about her cute ways, and even tried to get her to talk to him. Don't you remember?" "Yes," said Mr. Tyrer. "I can't understand why he keeps away."—New York Press.

The season had been an exceptionally bad one for farmers; but in a country church not one hundred miles from Arbroath the office-bearers had resolved, according to custom, to hold the annual harvest thanksgiving service. It was noticed that on that particular Sunday Mr. Johnstone, a regular attender and a pillar of the church (whose crops had turned out very poor), was not in attendance. The minister, in the course of the following week, met Mr. Johnstone, and inquired of him the reason for his absence from church on such an important occasion. "Weel, sir," replied Mr. Johnstone, "I didna care aboot approachin' my Maker in a speerit o' sarcasm."—Scottish-American.

A story is told by one of Lord Zetland's party, who were making inquiries into the condition of a distressed district. They were crossing a lake. A gale was blowing, and waves were dashing over the boat. The gentleman referred to had been assured that an Irish peasant, if treated well, will always agree with what is said to him rather than appear disagreeable. It struck the gentleman that here was a good chance to put the assertion to the proof. "There is very little wind, Pat," he said to one of the boatmen. The answer came through the howling elements, "Very little, indade, your honor; but fhwat there is is moighty sthrong."—Youth's Companion.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Ladies Travelling Alone to Boston

WILL FIND THE

HOTEL BELLEVUE

A quiet hotel, with a café of rare excellence. Located on Beacon Hill, near the State House, and convenient to all the large stores and places of amusement. Adjoining American Unitarian Association Building, BEACON STREET, BOSTON, EUROPEAN PLAN, J. W. SMITH, Proprietor.

THE JACKSON SANATORIUM

DANVILLE, New York

Established in 1858.

A delightful home for health and rest seekers. Personal care of experienced physicians. Main building fire-proof. For illustrated pamphlet address J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Sec., P.O. Box 1873.

In connection with our wholesale business, we are accustomed to sell

CHURCH CARPETS

at manufacturers' prices.

John H. Pray, Sons & Co.,

Wholesale and Retail CARPETS and UPHOLSTERY, 658 Washington St. (opp. Boylston), Boston. Correspondence Solicited.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin.

BLAKE BELL CO., Boston, Mass.

BROWN BROTHERS & CO.

50 State Street, Boston.

Travellers' Letters of Credit.

Sterling, French and German Exchange.

Brown, Shipley & Co., London.

NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

POST-OFFICE SQUARE, BOSTON, MASS.

ASSETS, Dec. 31, 1894.....$24,252,828.71
LIABILITIES.....22,217,399.94
$2,035,428.77

BENJ. F. STEVENS, President.
ALFRED D. FOSTER, Vice-Pres.
S. F. TRULL, Secretary.
WM. B. TURNER, Asst. Sec'y.

LIFE RATE ENDOWMENT policies are issued at the old life rate premium.—Annual Cash distributions are paid upon all policies.—Every policy has insured thereon the cash surrender and paid-up insurance values to which the insured is entitled by the Massachusetts Statute.—Pamphlets, rates, and values for any age sent on application to the Company's Office.

TO LET. The desirable house, 118 Highland Street, Roxbury; 11,000 feet of land; beautiful location; Norfolk House cars now run near. S. G. DAVIS, 113 Devonshire Street.

The MAGEE RANGES ARE THE BEST

Examine the patent OVEN THERMOMETER. Pronounced by ALL COOKS to be the GREATEST IMPROVEMENT of modern times.

No one can afford to keep house without a Magee Range and Furnace, because the saving in fuel and food will pay many times their cost over any others on the market.

The name MAGEE carries our Guarantee of PERFECT SATISFACTION with proper use.

Descriptive Circulars Free.

FOR SALE BY LEADING DEALERS EVERYWHERE.

MAGEE FURNACE COMPANY, Boston. New York. Chicago.

Education.

The oldest high-class educational magazine in the country ($3 per year) is read by thoughtful people of all classes, as well as educators. It ought to be in every Library and Reading-room in the land. Is it in yours? From a new subscriber we will accept $2 for the first year. Send 12 cents (in stamps) for a sample copy.

Nova Scotia Tours. The associate editor of Education offers again this year several delightful personally conducted tours to Evangeline's land. Select companies of cultured people. No heat, romantic scenery. An ideal vacation. First party, June 25. Shad, salmon, and strawberries in their prime. Expenses low. Write for particulars.

KASSON & PALMER,

50 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass.

Mr. HALE'S SCHOOL 86 BEACON ST., BOSTON.

The 13th year will begin September 25. Preparation for Harvard College and the Institute of Technology. Full Classical and Scientific Courses. Primary department for young boys nine or ten years of age. Fine situation, directly opposite the Public Garden. Large, sunny, high-studded rooms, open fireplaces, gymnasium, extensive laboratories, covered fire-escape, lunch-room. Teachers: ALBERT HALE (Harv.), E. D. MARSH (Harv.), E. K. STEVENS (Harv.), C. S. STREET, Amherst. Address ALBERT HALE.

SCHOOL OF DOMESTIC SCIENCE AND CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

Courses for Teachers, Matrons, Home-makers, City Missionaries, Pastors' Assistants, Y. W. C. A. Secretaries, etc. Eighth year. Address for Circulars,

Miss L. L. SHERMAN, Principal
(Formerly Principal D. L. Moody's Training School), 52 Berkeley St., Boston, Mass. (B. Y. W. C. A.)

THE JACOTOT SCHOOL.

A French and English Boarding and Day School for Girls.

No 11 West 86 St., New York.
Adjacent to Central Park. Mlle. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals. Circulars on application.

West Newton English and Classical School. ALLEN BROTHERS.

Family School. Both Sexes. Unsectarian. Prepares for College, Scientific Schools, Business, and for a useful life. Forty-third year begins Wednesday, September 18. Catalogue of ALLEN BROTHERS, WEST NEWTON, MASS.

THE MORGAN SCHOOL, PORTSMOUTH, N.H.

This Home and Day School for Girls will reopen September 25 for its second year under the new management. College, Preparatory, and Finishing Courses. Address for circular Miss GEORGINA S. WOODBURY, Principal.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.
SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

MAGNOLIA TERRACE Springfield, Mass.
Home and Day School for Girls. JOHN McDUFFIE, Ph.D.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

In the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y. MRS. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2. A few boarding pupils taken.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D. REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION

for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods; large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. R. W., Christian Register.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1895.

NUMBER 40.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; The Preacher and his Place,	625
The Destruction of the Poor: An Ecclesiastical Filter; The Liberal Movement,	626
MUSINGS.	627
BREVITIES.	627
PRO AND CON.
Improving Church Surroundings; What is the Matter?	627
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
The Day they Celebrate, by Courtenay Guild; Our College Medievalism, by Rev. E. P. Powell; From Italy, by Rev. Silas Farrington.	628
New York Letter; The American Unitarian Association,	629
Conference Notes,	630
National Conference Delegates,	631
A Catechism of Liberal Faith, by Rev. Charles F. Dole,	632
Sunday-school Magnetism, by G. E. Littlefield,	633
Rev. George W. Briggs, D.D.,	638
Mrs. Lucy P. Thaxter; The Suffrage "Referendum,"	639
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	630
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	630
THE PULPIT.
Loving God through Human Love, by Rev. Heman P. De Forest, D.D.,	632
LITERATURE.
"The Life and Teachings of Jesus"; Other Book Notices,	634
School Books; Miscellaneous; Books Received,	635
THE HOME.
Polly's Minutes; Stories by Grandma; How Susie solved the Problem,	636
French; Odd Friends; Great Men's Cats; Where the Day is born; Some Strange Visiting-cards,	637
POETRY.
The Victim of a Word, by Hattie Tyng Griswold,	628
Life's Last Sleep, by Mary Handerson Ela,	632
A Song for Every Day,	636
Solidarity,	638
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	638
EDUCATION,	638
HERE AND THERE,	639
PLEASANTRIES,	640

SPECIMEN COPIES of the Christian Register will be sent free for four weeks to any one wishing to examine it. Application should be made with address in full to

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Editorial.

WOMEN are taking more and more an active part in the life of Greece. As a result of long Turkish domination, they have been much excluded from many lines of industry which have been open to women in Europe and this country. But they are also beginning to make their influence felt in political directions. It is customary at each election in Greece to have representatives of the different political parties at the polls. The women who are agitating for political rights had representatives at the polls at the last election for deputies. The government has now said that women must not be present. The women protest, and declare that they will be present at the next election, which occurs in about a month. In the last election the women printed many tracts and held meetings, and the editor of a Greek paper estimates that one-third of the chamber was elected by their influence.

THE provisional programme of the Greek Olympian games to be held next spring at Athens has just been issued in the Greek papers, giving an outline of the various contests and the conditions prescribed. The games begin April 6, 1896, and last for three weeks. They comprise contests in running, leaping, wrestling, lifting, exercises with rings and ropes, throwing the discus, horse races, and various other athletic games. The running contests will range from one hundred to fifteen hundred metres. But one race, from Marathon to Athens, will be 42,000 metres long. All these races, except those from Marathon to Athens, will take place in the great Panathenaic stadion in Athens. This stadion has been made on or near the site of the ancient stadion of the city; but it has been vastly enlarged, so as to contain 70,000 spectators. It has cost 800,000 drachmas,—about $114,000. This amount was given by a wealthy Greek of Epirus, Mr. George Evaros, who made most of his money in Egypt, and is reputed to be worth $13,000,000. The first three rows of seats in the stadion are marble from Mt. Pentelicus, which still continues, as in the days of Pericles, to yield its treasures. The course from Marathon to Athens will be in imitation of the ancient runners who brought to Athens the news of the victory at Marathon. There will also be modern games, such as football, cricket, tennis, bicycle races, and aquatic sports. The French Archæological School will celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation. The editors of Athens have formed a reception committee for foreign correspondents. An appropriate and interesting feature, recalling the great part Greece has had in the development of the drama and the immortal plays rendered at Athens, will be a succession of modern plays rendered by some of the best actors of Europe.

It is perhaps too early to decide upon the permanent value of the services which Pasteur has rendered to science and humanity. He has been the pioneer in new departments of study. With remarkable industry and enthusiasm, he has labored to out-general and defeat the armies of bacteria which threaten animal and vegetable life. Applying his attention to the protection of the silk industry in France from the contagious diseases which threatened it, his discoveries, at first disputed, were finally rewarded with recognition and gratitude. His experiments with diseases of cattle had a similar result, and finally the world was excited by the announcement of a discovery for the cure of hydrophobia. The result in this case is less certain than with his earlier discoveries; and, though it has gained him a wider fame, it is probably less important, since hydrophobia is not a common disease and it is by no means certain that those who were treated by his method would have died without it. But, whatever may be the final verdict on his latest discoveries, his services in a new and difficult department of science must be gratefully recognized.

THE triennial convention of the Episcopal Church begins this week at Minneapolis. It is a national gathering, all the dioceses in the country being represented. The questions which come before it are of more interest to the Episcopalian body than to the outside world, because they are largely questions of polity and administration. It is proposed to reduce the number of delegates, so that the convention shall be less unwieldy, to call it a synod, and to invest it with greater authority. The subject of changing the name of the denomination from the "Protestant Episcopal Church" to the "Holy Catholic Church," or the "American Church," will doubtless come up. But, as the Episcopal Church is rather a conservative body, it is not likely to make a radical change in its own name, especially by adopting one which is far less suitable than a designation which has become already historic. There are other religious denominations which do not like the names they bear; but it is not easy to change them. The proposition to unite a number of dioceses into a province with a chief bishop to be called a primate seems to be a movement in the direction of priestly ambition. But it is not likely, on the other hand, that the powers of the laity who have representation in the triennial convention will be abridged.

THE Churchman is provoked. It is not a dissenter which has provoked it, but one of its own household of faith. It is very "provoking," it says, in a somewhat petulant mood, that Canon Freemantle at the Grindelwald Conference should have expressed an opinion in favor of an exchange of pulpits between Episcopalians and ministers of other denominations. Thereupon it reads to the canon a lecture on the historic episcopate, which, so far as Canon Freemantle is concerned, is all thrown away. He is not likely to give up his large view of the apostolic succession for the small one which the Churchman represents. The attitude of the Churchman on this matter illustrates the evils of the doctrine it defends. A prelatical error, an aristocratic claim to a patent right on ministerial ordination, is used as a barrier to Christian fellowship. We do not believe that there is any great desire on the part of ministers of other denominations to preach in Episcopalian pulpits,—certainly, not unless Episcopalians would like to have them, as undoubtedly a good many would. What they protest against is having a spurious claim set up as if it were an essential element of Christianity, when, in fact, like the close communion of the Baptists,—another barrier to Christian fellowship,—it has nothing to do with the Golden Rule, the Sermon on the Mount, or the Eleventh Commandment, and, if judged by these, would be set aside as a survival of the caste spirit of paganism, not the holy brotherhood of Christianity.

A WOMAN was lately detected by custom-house officials in trying to smuggle lace between the leaves of her Bible. She seemed to act on the presumption that her piety would carry her through. But, strangely enough, the custom-house officer was kindled by her devout spirit, and wished to read the Bible also. We are not told whether he turned to the story of Zaccheus or the story of Matthew, who was sitting at the receipt of custom; but he found the lace somewhere between Genesis and Revelation. This is by no means the first time that things have been put into the Bible that did not belong there, with the view of smuggling them into Christianity. Thus the doctrine of the historic episcopate, to which we have just alluded, and the doctrine of close communion, are not found in the Bible. They have been read into it. It is so likewise with the doctrine of infant baptism and the doctrine of the trinity. They are interpolations quite as much as the lace which the pious woman hid between the lids of her Bible. To be sure, when they have once been put in, they may be found there; but they do not belong to the book itself. They are not a part of its tissue: they are contradictory to its spirit; and it has cost the Church altogether too much to read them in and then to read them out again.

IN a recent interview Prof. Bruce of Scotland said that such a change had gone on in Scotland that such a case as that of the trial of Prof. Robertson Smith, which occurred there some twelve or fifteen years ago, would not occur now. The change that has gone on in Scotland is certainly significant. Professors are now holding positions in Presbyterian and Congregational colleges in Scotland and England which they could not have held fifteen or twenty years ago. The Chicago Standard (Baptist) notes a "growing conviction of the fact that trial for 'heresy' is a thing quite out of date. An attempt to control inquiry in processes of ecclesiastical discipline is equivalent to an attempt to control the spirit of the age itself. It is an age of inquiry,—of inquiry to whose research nothing is to be assumed as forbidden. Whatever it is given man to know, it is also given him to inquire into, with a view to reach conclusions which rest in the witness of his own understanding, and not to be taken entirely on trust."

ON the other hand, Dr. Morris at Lane Theological Seminary, in an address to the students at the beginning of the term, made it clear that there was a great need of the development of Christian catholicity in this country: "That the broad, calm, generous, hopeful catholicity I have described is not, as much as it ought to be, a dominant characteristic of the times we are living in, will be confessed by careful observers. I do not refer to this lack, as it is painfully manifest in the political or the social sphere: I refer to it only in these relations with which we, as present or prospective ministers of Christ, are specially concerned. Is there not on one side too much of dogmatism in our theological atmosphere? Are there not some Christian men about us too much concerned about minute differences in doctrinal statement, ignoring too much, meanwhile, the great underlying principles of doctrine in which these differences find their proper harmony? Are they not too ready to suspect the essential Orthodoxy of those who may disagree with their particular opinions, and to discredit intelligence, disparage reasonings, impugn motives, and even challenge evangelical standing on this account? And is not the rigid arm of ecclesiastical authority invoked too often to repress differences, to stamp aberration with the seal of judicial disapproval, and even to exclude from fellowship those who find themselves conscientiously unable to accept this or that ecclesiastical doctrine?" Lane Seminary, like Union Seminary of New York, have both been victims of the spirit which Dr. Morris criticises.

THE PREACHER AND HIS PLACE.

It seemed, perhaps, after Henry Ward Beecher, Phillips Brooks, and a few others had filled the Lyman Beecher Lectureship on Preaching at Yale University, that there was little or nothing more to be said, and that students might as well be referred to the printed volumes in which these lectures were preserved. But let any one take up the volume entitled "The Preacher and his Place," by Rev. Dr. David H. Greer, rector of St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, just issued by Charles Scribner's Sons, and he will wisely conclude that these lectures could not be well spared from the series. He will probably be content with no such negative appreciation, for the truth is that they make a substantial addition to what has already been said. This addition is not so much in the way of new material, new thought, new methods, or new experience: it is rather the addition of new life. There is no fear of the Lyman Beecher Lectureship becoming a dry and sandy waste of iteration so long as the faculty succeed in getting born preachers to fill it. A good fountain is something that everybody likes to see. It matters not that we have seen a hundred other fountains before, and that they were fed from the same source: we like to see the beauty, power, and life of the living stream. Every true preacher is himself a fountain. We like the living stream of utterance, especially when it is not merely a torrent of words or a roar of lungs, but a fresh, clear stream of thought, moved by some mighty impulse which gives it elevation. It may or may not sparkle in the sun, it may or may not be colored with electric light: it is the living water, the manifestation of power that attracts us. Dr. Greer has himself this life, freshness, lucidity, and force; and therefore his book is thoroughly alive. He was strongly tempted to recast these lectures in preparing them for print. We are glad he overcame the temptation of the evil one,—the devil of dilettanteism. The danger is that the living stream would have been cast into cold blocks of artificial ice. That is always the probability when one attempts to revise with a cold hand the thought which was poured out at a melting heat. Taken just as they are, one may miss the living voice of the preacher; but one cannot miss the living thought. Dr. Greer speaks with no unnatural fervor, with no rapt, ecstatic vision; but he does speak with intellectual and moral sincerity, with depth of conviction, and with a skill and power of statement which reach the mind as well as the eye or ear.

Much has been written about the change which has taken place in the relation of the Christian minister to the age. After reading this book, we have a fresh conviction that, if the preacher has changed his place, he has not lost it. The true prophet always has and always will have a place. No new instrumentalities of printing-press, telegraph, phonograph, Sunday newspaper, or what not, can supersede the pulpit, so long as there is a man to fill it. The real place of the minister, as set forth in this volume, is just as large, if not larger, than it ever has been. The sphere of the pulpit is only contracted when we have a contracted man in it. The mission of the prophet is essentially the same from age to age; but, doubtless, Jesus, if he spoke to-day, would speak in a living language instead of dead Aramaic. The wise preacher who speaks out-of-doors will, if possible, arrange his pulpit so as to let the breeze of heaven carry his word instead of speaking against it. Otherwise, his message may be inaudible to all except the few who gather around him. Dr. Greer has seen the signs of the times; and, though he is not a time-server, he speaks with the breeze.

His lectures on "The Preacher and the Past" and "The Preacher and the Present" give a broad intellectual and spiritual perspective to the ministerial relation. This is the voice of one speaking with an authority which is not official or magisterial or perfunctory, but such authority as is conveyed in the watercourse, the steam jet, or the electric current,—the authority which lies in all power.

Theological students and young preachers will find special interest in what Dr. Greer has to say about the preacher preparing his message. They will be disappointed if they expect to find any special recipe for a sermon. Indeed, Dr. Greer has little to say about the preparation of a sermon, but a great deal to say about the preparation of a message. The preparation of the message means the preparation of the messenger, the man. Such preparation may be general or may be special; but it is the preparation of life and character. There is always danger that divinity students or young public speakers of any kind may be allured into thinking that there is some magical trick of elocution or method which will win the attention of an audience, like the young man described by Phillips Brooks who attributed a great speaker's power to the use of a certain gesture. With such arts and tricks Dr. Greer has nothing to do. But from his own experience he has, however, wise suggestions to make in regard to method. His own habit is to preach without notes, but it must be remembered that he did not adopt it until after several years of steady practice with the pen. He does not commit his sermons to memory, which indeed has little or no advantage over preaching from manuscript; nor does he speak "extemporaneously," in the dreadful sense in which that word is often used, as a synonyme for the uncombed, unsifted thoughts and impulses of the moment. Every sermon is carefully thought out with a pencil in hand, and many thoughts as they come are noted down; but no notes whatever are taken in the pulpit.

Young students may be encouraged to try Dr. Greer's method; but, if they expect to obtain in any degree his success, they ought to get one sentence of his book by heart: "To prepare to preach without notes is a much more difficult process than to prepare to preach with them." The italics are Dr. Greer's. The young preacher had better write them with capital letters. More dangerous than the pen is the fluent tongue. An intelligent layman recently said, "When our pastor comes into the pulpit without a manuscript, some of his hearers always prepare for a nap." And yet preaching without notes is commonly supposed to be more vivifying and awakening than that with the manuscript. But this layman complained that his pastor simply emitted a smooth stream of words, and it was easy to sleep under the sound of the babbling brook. A dangerous gift of fluency led him to depend on the "inspiration of the moment." "If you adopt the method simply as a makeshift," says Dr. Greer, "and find it easier and less exacting, you will surely fail, as you surely ought to fail."

Not less suggestive and stimulating are the chapters on "The Preacher and the Parish" and "The Preacher making the Most of Himself." Here, as elsewhere, Dr. Greer goes to the fountain-head of inspiration and purpose. His real word to the preacher is to lead a deeper and richer life.

There is no dogmatism in this volume, and no cant, no halting conservatism and no rash iconoclasm. There is a broad, liberal spirit, and an earnestness which shows that liberalism need not be cold.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE POOR.

A book provocative of thought and full of practical suggestions is Dr. A. G. Warner's "American Charities." Dr. Warner has had long and intimate association with the families of the poor in large cities, especially in Baltimore and Washington; and he has made a special study of the causes of poverty. It is, therefore, interesting to see what he considers the chief cause of pauperism. "The destruction of the poor is their poverty," said the old writer; but the modern writer says the destruction of the poor is their ill-health. English, German, and American tables are given, showing specified causes of poverty; and, as the result of a careful investigation, Dr. Warner says: "So far as these tables show, the most constant cause of poverty everywhere, at all times, and according to all investigators, is 'sickness.' . . . The average percentage is between 20 and 25." "It has been confirmed and reconfirmed in so many ways that the conclusion seems inevitable that the figures set forth real and important facts."

Again he says, "It may be concluded that, while the leading cause of confirmed pauperism, as investigated by Mr. Booth in England, is the weakness of old age, the leading cause of incipient pauperism, as investigated by the American Charity Organization Societies, is the weakness of childhood," this weakness leading easily to sickness.

In studying occupations as a cause of sickness, several disease-begetting trades are mentioned; and stress is laid on the improper employment of women and children as leading to a breaking-down of the physical system, and so producing a race of weak infants, who must struggle through life or die young.

The effect of certain occupations upon health is further studied in mortality statistics. The statistics on this point are taken from Hungary, as gathered by an eminent statistician. The table analyzed shows that, "if we start at the age of 25 with 1,000 persons of each class, there will be living at the end of 35 years: of the merchants, 567; of the tailors, 421; of the shoemakers, 376; of the servants, 290; and of the day laborers only, 253. During this time the total number of years of life lived by the merchants was 28,501.23, and by the day laborers only 22,317. But, worse than this, of the years of life falling to the lot of the day laborer, 1,493 will be years of sickness; while, of the years of life lived by the merchants, only 824 will be years of sickness. Or, to state the same thing in another way, the merchant will have 33½ years in which to provide for 1 of sickness; while the day laborer will have only 13.9 years of health in which to provide for 1 of sickness."

One who has had much experience in the homes of poor people hardly needs any such statistics to be convinced that the deductions are true. Many a family drops into hopeless need because the bread-winner lies, perhaps for years, prostrate with mortal sickness. Many a young woman left to earn her own living finds her way to the charity bureau because sickness robs her of ability to work. Sickness of wife and children keeps many an honest man poor, paying for medicines and medical attendance. In the less self-respecting classes sickness soon becomes an excuse for beggary and the breaking-down of all the walls of decent independence, and makes broad the highway to pauperism.

These are almost self-evident facts, though too little stress has heretofore been laid upon them. What is the remedy? Only the one great cure-all, which has no savor of charlatanry,—education. In the schools, the homes, the churches, the gospel of good health must be preached. A sound mind in a sound body is just as necessary to-day as it was when people were speaking Latin. Along with this gospel of theory should go equally important practice. The fact that day laborers are so short-lived suggests at once the need of making their homes and food better, and training their children into something higher. Cooking-schools and manual training schools will help to bring this about. There is work enough here for the intelligent and philanthropic in securing these things in all our cities. There is also work for associated charity and friendly visitors in looking even more strictly after the health of the families, where their influence is felt in matters of diet, ventilation, and water supply, as well as in matters of drainage and other things which have long received their attention. The greatest amount of sickness from which people suffer is preventable, were they properly educated as to the sacredness of the human body and the necessity for obeying all the laws of health.

AN ECCLESIASTICAL FILTER.

The Christian Church for centuries has concerned itself with the question of water. It has been even rash enough sometimes to propose to save souls from eternal fire by a preliminary application of water in this life. It has been supposed that the blessing of a priest could give to it a special sanctity. Yet the blessing of the priest has not availed to kill the germs of typhoid in "holy water," and some other filter than a theological one has been necessary to avert contagion.

But the First Unitarian Church of Pittsburgh has now approached the question of salvation by pure water from the simple physical side. In the church yard a circular tank of concrete, six feet high and six feet in diameter, has been erected. A passer might guess that it was a baptistry. Closer examination shows that it is a filter. The Pittsburgh Times satisfies public curiosity in the matter by saying:—

It is a model of a basin for the sand filtration of city water. It has been built at the expense of the Citizens' League, an organization of public-spirited young men, most of whom are members of the First Unitarian Church. The object of this league is to introduce to the attention of the people of Pittsburgh the success of sand filtration as a means of removing typhoid germs and other bacteria from drinking-water. They have prepared to do this by a practical demonstration, through the operations of a working model.

William P. Flint, connected with the Westinghouse Works at Brinton, is the president of the league; and J. O. Handy, a chemist of considerable local reputation, is the secretary. Rev. Charles E. St. John, pastor of the church, is taking an active interest in the experiments. The filter has been built at a cost of about $100, and was put into operation last Saturday. Some time this week samples of the water, before being filtered and afterward, will be submitted to bacteriological analyses, under the direction of Dr. E. G. Matson, an expert in such matters. The results of these tests will be published.

The men who are interested in these experiments believe that Pittsburgh's water supply is largely responsible for the typhoid fever which has for several years prevailed here to a greater or less extent. Dr. Matson is thoroughly convinced that such is the case. It is admitted that the city water is pure as far as can be shown by chemical analysis, but they claim that a bacteriological analysis shows quite another thing. It is asserted that sand filtration not only purifies the water chemically, but clears it of all disease germs, or bacteria.

Water systems with sand filtration have been used for years in Hamburg and other

German cities, with definitely satisfactory results; and a complete plant on this method has been erected at Lawrence, Mass. The model in the Unitarian church yard has been erected according to the plans sent here by the city engineer of Lawrence.

The Citizens' League grew out of a lecture delivered at the Unitarian church last spring by Mr. Handy on the subject of "Pure Water." The movement is entirely disinterested, and all persons who desire to further the cause of pure water are urged to become members of the league. The work will be carried on until either the value or worthlessness of the system is shown, and the results will be left for the action of the authorities.

This action inspired by the Unitarian church of Pittsburgh is as significant theologically as it is physiologically. It shows that, to avert disease, we must no longer depend upon prayers and prophylactics, but that we must reverently seek and study the laws of nature, and obey them, if we are to put ourselves in harmony with the will of God. This church filter is a practical illustration of the way in which religion and science may go hand in hand.

THE LIBERAL MOVEMENT.

The Boston Transcript does not become so absorbed in yacht races or in social gossip that it cannot give serious attention to the important religious problems of our day. There are breezes blowing stronger than those which filled the sails of the rival yachts. In a recent editorial the Transcript gives us an observation on the weather, especially with reference to conditions in the Episcopal Church:—

The liberal movement in theology is well established in all the Christian bodies. This is evident in the nature of the opposition made against it. As vigorously as this is pushed, no visible impression of any power stops its advance or deadens its popularity. Great things are in store for this movement. The late American Congress of Liberal Religious Societies at Chicago is the creation of the absolute mental liberty that is going up from all the churches. It is not to be discouraged by the tirades of the conservative element. Wellhausen in Germany has just completed the fourth edition of the prolegomena, a little fact which indicates the drift of the new thinking. Prof. Pfleiderer stirred up the minds of the Scottish Orthodoxy by his recent lectures in that country, and replies are constantly forthcoming to arrest the effect which they have produced. Mrs. Humphry Ward contributes a preface to a new translation of Hausath's "Time of the Apostles," and asks a question there which shows that the times are ripe for the answer she gives, although it is far away from the well-trodden paths.

The salvation of heretics is discussed in evangelical magazines; and the quotation of the Jesuit missionary in Japan is held up with a new pride, "The Church must have her formularies, but God is very much kinder than the Church." The saying of Pius IX. about his belief in the salvation of heretics, given upon the evidence of Cardinal Newman, points to the fact that alongside the ultramontane in the Roman Church is the liberal; and, according to a Mr. Hittell, the liberals are increasing.

The Episcopal Church has felt the force of these changes more than any other Christian body. With the developments of the Oxford movement of 1833 came the fear of Romanizing tendencies. Dr. Pusey, in his views, was comparatively a Low Churchman alongside the ritualistic utterances and practices of the Catholic Champion, edited by a clergyman of the advanced school, whose theology Chicago ten years ago would not tolerate, but New York accepts as the inevitable outcome of the partisan spirit. When the general convention of 1874 heard Dr. DeKoven's great speech on ritual, it was but a sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal alongside the bass-drum of its modern representatives.

With the coming of the liberal movement into the Episcopal Church has come likewise the toleration of ritualism. Broad Churchism veers in one direction, and does not care to interfere with the tendencies of the sacerdotalists. This will come out at the next general convention. The Western dioceses are nearly all of the advanced school, while those in the East are becoming more liberal in their interpretations of the liturgy and the doctrines of the Church.

But the party with a future is, after all, what the sedate East is perceptibly creating. The Episcopal Church must be guided by the principles of this party in order to keep up with its growing opportunities. These are seen in its affiliations with other Christian representatives, in the adoption of their methods, and in the willingness to meet their overtures half-way. Every Christian conference has demonstrated the necessity of doing away with denominationalism, in so far as it is used to encourage a biased and unhealthy impression of religious truth.

Musings.

THE similarity of names between many towns and cities in old England and in New England one would think might occasion some confusion in the post-office department now and then. And, indeed, that is the case. A gentleman in Cambridge, Eng., told me that he had often received letters directed to the "University Press," which evidently belonged to my friend, Mr. John Wilson of the University Press, Cambridge, Mass. And, occasionally, a letter goes to the old Boston which ought to come to the new. But there is no likelihood that the visitor will confound the old Boston or the old Cambridge with the new cities by that name any more than he would confound the genuine Oxford with the thirty towns bearing the same brand in the United States. The old Boston is as different from the new as it well can be. Think of a Boston without horse-cars or "electrics," without Young's, Parker, or the Vendome, and without the Public Garden or the South Cove! Think of a Boston with only one Unitarian church instead of twenty-eight, and that little church only forty-two by thirty-two feet in size! Yet the old Boston has its docks and its market-place and its Athenæum. The market-place is divided off into pens for sheep and cattle and pigs and horses, and there is a relic of the stocks of earlier times. There are many quaint old houses in the town. But the grandest building is St. Botolph's Church, of which the first stone was laid by Dame Margery Tilney, "on which she laid five pounds sterling. Sir John Truesdale, then parson of Boston, gave five pounds more; and Richard Stevenson, a merchant of Boston, gave also five pounds, which were all ye gifts given at their time." Seventy-five dollars was not a large sum to begin the great church, whose foundation was laid in 1309. Some one must have given a good deal more to build this noble edifice, with its grand tower in the perpendicular style of the fourteenth or fifteenth century. The height of the tower is two hundred and seventy-two and a half feet, which is fifty-one feet higher than Bunker Hill Monument. One is impressed, too, with the height of the ceiling of the nave, which is sixty-one feet; while the width is ninety-six feet, six inches. The "Old Stump," as the tower is called, may be seen thirty miles away. Somebody has discovered that different parts of the old church correspond exactly with different periods of time. Thus there are three hundred and sixty-five steps to the tower, corresponding to the days in the year, fifty-two windows in the church, corresponding with the weeks in the year, twelve pillars, corresponding to the months in a year, seven doors, corresponding with the days in the week, twenty-four steps to the library, matching the hours in the day, sixty stairs to the chancel, matching the minutes in an hour. I did not dare to verify these numbers, lest some of them should be found to be wrong and the symmetry of the whole astronomical arrangement might be destroyed. The grand old church is well worth seeing for what it is, but the American Bostonian honors it for what it used to be. He looks with interest akin to reverence on the pulpit in which John Cotton preached. I thought again, as I have often thought with reference to our Puritan fathers, what a sacrifice they made in leaving these imposing churches and cathedrals to worship in little wooden meeting-houses in the New World. I said something of the kind to the verger about John Cotton. "Oh," he replied, "it probably did not make much difference to him: he was a Low Churchman, you know." The register of the old church is full of the names of Boston visitors; and a permanent memorial of the filial gratitude of the new Boston is seen in the restoration of the south-west chapel, which was restored by some of her citizens at a cost of $3,250.

EXTERNALLY, the old Cambridge is also but little like the new, though there is some approach to sameness in the academic atmosphere of both places. Of the three days I spent in Cambridge, one, by good fortune, fell on Whitsunday; and I had the pleasure of attending the Sunday afternoon service in King's College Chapel. The occasion is one of the notable ones of the year, when all the faculty and students are expected to go to church in their best robes, and there are many guests and high functionaries from other colleges. The procession into the chapel is imposing. Ringing in my ear are still tones of the impressive music. One may tire of the liturgy; but he does not tire of the stately building, the beautiful stained-glass windows, the elaborate carving, the fan-vaulted ceiling, and the historic decorations of Tudor portcullis and Lancastrian rose. There is no finer view in Cambridge, I think, than the view which one gets from King's College Bridge, taking in the chapel, the beautiful green, the river, and Clare Bridge. A walk along the "Backs" is what every visitor must take. It is the special pride of the Cambridge man, and the one thing which he always refers to when he compares Cambridge with Oxford. Two Americans, at least, are now firmly established in the University of Cambridge. One is Prof. Rendall Harris, formerly of Haverford College, Pennsylvania; and, when I last saw him, he was attending a Quaker meeting at that place. The other is Dr. Charles Waldstein, professor of archaeology, who, a week after I was here, was to give his inaugural address. When I last saw him, he had come to Athens fresh from the excavations of Argos, in Greece, enthusiastic over the richness of the find made by the American School under his direction. It was my pleasure to dine with Dr. Waldstein, and with the Master of King's, the fellows and students in the College Hall, and afterward to sit in the evening in the Fellows' Garden, with its exquisite verdure, and listen to a singing contest of the nightingales, vying with each other in brilliancy of song.

If I make but a brief mention of Oxford, it is because I have paid homage to that place once before; but, in the two years that elapsed since my visit, I found something new in Oxford to admire. I mean the building of Manchester New College, which surprised me by the amplexness of its proportion and the beauty of its details. Our divinity chapel at Cambridge, Mass., is but a small box compared with its spacious and elegant chapel. It was a delightful pleasure to enjoy the hospitality of Prof. J. Estlin Carpenter and his wife, whose name will kindle pleasant recollections in our readers of his visit on this side of the Atlantic.

Brevities.

Rev. Dr. Brooke Herford received a warm welcome at the Unitarian church at West Newton, where he preached last Sunday.

The notice of Rev. Dr. Briggs, which we publish in another column, is written by a friend who knew him long and well, and supplies facts in regard to his career not furnished by previous notices.

The many Eastern friends of Rev. J. H. Crooker will be glad to know that for the next two weeks they may find him at the Hotel Bellevue, next to the American Unitarian Association Building, Beacon Street, Boston.

The article by Mr. Courtenay Guild on the significance of the Italian celebration is a succinct and interesting sketch of the influences and forces which have led to the Italian unity, and one may well agree with him that the Italians have something to celebrate.

A minister who preached last Sunday in the suburbs of Boston in the course of the day rode twelve miles on a steam railroad, twelve to fourteen on four lines of electric cars, five miles in two private carriages, and two miles on horseback. If he had not been preaching or if he had gone on a bicycle, people might have thought that he had broken the Sabbath.

Mr. Dole's "Catechism of the Liberal Faith," just published by the Unitarian Sunday School Society, is a good illustration of how a catechism should be prepared. It does not answer every question. It leaves some things to be answered by the student. There is room for difference of opinion. Throughout it is marked by that eminent candor and judicial spirit which it is of far more importance a scholar should acquire than that of dogmatic assertion.

We call attention to the advertisement of the Atlanta University in another column, offering special inducements in the way of lodgings for visitors to the Exposition. The advantage of accepting this opportunity is that the visitors will not only have a chance to see the Exposition, but will also have a chance to see the Atlanta University, which is well worth visiting at any time for its own sake. The Negroes have been a great factor in the development of this Exposition, and Atlanta University has been a great factor in the development of the Negro.

Rev. W. H. Lyon has cheered the hearts of our Hungarian brethren, and has been gladdened himself by a visit to Transylvania. Next week we shall publish a letter from Mr. Lyon, which comes too late for insertion this week. The Hungarian paper, the Koloszvár Ellenzék, extends him a cordial welcome, and says: "Rev. W. H. Lyon, American Unitarian minister from Boston, arrived with the express train at Koloszvár. The interesting guest has a very attractive appearance, tall, with high, intellectual face, who at the very first sight makes a very pleasant impression. To-morrow morning he will leave Koloszvár with the express train for Bölön, in the society of the bishop and many Consistors. There he will have a good opportunity to see the Szekler people in their own customs and home. We hope that he will make use of his journey in giving a true report of Hungary and its people to his countrymen, which we need very much, especially at present, when the leaders of the Wallachs do everything to misrepresent us among the foreigners. We welcome the distinguished American citizen among us."

Pro and Con.

IMPROVING CHURCH SURROUNDINGS.

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

In your issue of September 12 appeared a clipping from the Watchman speaking of the care that should be given to making church building and surroundings neat and attractive, and suggesting that it might be well to interest the boys and girls in such work.

This idea is, in fact, one that has already developed into a practical success here in Framingham. Last year a club, composed and conducted wholly by the young people of our Unitarian church, was formed for this very purpose. The church grounds presented an almost primeval appearance, and the club planned to raise a fund for improvement in this direction. As the intention was to raise $500, the young people adopted "The Five Hundred" as the name of their society. They sold a large amount of Christmas confectionery, while preparing a dramatic entertainment, which was unusually successful. Their net earnings for the winter were about $150.

The paths and driveways were attractively laid out, and the grass plots put in fresh and attractive condition, several of the young men giving their own time to the work in order to make the money go as far as possible. One would hardly know the place, so great has been the improvement already accomplished. And this is but the beginning. Nor are these results limited to this one object. Such work brings the young people together. It connects them actively and personally with the church affairs,—a result that cannot always be brought about from the pulpit.

If other churches contemplate adopting some such plan as this, let me drop a single hint. In inviting your young people to undertake the work, place the matter wholly in their hands, and then—let them alone.

Framingham, Mass.

WHAT IS THE MATTER?

To the Editor of the Christian Register:—

While the liberal cause is not without its signs of promise and encouragement, one can hardly go over the field and not find very much to discourage and disappoint. I am no believer in pessimism; but it is to our hurt that we do not seek to understand the discouraging features, and find some way of remedying them. The desire for a rational and liberal faith has grown as dissatisfaction with creeds has increased, but thus far we have not shown ourselves equal to the opportunity. The people have about outgrown the supplies of the old churches, and find themselves disappointed when they come in touch with us, or, rather, the presentation of our faith; for I am strongly convinced that the disappointment comes from the preacher's lack of experiencing the deep, glorious realities of our faith. We ministers are not willing to see that the failure is on our side, but deceive ourselves with the thought that "the people cannot appreciate our thought." What super-human beings we are that so few can "appreciate our thought"! If we cannot present our thought that people may understand and appreciate, better betake ourselves to the desert, as did the monks of old; for the world would not be the loser. "Our thought!" It is thought, thought, thought, until one is led to believe that he cannot be religious (I use "religions" as meaning the sum of all moral and spiritual endeavor) save he be crammed with the dreams of philosophers, speculations of psychologists, fancies of theologians, and theories of sociologists. We are dry, tiresome essayists, and there is scarcely a preacher or minister among us. Not only are we failing to meet this growing need of our faith, but I fear we are not holding our own in parishes already ours. Fields once cultivated are either lying fallow or being cultivated by other hands for other crops.

In the majority of cases the trouble is in the pulpit. The liberal ministry lacks sense of duty, lacks conviction, does not feel the vital forces of religion unfettered by dogma, fails to realize that the world is a needy world, that the liberal faith can and must supply the needs of a hungry people. True, it has ideals, lofty and pure as any, has visions of right and wrong; but they are abstractions, not living realities. "A wise lecture, a good essay, was that," is the report of the sermon common among the people. The pulpit does not vitalize, it does not awaken. Has man so changed that this is no longer the mission of the pulpit? Nay, more than ever, we need to hear the old command, "Awake, thou that sleepest!" There is plenty of talk about religions, but rarely a flash of religious experience. There is familiar acquaintance with the history of religions and philosophy of religion, but a woful ignorance of "religion personally realized." Our ministry can tell the relations of the "ego" to the "non-ego," and discourse on the implication of the "I ought," and on all the other gods in the modern Christian Pantheon, but walk blind to all the eternal verities beneath the cloak of humble duties, and unconscious of the heavenly blessings that descend upon the lowliest of earth. Need we wonder, then, that churches are closed, trustees tired, and that few attend the open temples of our faith? Is it not here that we fail to meet the growing need? Men flock to us from other denominations, are welcomed into ministerial fellowship, and are turned loose upon our churches, knowing nothing but the evils of Orthodoxy, and with no purpose save that of fighting the "old church." One must live the larger faith to know it.

The present day call is for men who love the ministry, who are in touch with all human weaknesses and strugglings, who can find in their own experience a word or a light that will cheer and guide others, who can lift the people out of the worries and trials of the every day into the brightness of God's goodness and order, because they have felt it and seen it all themselves. The call is for men who know religion is real and vital, that character does not flow from high thought, but goeth hand in hand with the aspirations of the soul. We want religious leaders and teachers,—men who can lead because they know the way, who can speak with that simplicity and directness that carries conviction to the human soul, men kind to the old faiths, yet in deep and holy earnestness for the larger and better faith. In remedying the trouble, we must "begin at the sanctuary." The men who move and influence the world are men of mighty convictions, whose faith is a reality; and it would be to the glory of God and blessing of man for us never to start or restart a society unless we feel and know we have the food to supply the need. It is because I believe that Unitarianism stands for a reality, a vital faith, that I have called attention to these troubles. Born in the old, I have gone on into the new; and I in a measure realize that in our faith is a satisfaction and certainly which the old does not contain. If we would only rise to the full opportunities of so free and noble a faith, knowing through our own experience that it is the power of God unto salvation!

CHARLES GRAVES.

Rock Rapids, Ia.

For the Christian Register.

THE VICTIM OF A WORD.

BY HATTIE TYNG GRISWOLD.

Of on the passive ear there falls a word
That on the soul doth leave a lasting stain.
Grieve as he may, and strive, the thoughtful youth
Will never be as pure in heart again.

Sometimes unwilling do we list a tale
That stabs our faith and plants a living pain.
Though life goes on as once and friends are true,
Our trust in man is never whole again.

Sometimes a monstrous thing is on us thrust,
A hateful fact, loathsome as is decay.
Sweet joy is slain, and from that fatal hour
There is a shadow on our brightest day.

Helpless we are, the world conspires to hurt,
Even in our own despite our souls are stirred
By things we ne'er have sought; and to the end
We mourn our loss, the victims of a word.

THE DAY THEY CELEBRATE.

BY COURTENAY GUILD.

During the recent celebration by Italians of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the occupation of Rome and the achievement of Italian unity the question was frequently heard, "What are they celebrating, and why was the occupation of an Italian city by Italians considered a matter of such importance that the anniversary of the event is made a day of rejoicing?"

The world of to-day has become so accustomed to the idea of the kingdom of Italy that it scarcely remembers the evolution of the nation from a number of petty States.

In the days of Roman supremacy Italy was simply a part of the Roman Empire; and after the fall of Rome the people of Italy were so divided against each other that through the Middle Ages, and even until the present century, the name Italy signified merely a peninsula in Southern Europe. It was a geographical designation, not a political division of the continent. Republics and principalities of the peninsula rose to great wealth and power; and, although occasionally uniting for mutual protection against foreign invaders, Venice, Florence, Genoa, Milan, and other cities, in the heat of commercial rivalry, were extremely jealous of each other, and even ready to make war at times on very slight provocation.

In their disunited condition large provinces of Italy were appropriated by strong neighbors, so that a great part of the country was subject to foreign powers in the last decade of the eighteenth century, and the independent republics had so declined in maritime and military power as to be able to offer only a feeble resistance to the invader. All ambition and desire for liberty seemed to have died out, and the Italians appeared to be resigned to the lot of a conquered people.

It was in this condition that Napoleon found the land when he crossed the Alps, and entered Italy with his army in 1796. The French invasion destroyed all remaining political independence, and installed a new set of rulers in the peninsula; but the important result of French occupation was the establishment of the Italian republic, with Napoleon as president, which became in 1805 the kingdom of Italy.

It required sixty-five years for the Italians to become strong enough to win independence and unity; but the formation of Napoleon's kingdom aroused a yearning in the minds of the people for a free and united Italy, and after 1805 all efforts of Italian patriots had the expulsion of foreign rulers and the establishment of the Italian nation, with Rome as its capital, as the ultimate result to be sought.

The downfall of Napoleon was followed by a new partition of Italy; but the spirit of desire for national unity that had been roused could not be subdued by foreign bayonets, and the hatred of foreign rule was proved by frequent uprisings against the oppressors, as well as by the formation and growth of secret patriotic societies.

Through many vicissitudes the national feeling grew in force. Sardinia, which by the middle of this century had become the leading Italian power, was looked to as the leader and hope of Italy for the contests with Austrians and French; but, the campaigns of 1848 and 1849 resulting in disaster, the kingdom of Sardinia was on the verge of losing its own independence, and the achievement of freedom for Italy seemed almost hopeless.

In spite of these reverses, and having to pay a large war indemnity, the Sardinians were not cast down. By taking an active part in the Crimean War in 1855 and 1856, as the ally of France and England, King Victor Emanuel won for his country the recognition of the great nations and the right to be counted as a factor in European politics. A fresh struggle for independence, which gave promise of bringing unity and a lasting peace, began in 1859. "Italy free to the Adriatic!" was the announced object of the war; but, after two successful battles at Magenta and Solferino, Louis Napoleon, the French ally of the Sardinians in this war, suddenly decided to make peace with the Austrians. To be sure, Lombardy was added to the dominions of Victor Emanuel; but, by the terms of peace, Austria was confirmed in possession of Venetia, and Napoleon demanded and received Nice and Savoy as a recompense for French assistance. These terms of peace were very distasteful to the people of some of the smaller States, who, instead of becoming citizens of a free Italy, found themselves restored to their old rulers. Many insurrections occurred, and the people called for Victor Emanuel to become king of Italy.

Of the papal States over which the pope ruled as a monarch, Romagna in 1859, and the Marches and Umbria in the following year, announced their adherence to the king of Sardinia. The French general, Lamoricière, commanding the troops of the pope, was obliged to surrender to Fonti, the Sardinian general; and, a popular vote giving a tremendous majority for annexation, the revolted provinces were joined to the Sardinian kingdom.

Meanwhile Garibaldi, with a band of volunteers, was fighting to win Naples and Sicily for the union. The Sardinian fleet, co-operating with the land forces, brought complete success. Garibaldi and his men were received with enthusiasm by the populace. King Francis II. of Naples fled, and "the Two Sicilies" were added to the domain of Victor Emanuel. The name "Sardinia" had become too restricted for a nation that should embrace all Italy; and the first Italian Parliament, assembling in Turin Feb. 18, 1861, voted to Victor Emanuel the title of "King of Italy." Venetia remained in the grasp of Austria, and the Papal States were still under the rule of the pope. These provinces were still lacking to a united Italy.

The war of 1866 between Prussia and Austria furnished Italy the desired opportunity to gain, as an ally of the victor, the much-coveted Venice. By the peace of October 3 Venetia was transferred from Austria to the kingdom of Italy amid popular rejoicing.

The people of Italy, and especially those of the Papal States, clamored for Rome as the national capital, and for the completion of national unity by the merging of the Papal States in the kingdom of Italy. Two powers interposed between Rome and Italy,—the reluctance of the Italians to make war upon the head of their Church, and the presence of a garrison of French troops in Rome.

On the breaking out of the Franco-Prussian War in 1870, France needed all her forces to oppose to the advancing Prussians; and in August the French troops were withdrawn from the States of the Church. September 2 brought the surrender of Emperor Napoleon and his army at Sedan, and September 6 the Italian government decided on the occupation of Rome. The Italian army entered the States of the Church September 11, and on the 20th began the attack on the city of Rome. The firing, beginning at five o'clock in the morning, lasted until about ten o'clock, when the Italians effected an entrance into the city through breaches made in the walls by their artillery; and the papal troops immediately capitulated, in accordance with orders from the pope.

Exclusive of his Italian troops who refused to fight against their countrymen, the pope's army, commanded by Gen. Kanzler, consisted of nine thousand men,—French, Bavarians, Swiss, and even some Canadians; for Harper's Weekly of November, 1870, mentions the arrival in New York of two hundred members of the papal army on their way back to Canada.

The army of Victor Emanuel was received with unbounded joy by the populace; and a vote on the question of annexation to the kingdom of Italy gave the remarkable result of 133,681 in favor of the union, and only 1,507 against it. The Eternal City was soon declared the capital; and the united Italian kingdom, the ideal for which so many patriots had fought and died, was an accomplished fact.

The occupation of Rome was the final act in the struggle of more than half a century, which secured a political renaissance, the separation of Church and State, and the union of all Italians under one flag.

No wonder that Italians cherish the memory of September 20, and celebrate the anniversary! It is the most glorious anniversary in their history.

OUR COLLEGE MEDIÆVALISM.

BY REV. E. P. POWELL.

It is an intolerable fact that, in some of our colleges of the older sort, manners are indulged and customs sustained that have long since been abolished from every other part of the civilized world. Every group of young men that matriculates is met, not with courteous welcome and manly brotherhood, but with every conceivable insult and annoyance. The more rustic, but not by any means least brainy, are often subjected to innumerable indignities. That this brutality should lead to serious conflicts is natural, and tragedies are not unknown to the history of a single one of our older colleges. Princeton, whose immaculate theology should insure at least tolerable behavior, had the trial of a black man for shooting a student who intruded on his household with a gang of his mates. Cornell had a murder case. Hamilton has had at least two deaths from hazing in its history. Not one of the New England colleges has escaped with a shameless record. The day is near when some scores of colleges are to open their doors all over the land. Are we to be treated to a repetition of this savagery? and, if so, why?

The American people, consisting of fathers and mothers, wish to know why their boys, brought up in the family to ideals of a manlier sort, carried through the common-school system of the land without encountering false views, must, in the higher schools, at last be taught to endure and to inflict unmanly abuse and torture. Why are they to be initiated into a spirit wholly alien to all they have been taught at home, at school, at church, and in decent society? Over the colleges, founded originally to educate a class of ministers, pre-empted for the most part by clergymen, men of religious character; and the faculties consist of men of culture and refinement. They most unanimously condemn this characteristic of college life. Why are they helpless to prevent it? Is college tradition stronger than college discipline? If one faculty or board of trust fail, it would seem that some other board or faculty somewhere ought to succeed in abolishing hazing. But we are morally certain that the month ahead will witness a vast deal of shameful college rowdyism, and that the authorities will seem to be powerless to prevent it.

It is, however, a matter of record that the newer colleges, based on coeducation, are less subject to this low estimate of honor than the older institutions that are more closely modelled after their monastic heredity. In many of these colleges hazing is entirely unknown. That is, the more mediæval the general type of the school, the more mediæval the traditions and manners. The German universities hold literally to the duel, which is abolished from all other social orders. The American college prefers dragging boys about, naked, with ceremonies suited to Ashantee and Timbuctoo. It has lost the grit of the fair and square duel, and prefers to turn ten boys loose at midnight on one helpless fellow, who cannot resist, or is pounded if he does. It is a supremely American feat to crowd his room with smokers, and smoke him sick, several deaths having been the consequence; but college custom is too sacred to be stayed by the killing of a few incipient ministers and statesmen.

The present phase of hazing is a modification of what existed thirty years ago. It is more English in type. It involves the idea of fadding, and it ends in establishing class rank. The Freshmen are obliged to wait on the upper-class men to a degree that we would not have endured when we were college boys in the fifties. So we have the old mediæval brute-force customs that came to us more directly from Saxon ancestors, modified by the meaner customs of English schools.

If the source and origin are mediæval and foreign, clearly the remedy is to make our colleges more American in tone and spirit throughout. This is exactly what is not taking place. The old togger of monks and that ilk is being introduced more generally. Last summer a half-dozen more of our colleges turned out during Commencement Week with gowns, and boys instead of girls inside of them.

I have attended alumni dinners where the tobacco smoke from cigarettes and cigars was as thick as that in a hazing outrage. Bishops and judges tilted back, and smoked and spat like saloon habitués. The trouble is not with the boys only. They are only developing one phase of a common difficulty. We are trying to perpetuate a something very classical and conservative, and are only preserving the wretched shuck of antiquity. The gowns and trash of all sorts should go. Our boys should be recognized as true Americans, with American obligations to sustain the best possible American manners.

FROM ITALY.

BY REV. SILAS FARRINGTON.

Day after day of brilliant sunshine, and twelve hours of it to the day! Every lake at its loveliest, the sky at its heavenliest, each hill wonderful in its ever-changing light, every prospect pleasing, and man very far from vile! Such an ideal holiday season has not been developed for years.

Nothing remarkable about our outward coming from old England until we were about to plunge into the solid rock of the St. Gothard Tunnel. Suddenly, then, certain exceedingly salient features struck us; and, curiously enough, they were overwhelmingly nasal. So amazing the sight that the twenty-one minutes of adamant gloom gave the welcome opportunity for pulling ourselves together again, and recovering strength before beholding them again. Should we behold them again? Had not a too vivid imagination played us false? Are there not broad daylight illusions? These are but noses of the mind. So we reasoned, as we rattled through the darkness. But, alas! and most pitiful, when we emerged, there they were, three of them, scarcely believable, though among things the most plainly seen. There they were upon the faces of three brothers, well dressed, not of the commonest of the common people, with an air of good breeding about them, and yet overweighted, oppressed, afflicted, by these amazing smellers. For three days, on boats, in trains, at hotels, we were with this trinity of nose-brothers. Not once, by any chance or by any watching, did we see one of them smile. Not the number of their years, but the length of their noses, had solemnized them; for the eldest was but twenty, and the youngest sixteen. Poor fellows,—to have to go through life thus! One friend asked another, "What sin do you suppose they committed in a pre-existent state?" "Oh, nonsense! There is no pre-existent state! Such things are naturally evolved," was the ready answer. "What on earth, then, do you imagine their ancestors have been strenuously sniffing at these many generations? For, according to your theory, when Nature wishes to develop a new variety of features or limbs, she sets an individual, or a family of individuals, to doing a certain special and peculiar thing. What was that thing in this instance?" "Oh, I cannot definitely say; but, judging from their solemn visages, it may be that their ancestors were Calvinists, of the elect, but who, with an ever-increasing difficulty, have been trying and trying to detect some faint sulphurous fume from the eternal pit. If the neck of the giraffe gets longer and longer, reaching after receding boughs, why not the nose of man in sniffing after departing fire and brimstone? But, not to dogmatize, let us feel the depth of this mystery! Three intelligent youth compelled to carry those three unintelligible noses through this altogether unintelligible world!"

The effect of these abnormal probosces having passed, all Northern Italy became more beautiful than a dream. Where ever was air more light, sweet, and gently motionful? Where were skies ever of such tremulous depth and luminousness? What lakes, save the unspeakable Lucerne, were ever so luxuriously lovely? And the people,—where on earth on summer days are men, women, and children of lighter heart or of readier wit than here, despite their poverty and heavy taxation? One is impressed by it again and again,—in the café, the evening promenade, the communal fête. Happily, these poor still retain the Christian's time view. If they are distressed, it is not for long. After this flesh, they shall see God. They have none of our intellectual bewilderment, none of our indifference to the things of religion. A hearsay of theoretical knowledge has proved for the mass of English, and probably American, people a dangerous thing. But faith and more than a show of piety still serve these Italians. One hears that, like modern art, this piety is purely conventional and imitative. Even so, it is still better than none at all. Here there is an ideal estate that still sways heart and conscience. Here religion still presents for imitation the inimitable man, the adorable woman, and a great multitude who, passing through the world, were not of it,—these likest God, and our best proofs of him. Clinging fondly to these, the common people, despite their multitude of sins, are rendered docile, devout, penitent, patient, and full of a hope that the hardness, tribulation, and crosses of life seldom take wholly away. How these multitudinous churches are thronged! What hours of rest the populace find within them!—a rest that our secular strife and strain, even when successful, is impotent to give,—the rest that remaineth, always and everywhere, for the people of God. Any one who knows the absenteeism of Unitarian London, the emptiness of its places of worship as a rule, asks himself many an awkward question at Milan, Como, in hill-slope village, everywhere. Small churches, amid sparse populations, fill, no less than great cathedrals with ornate music and great splendors of spectacle. In this unattractive place the service often seems more hearty, tender, and touchingly sincere. All this, however, holds only of the simple people. It does not hold of the ecclesiasticism as an organization. The sheep are much more innocent than those trades-unionists, their shepherds. When men bind themselves to stand by their ecclesiastical union, right or wrong, and before all else,—to have no other end so high or holy as to yield it their implicit obedience,—then, in the long run, it makes the best of them untrue, machine-servers, every whit as hard and hateful as if they were so many capitalists acting together against labor, or so many laborers gone mad against every giver of work and payer of wages. Popes and prelates are perhaps better intentioned men than Protestants sometimes imagine,—quite as admirable as the men who protest against the Roman machine. All the same, they are parts of and enslaved to that machine. They are Rome's bondsmen, and one cannot admire the sullen and obstinate attitude they maintain toward the civil authorities. If the temporal power will not yield to ecclesiastical desires, then Holy Church will ignore and, so far as it can, cripple the secular sway. Nothing in Italy seems so fraught with various mischiefs as this feud between the old machine and the new life. The populace will feel the effects of it more and more. They are between two opinions, in some necessary sympathy with each; but as yet they are essentially devout, and derive immense comfort, hope, and joy from their devotions. Not to pope or prelate, but to these, belongs the kingdom of heaven.

In a little lakeside village we were much interested in a funeral. A rich Milanese had died in the hotel. He had frequented the place, and given generously of his abundance to this or that local undertaking. So everybody had some knowledge of and regard for him. Early on a Monday morning a great number of candles, nearly an inch in diameter and quite three feet long, were carried about hither and thither. The early boats brought enormous shields and crosses and crowns of gorgeous summer flowers, cannas, gladiolas, dahlias,—masses of brightness so huge as to require four and even five men to carry some of them. At eleven the little shops were shut, and the pealing bells of the church rang out right merrily. It was no doleful, dismal toll. "Fought's the fight, the victory's won!" was the impression conveyed. And now down the village street, along the shore, on its way to the church, comes first a boy in white, carrying cross of gold and ebony, glittering and flashing in the mid-day sun, followed immediately by a band of music, playing strong, triumphal strains. A hundred orphan boys,—plump, clean, and neatly dressed,—bearing draped banners and a badge round each right arm; a hundred or more men, of all ages between eighteen and eighty, in bright Turkey-red calico gowns and caps, some rustic fraternity, and every member carrying his yard-long lighted candle. Then, perhaps, a larger number of women and maidens, wearing the graceful black lace as their only head-dress, with their candles also trimmed and burning. Another and larger, and more tenderly playing band of musicians, another uplifted cross, followed by white-robed choir and gorgeously arrayed clergy, chanting as they go. Immediately then the hearse, high and imposing, drawn by four horses carefully led and entirely hidden under black velvet, silver-fringed, with tall plumes nodding on their heads. Behind the hearse walk the two young sons of the deceased and a few friends of the family, each with his candle. Then came an open carriage heaped high with the floral offerings, followed by about every man, woman, and child of the surrounding hillsides,—a long and straggling array, but all apparently serious and sympathetic, giving their sacrifice of a half-day's labor and of a candle to honor where they felt honor was due. So was the rich man borne to his burial.

To all good Americans who are about to do Italy, or who have already done it, I venture to commend in terms not qualified this Hotel Washington at Lugano, where I have been in bliss these ten days. It stands high above town and lake, commands views of near and distant mountains, is ever visited by the purest and sweetest airs, and is admirably kept. Several of the lower hotels are good, but they are down in the close and stuffy town. Here, within three or four minutes of the railway station, and above it, in open, large, fruitful, and beautiful grounds, stands the house whose name ought to make it homelike to Americans. It is but a few years old; and, since Americans are fond of new things, one hardly sees why they should, like flocks of sheep, generally go to one or two hotels which are supposed to be the thing, where they pay much more and fare worse. Here I found an American authoress who was born at Pomfret, Conn., eighty-two years ago, who once lived in Roxbury, where I was born, but who has lived in Italy these many years, and who is very bright and vivacious still. Scarcely could she find a pleasanter place for the sunset of her life than in her rooms in the front of Hotel Washington. Lugano is virtually an Italian town, all its ways and feelings Italian, save the one very satisfactory feeling that under the Swiss government it escapes the severe taxation imposed upon all by the government of Italy. That Americans do come and do do Lugano with all the region round about—Mont Salvatore, Mont Generoso, and Monte Bré—may be inferred from this. Climbing Monte Bré a morning or two since,—a mountain worthy and well repaying,—I came, high up, in front of a small house, upon a shingle prominently placed upon which was inscribed this significant device "Americans may here find tea out of doors and Sweet Corn." If sweet corn distinguished by capital letters will not catch Yankee pennies, then what will? Being very much Anglicised, and unused to gnawing the cob, your correspondent did not apply.

NEW YORK LETTER.

Sydney Smith has somewhere said that the most beautiful possession which a country can have is a noble, rich man, who loves virtue and knowledge, who, without being factious, is firm and independent, and who is an earnest promoter in his civil and political life of all that can shed a lustre upon his country or promote the peace and order of the world. Now, a goodly number of our citizens believe that New York possesses this nation's best gift in Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, who, in his career as police commissioner, is standing four-square to all the winds that are blowing in our political sphere. That there is a moral issue at stake in our coming elections is wholly due to his firm position on the excise question. If he had not insisted that the Sunday closing law should be enforced because it stands on the statute books, we would have had the usual sort of hypocritical campaign, in which great professions of virtuous policies are made, with little intention of fulfilling them afterward. As it is, this new moral issue, which has been forced to the front by the simple honesty of Mr. Roosevelt and his fellow-commissioners in executing the existing laws, has aroused all of our better citizens to a sense of the tremendous consequences involved, irrespective of the advisability or non-advisability of a more liberal Sunday law. These citizens are in dead earnest in their determination to stand by the police commissioners in their policy of an honest enforcement of all laws. Out of all this there has naturally arisen the present political question of local option as opposed to uniform State control in the regulation of the liquor traffic, the discussion of which by great men and small, by big and little corporations, by Government Clubs and Vigilance Leagues, has thrown the city into a paroxysm of excitement. In the midst of it all Mr. Roosevelt stands calm and firm, pleasantly refusing to commit himself to reporters or others on the side of either local option or State control, but continuing, Sunday after Sunday, to close the side as well as the front doors of all the saloons in town.

The placid imperturbability of Mr. Roosevelt had ample opportunity to be tested last week, when the united societies advocating liberal Sunday laws had a mammoth parade on the East Side of the town. From thirty to forty thousand men were in line. Mr. Roosevelt was invited by the committee to review the parade; and, although he promised to be present, if possible, none of the committee seemed to believe that he would keep his word. But he was there on time and in front, and greeted with his good-natured smile the hisses as well as the cheers of the paraders. The banners which read, "Send the Police Czar to Russia!" "No Police Club Domination! Away with the Spies and Informers!" "Roosevelt's Razzle Dazzle Reform Racket," he asked to have sent down to police headquarters as mementoes of the occasion.

Next to the interest of the paraders in Mr. Roosevelt came their interest in a stirring speech made to them, later in the day, by one of our own ministers, Rev. A. H. Grant of Newburg, N.Y. Mr. Grant said that he was present, not to advocate the saloon, but to plead for an American Sunday which would be in accordance with the principle of American liberty. He arraigned the Church for not keeping up with modern civilization. It selfishly demanded its Sunday dinner, its Monday morning paper, its rapid postal service; and hosts of workers labored every day in the week in order that all these luxuries and conveniences might be enjoyed. Yet the Church continued to fight the losing battle of securing the setting aside of one particular day as a religious institution. This, he said, was both selfish and hypocritical. The Church, he argued, should join with the State in securing one day of rest a week, and then keep its own doors open seven days in the week.

The Shakspeare Society of New York, now about ten years old, under the inspiration and leadership of its president, Mr. Appleton Morgan, has pledged itself to raise enough money to purchase the "Poe Cottage" at Fordham, which is now for sale. If the home of the poet is not soon secured, it will be razed to the ground, in order to widen the King's Bridge Road on which it stands. The Shakspeare Society held a meeting at the cottage on a recent Sunday; and its eloquent president made an address full of touching allusions to the poverty and misery and unmerciful disaster suffered by Poe, whom he called "our American Shakspeare," while living at Fordham. The purpose is to move the cottage one hundred feet back, and to preserve it as a memorial of the poet, to be kept always open as a shrine sacred to his memory and maintained with appropriate furnishings. Though, in the estimation of many, Mr. Morgan's praise of Poe, "as the grandest, the most unique, the most noble, and the sweetest of our own poets," is a trifle too exaggerated, that part of the public who give attention to such calls on their purses seem glad to respond, and to pay their tardy tribute to a genius whose life, spent in unremitting literary toil, has been unjustly blackened and vilified by one of his biographers.

Considerable attention has been paid here to two horseless pleasure carriages imported from France by R. H. Macy & Co., who have exhibited them for several days on Fourteenth Street. They crossed the many car-tracks on this street with perfect ease, and dodged and turned out for passing vehicles and cars like any regularly propelled carriage. The source of their motive power is petroleum, and their average speed on a good road is twenty miles an hour. It is computed that the running cost of one of them is one and a half cents a mile, as against four cents a mile for the usual horse and carriage. The American inventor has not yet applied his skill to the further evolution of the horseless pleasure carriage. But, when he does, it is predicted, with characteristic "hopefulness," that, as in the case of the bicycle, which also owed its origin to France, he will produce a cheaper, safer, and more efficient vehicle and motor than the French article now in our city. Meantime we are beginning to see in our streets small delivery carts attached to a sort of elongated bicycle, and propelled by a cyclist in the usual way. These go with great speed even along the crowded thoroughfares.

The reviving business and gayety of the city after the dormancy of the summer is interesting and entrancing to an observer. Like the author of "Prue and I," one has a delight in the pleasures and extravagances of the town, in the richness and beauty of the shops, and a pride in the prosperous busy activity of the metropolis, without having any participation in or desire to more than gaze on all these good things. Just as the city is gradually getting to its best condition, so the theatres one by one are reopening, with plays of repute and actors of renown. Mr. John Drew in a new play, "That Imprudent Young Couple," Mr. Nat C. Goodwin in "A Gilded Fool," E. M. and Joseph Holland at the Garrick, in "A Social Highwayman," Sothorn, Clara Morris, Marie Wainwright, and Francis Wilson are all here, and are drawing large audiences at their several theatres. Best of all, we have the promise of a week of Mr. Joseph Jefferson in the near future; and, finally, we are soon to see Mme. Modjeska again in "Measure for Measure." Her portrayal of Isabella has been pronounced incomparable.

Three years ago this coming November the first Unitarian service was held at Passaic, N.J. And now, under the leadership of Rev. F. S. C. Wicks, the young pastor, this vigorous society has purchased a good building site, on which before long it hopes to erect a suitable church. This is the kind of success which is an inspiration to both minister and people. Our other churches in this vicinity have all reopened, but it is too early to gather any news about their winter work. From Brooklyn comes word of the first issue of a monthly paper to be published in the interest of the local work of our Unitarian churches there.

M. A. M.

THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

BOOK-ROOM CHAT.

Only two new books this week; but they are new, and of course they are good,—one, "The Postulates of Revelation and of Ethics," 75 cents, net, by Rev. Thomas Hill, D.D., LL.D., ex-President of Harvard University; and the other, "A Man," 75 cents, by Rev. Minot J. Savage. This book is made up of sermons selected from the last year's course of sermons in Unity Church. This book will no doubt receive a wide reading, as his books generally have. These are all the new books we have this week.

The talk these days about this building is chiefly about Washington, and the various interests we have at stake in the great meeting we expect to have there this month. The facilities for getting there seem to be increasing in number all the time, and the cost is certainly very reasonable both for transportation and board.

It is to be hoped that one result will be reached, and that is that we shall have not only the interest of our churches in one another increased, but that we shall also have some means devised and recommended for improving the means of communication between the churches and the various organizations that do the denominational work. This Association would be greatly assisted in its work if it could have, for example, a person designated, appointed, or elected, no matter how it is done, by each society, who should act as the representative of this Association. Perhaps other organizations might be similarly benefited, but I only speak for this Association. If the treasurer could have some one so designated, who had the entire confidence and approval of the minister and the society, with whom he could correspond about collections, denominational papers, books, and all sorts of business matters, it would be a great help. There is so much to be done that no one wants to ask the minister to do, and that the minister generally does not want to do; but these are the very things that somebody must do if we want to "get on in the world." Everybody has to "keep house" in some way. Churches must look after their material interests, or they will soon find their spiritual interests disembodied; denominations, ditto. I am sure we all desire to see the Unitarian cause prosper; but it never can, of course, unless we all pull together. It is evident that we are pulling together better than ever before. Saratoga did a great deal for us, and Washington ought to do more. Things have happened since Saratoga that never happened before, so let us take courage. Let each one trust and help the other, and a future of usefulness awaits us.

A new oil portrait of Rev. S. H. Winkley has been hung this week in Committee Room No. 4. Mr. Winkley is one of the veteran ministers of the Boston Fraternity. A continuous term of service of fifty years closes in the autumn of 1896. The portrait is beautifully done, and Mr. Winkley's many friends are cordially invited to come and see it.

VISITS.

The mind of the treasurer was so thoroughly occupied last week with the subject of finances that no account of the visit of the preceding Sunday was given. The visit of September 22 was to the church in Hudson, Mass. This vigorous society was organized early in the sixties. It has never asked for any help outside of its own membership for any contribution. It has built its own church and paid for it, and has been a steady contributor to the American Unitarian Association for many years. The society is prospering. The day was the hottest of the season; but, notwithstanding that, about one hundred and fifty children came out to the Sunday-school, and sang with as much vim as if the day were cool and pleasant. This is one of the most interesting schools that the treasurer has ever had the good fortune to see. It is evident that the superintendent and the teachers are all thoroughly well posted in their duties, and able to keep the interest in their work up to the highest pitch all the time.

Last Sunday, September 29, at Taunton, Mass., in the fine old church, with its beautiful surroundings. This is one of our largest and strongest parishes outside the large cities. The day was pleasant, and a good congregation was present. If all our churches, like this one at Taunton, would take hold of our denominational missionary work in dead earnest, we should have all we could do at these headquarters to spread the Unitarian gospel. The denomination has never yet shown its strength, and never will until such important parishes as this one lead off in the work.

The treasurer hopes to hear from the Unitarians of Taunton in a way that indicates their intention to stand by the Association in a practical and substantial way.

GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer.

CONFERENCE NOTES.

The Wednesday morning meeting of the Conference will be devoted to addresses by the department superintendents of the American Unitarian Association. These addresses, as last year at Saratoga, are not to deal with the past and what has been accomplished in it, but with the future, and how it may best be used for "Church Extension." Those who are really earnest Unitarians, and believe in making our faith more widely known, will not find this a dull session, but one of great interest. At the present time, in the American Unitarian Association Board and elsewhere, missionary policies are under discussion, and different methods are being carefully considered. The departments of the superintendents embrace the whole United States and Canada, and the distinctive features in the missionary policy of each will be fully set forth. Out of the knowledge gained by the experience of the superintendents in dealing with the problems as they arise in their several fields, valuable suggestions ought to be contributed which will help to show the way to a more practical, business-like, and successful missionary policy.

One of the most striking meetings at the last Conference was that held by the Unitarian Temperance Society, and its programme for Wednesday afternoon at Washington promises equally well. It will deal with "The Modern Methods in Temperance Reform." Among the speakers will be Rev. A. P. Doyle, general secretary of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, who was heard with so much enthusiasm at the silver jubilee of the Union which was lately held in New York.

These are the days when social problems largely occupy the thoughts and hearts of most of us; and Prof. Peabody will have many eager, earnest listeners to his paper on "The History and Principles of the Unitarian Church in Relation to Social Problems." Rev. Anna Garlin Spencer, who has done so much remedial work, is especially fitted to discuss "The Modern Applications of these Principles."

Judging from the number of inquiries that have been received concerning excursion rates from Washington to Atlanta, it is evident that many of those who are to attend the Conference are planning to extend their trip and visit the great Southern Exposition now in progress. It will be welcome news to these that the railroads leading South from Washington are advertising liberal excursion rates to the Exposition. The secretary has not the exact rates at hand, but will endeavor to obtain them in time to announce them in next week's Register.

Delegates to the Conference are fortunate in having so many first-class hotels which will serve as abiding places during the Conference week. Among the best of these are the two whose cards appear in our advertising columns. The "Ebbitt House," with special rates for the Conference attendants, is located only two squares from the Conference Hall. It is the custom of this house always to make a discount to clergymen. It is headquarters for the Raymond & Whitcomb people. "The Raleigh" is a new first-class hotel on the European plan, with its entire construction strictly fire-proof, and is located a little less than two squares from the hall.

Arrangements have been made by Messrs. Raymond & Whitcomb, extending the time on tickets sold by them, enabling parties to visit the Exposition at Atlanta. Special personally conducted parties will be made up for these trips, the round-trip fare being $15, in addition to the fare to Washington and return. Parties will also be made up, all expenses, meals, hotels, transfers, etc., included, itineraries and price of which will be announced next week. This extension of time permits of four and a half days at Atlanta. Parties reach Boston Thursday, October 31.

The Sunday School.

The Channing Hall "Talk" for next Saturday afternoon, at the Unitarian Building, 25 Beacon Street, at 2.30 o'clock, will be on Lesson IV., "The Leaven," conducted by Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford. All cordially invited.

BOSTON PRIMARY UNION.—The sessions of the Boston Primary Union of Sunday-school teachers will be resumed on Saturday, October 5, at the Bromfield Street Church, commencing at two o'clock. The lesson will be taught by Miss Bertha F. Vella each week; and all Sunday-school teachers are cordially invited to attend its weekly sessions, which will continue throughout the winter.

The current leaflet lessons on "The Teaching of Jesus" are out for October,—the Advanced by Rev. T. R. Slicer, the Intermediate by Rev. Edward A. Horton, and the Primary by Mrs. J. C. Jaynes, the same subject for the three grades. The subjects are "The Leaven," "The Mustard Seed," "The Talents," and "The Sower." Intermediate and Advanced printed together in one leaflet. Price 50 cents per hundred leaflets. Primary also a four-page leaflet. Price 50 cents per hundred.

Attention is called to the detailed advertisement in another column, giving full information as to the annual meeting of the Sunday School Society, which occurs in Providence, R.I., Wednesday evening, October 16, and Thursday forenoon and afternoon, October 17. There is every guarantee in the programme for a profitable time. Sunday-school workers who get discouraged ought to attend these large meetings and replenish their enthusiasm. There will be topics treated by able speakers which relate to the actual conduct of schools and for the improvement of methods. The Providence friends have extended a cordial invitation for home hospitality on Wednesday night to all those who may be interested in Sunday-school work and wish to attend, as well as to life members and delegates.

The platform meeting at the Westminster Church on Wednesday evening is a new departure. It was thought wise to vary the habit a little, and, instead of securing one conspicuous speaker, to have three, with topics somewhat varied, yet all bearing upon vital Sunday-school matters. There will be a hearty welcome for Dr. Herford the next day, who gives an address in the forenoon, immediately following the business meeting. Mr. Charles N. Goodrich will be a new voice to our Unitarian assemblies. He is qualified by his position and experience to speak an authoritative word concerning the methods most in vogue in the Congregational Trinitarian Sunday-schools. Rev. S. H. Roblin, who speaks in the afternoon, is well known as the successor of Dr. Miner in Boston. We have thus in the programme an inclusive representation of Unitarian, Trinitarian, and Universalist elements.

There is probably no need of urging attendance on these sessions. Fortunately, the Unitarian denomination is waking up to the need of more wisely and vigorously dealing with the young people. Very frequently has it happened that, while we are laboriously discussing deep subjects in public meetings, our young people are running away from the churches. Very often, when we ask them to come in and join our churches, we offer them stones for bread. That is to say, we erroneously imagine at times that churches can be sustained by appealing only to adults. It is all wrong, and the Unitarian laity have seen it for some time. What we specially need is a fresh devotion to this very difficult but inevitable problem of how to interest and train children and the young people in our faith. The Unitarian Sunday School Society is bending all its energy to this end, as far as its means permit. Meetings such as these to be held at Providence will show how far along we are in this important part of our denominational work.

Religious Intelligence.

ASSOCIATION OF MINISTERS IN AND ABOUT CAMBRIDGE.—Meetings first Monday in the month from October, 1895, to June, 1896: Rev. C. W. Heizer, October; Rev. M. O. Simons, November; Rev. W. H. Johnson, December; Rev. S. M. Crothers, January; Rev. B. F. Bailey, February; Rev. Francis Tiffany, March; Rev. W. H. Pierson, April; Rev. J. H. Whitmore, May; Rev. G. W. Cooke, June. Rev. J. T. G. Nichols, Moderator. Rev. Hilary Bygrave, Scribe.

BOSTON.—King's Chapel will be open October 6, morning service only, at 10.30 A.M. Rev. Howard N. Brown will preach.

Ministers' Monday Club: October 7, 10.30 A.M., Rev. E. C. Headle will preside. Rev. Charles T. Canfield will give the address on question, "What may be New Purposes and Methods of Unitarianism?"

Church of the Disciples: During the extended vacation of Mr. Ames Sunday services have been arranged as follows: October 6, Rev. Francis Tiffany; October 13, Rev. F. G. Peabody; October 20, Rev. F. H. James; October 27, Rev. Charles T. Billings; November 3, Rev. Charles G. Ames.

BROOKLINE, MASS.—Rev. Samuel A. Eliot of Brooklyn will preach in the First Church in Brookline next Sunday, October 6.

CHELSEA, MASS.—The ordination and installation of Augustus P. Record as pastor of the First Unitarian Church will take place in the church, Hawthorne Square, on Wednesday, October 9, at 7.30 P.M. All are cordially invited to be present.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.—The Unitarian parish have passed resolutions recognizing the faithful, scholarly, and Christian ministrations of Rev. Richard A. Griffin, who has but recently resigned after a pastorate of four years.

SOMERVILLE, MASS.—The fine new granite church of the First Unitarian Society will be dedicated Thursday evening, October 10, at 7.30 o'clock. Rev. E. A. Horton will preach the sermon. Pastors and friends are invited to be present.

TAUNTON, MASS.—A correspondent writes: "The First Parish in Taunton listened with pleasure to a ringing lay sermon on Sunday last from Mr. Stone, our new American Unitarian Association treasurer. If the pulses of his hearers were not stirred, it was not the fault of the preacher. The discourse was a clear statement of the fundamental principles of the Unitarian church, and closed with an earnest, manly appeal for a more persistent and whole-hearted devotion to this church of the living God on the part of those who believe in its principles of goodness, justice, and righteousness."

TOKIO, JAPAN.—A letter in the New York Herald describes the Senshin Gakuin, or School for Advanced Learning, and bears testimony to the excellence of the work done here, adding that no foreign mission is so popular as this, owing to the liberal geniality of its president, Rev. Clay MacCauley. Concerning the school the writer says: "The method is perfectly free inquiry,—no prejudice being manifested toward any existing religion. It is the only school of the kind in Japan, and there are few like it in the world. The faculty is composed of seven members, and the examinations are rigid. There are no textbooks, all teaching being through lectures and essays. There are Christians, Buddhists, Shintoists, and Confucianists by education and association in the faculty; but all have the same object in view,—search for the truth wherever it may be found. Mr. MacCauley is a Christian, but he interprets Christianity as large enough to include this object. What is known as the 'Church Extension Department' exists for the encouragement and mild support of liberal religious movements originating and developing among the Japanese. It does not build churches, impose creeds, nor pay salaries to preachers. It does not import church organizations from the United States nor reproduce foreign cults. It waits for and helps along native effort, which is honestly directed toward gaining the highest truth and securing the best life in religion and in morals. The Japan Unitarian Mission is in constant correspondence with associations and individuals throughout the empire who are known to be affected by the leading religious and ethical influences of the age. In this direction the Unitarian Mission has a very important reason for being. Its influence for good in this direction is, indeed, great. It is the only organization of the kind in Japan, and is worthy of the generous support of all who recognize truth and sound morals as the basis of true religion."

WAYLAND, MASS.—The Association of Ministers in and about Cambridge will meet with Rev. C. W. Heizer on Monday, October 7. Train leaves Boston, Union Station, at 10.10 A.M. Paper at 11 o'clock. Collation at 1 P.M. Rev. Brooke Herford is expected at the meeting.

WORCESTER CONFERENCE.—The Worcester Conference of Unitarian and Other Christian Churches will meet with the First Unitarian Society in West Upton on Wednesday evening and Thursday, October 9 and 10. Rev. S. A. Eliot of Brooklyn preaches the sermon on Wednesday evening. Rev. G. M. Bodge of Leominster reading the essay Thursday morning. The day will be devoted to the interests of the Sunday-school. G. W. Kent, Secretary.

NEW ENGLAND ASSOCIATE ALLIANCE. The Alliance connected with the First Church, Roxbury (Rev. Mr. De Normandie), will receive the New England Associate Alliance at its next meeting to be held early in November. As this will be the first meeting after the biennial meeting of the National Alliance, the election of officers will take place as the by-laws require. A circular will soon be sent to the Branches, giving the exact date of this meeting, and the names reported by the Nominating Committee.

THE NEW ENGLAND FIELD.—Rev. J. B. Green of Reading accepts the very urgent call extended him by the people in St. John, N.B., and seconded by the Unitarian Association. He enters upon his duties the first Sunday in October. The church in Bath, N.H., has lately been favored greatly by fortune. Its summer fair was made unexpectedly successful by a gift of $50 from Rev. S. B. Craft; and now from that same good friend of the society has come an additional gift of $200. Mrs. S. O. Johnson of Bath has set an example which many might follow to the great advantage of our churches. She has made such provision in her will as shall secure to the society forever an annual income equal to the amount now paid by her for pew rent. The Unitarian services in Wilimantic, Conn., continue to be attended by congregations numbering three hundred and upwards. If it were not for the financial depression caused by the two bank failures, it would be one of the most promising movements New England has seen for years.

WOULD YOU HAVE THE HANDSOMEST

CLOVES?

THEN WEAR ONLY THE GENUINE DUCHESS,

Which come in all the popular styles, dressed and undressed Kid, button and Foster lace, long and short wrists,

And cost no more than other makes.

CALL AND INSPECT, OR SEND FOR CATALOGUE.

All Gloves fitted when desired, and every pair warranted.

CHANDLER & CO.,
SOLE AGENTS,
WINTER ST. BOSTON.

Agency Dr. Jaeger Sanitary Woollen System.

As things are, it is likely the denomination will be called upon to help the people build a meeting-house immediately. The Catholic church in Maplewood, N. H., has recognized the generosity of Gen. George Theodore Cruft by dedicating their new edifice to "Saint Theodore." The church in Bar Harbor, Me., has grown so rapidly as to feel that it can afford a minister of its own. Rev. L. D. Cochrane, who began services among the permanent residents of the place, is asked to work with them altogether. The summer residents have contributed liberally to effect such an arrangement. Rev. Herman Haugerud of Rowe, Mass., has resigned to take charge of the Swedish church in Minneapolis. He has done excellent work in the Rowe parish, and will be greatly missed. Rev. N. S. Hoagland, who resigned charge of the Fourth Society in Providence, R. I., has been requested to withdraw his resignation, and will for the present continue his labors in that field. The church in Northampton, so important as the seat of Smith College, is being favored with preaching by some of our more prominent ministers. Miss Ida C. Hultin of Moline, Ill., preached there a few Sundays ago to an overflowing house. Rev. F. W. Pratt preached last Sunday, and sermons are expected from Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, Rev. George Batchelor, Rev. S. A. Eliot, Rev. F. G. Peabody, D. D., and others. Unitarian services were held in the town of Derby, Conn., a week ago Sunday by the superintendent. The society in Sudbury, Mass., has at last been induced to open its meeting-house for religious services; and they are conducted every Sunday by Rev. C. W. Heizer of Wayland. At Pittsfield Rev. C. W. Park has entered upon his labors with great satisfaction to the society.

D. M. W.

NATIONAL ALLIANCE OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL CHRISTIAN WOMEN. The third meeting of the National Alliance will be held in Metzerott Music Hall, Washington, D. C., October 23, at 2.30 P. M. Accredited delegates, life members, officers and standing committees of the Executive Board, must present credentials. At this meeting vice-presidents and directors will be elected, and a Nominating Committee and Committee on Credentials appointed. The report of the special committee appointed to consider the question of establishing the office of honorary vice-president will be received and acted upon. Reports of corresponding secretary and standing committees will be presented. Branches are desired to give full instructions to their delegates. Delegates unable to be present may send credentials and votes by mail to the recording secretary before the meeting. Members and friends are invited to visit the headquarters of the Alliance, which will be open day and evening in one of the small rooms of the Metzerott Building. A public reception will be held by the officers of the Alliance in the parlor of the Arlington on Thursday, October 24, from 4 to 7 P. M. Members of the Alliance and all attending the Conference are most cordially invited. Emily A. Fifield, Recording Secretary.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE DELEGATES.

ADDITIONAL NAMES.

MASSACHUSETTS.

BELMONT—Congregational Society: Rev. Hilary Bygrave, J. V. Fletcher, I. H. Locke. Alternates: Miss Anne Learned, Miss Maria Livermore. BERLIN—First Unitarian Society: Rev. and Mrs. G. F. Pratt, Hon. William Bassett. BERNARDSTON—Congregational Unitarian Society: Mrs. J. K. Brown, C. R. Hills. BOLTON—First Congregational Church: Rev. William J. Leonard, Mrs. Julia A. Woodbury, Miss Lucy H. Sawyer. BREWSTER—First Parish: Rev. Thomas Dawes, Captain and Mrs. J. Henry Sears. Alternate: Mrs. Mary D. Newell. CAMBRIDGEPORT—Third Congregational Society: Rev. and Mrs. William H. Johnson, Mrs. Charles L. Jones. DIGHTON—Pedobaptist Congregational Society: Rev. Mary L. Leggett, Mrs. Nancy Baxter, F. Waldron. Alternates: Mrs. E. Horton, Mrs. J. Standish. GROTON—First Parish: Rev. Joshua Young, D. D., Miss Georgeanna A. Boutwell, Mrs. Daniel Needham. HINGHAM—Third Congregational Society: Rev. C. T. Billings, Major B. F. Meserve, Mrs. H. A. Miles. HINGHAM, SOUTH—Second Parish: Rev. Charles T. Billings, Joseph Jacobs, David Cushing. HOPEDALE—The Hopedale Parish: Rev. Lewis G. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. William Welch. LAWRENCE—First Unitarian Society: Rev. George H. Young, Mr. and Mrs. William T. MacAlpine. LINCOLN—Unitarian Congregational Society: Miss Cook, Miss Hulda Howes, Miss Jennie Pierce. MALDEN—First Congregational Unitarian Society: Rev. Benjamin H. Bailey, Miss Sophia W. Sargent, Miss Charlotte A. Jones. MARLBORO—Second Parish: Rev. Edward F. Hayward, Mrs. Loren Arnold, John L. Stone. NORTHFIELD—First Congregational Society: Rev. George F. Piper, Miss Eliza Belcher, Miss Fannie M. Piper. NORTON—Congregational Parish: Rev. and Mrs. C. A. Young, E. C. White. RANDOLPH—Church of the Unity: Rev. Charles A. Humphreys, Mrs. Peter C. Wales, Mrs. Walter Howard. Alternates: Mrs. William Porter, Mrs. Ephraim Belcher. ROWE—First Congregational Church: Rev. Herman Haugerud, Mrs. Julia F. Browning, Frederick A. Browning. SHIRLEY—First Congregational Society: Mr. and Mrs. Thomas L. Hazen, Miss Laura King.

ILLINOIS.

GENESEO—Unitarian Society: Rev. John B. Bidwell, Miss C. M. Allen.

KANSAS.

LAWRENCE—First Unitarian Society: Rev. C. G. Howland, B. W. Woodward, Tracy Learvard.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

EXETER—First Unitarian Society: Miss Mary E. Hartwell, Miss Annabel Warren. Alternates: Miss Alice Chesley, Miss Annie Shute.

NEW YORK.

BROOKLYN—Second Unitarian Society: Rev. John W. Chadwick, Henry W. Maxwell, Sylvester Swain. Alternates: Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Wing.

RHODE ISLAND. NEWPORT—Channing Memorial Church: Rev. George W. Cutter, Mr. and Mrs. William Stevens.

ASSOCIATIONS.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION: George Batchelor, George W. Stone, Horace G. Wadlin. BENEVOLENT FRATERNITY OF CHURCHES: Rev. Edward A. Horton, William P. Fowler, John Capen. UNITARIAN CLUB (BOSTON): Francis H. Brown, William Howell Reed. UNITARIAN CLUB, PROVIDENCE, R. I.: James F. Fie d, Frank Bowen, William H. Miller. UNITARIAN EDUCATIONAL SOCIETY (ANDOVER, N. H.): Miss Mary A. Downing, Mrs. Clarence E. Carr.

Business Notices.

First in Favor.—There has, perhaps, been no invention in furniture which has been so popular with the large class of people as the Revolving Bookcase. It is at once so handy and so compact, so convenient and so inexpensive. Speaking of prices, our readers may be interested to know that there is a sale of Revolving Bookcases at the PAINE furniture warehouses on Canal Street this week, with some very tempting low prices.

"We fully believe in the stereopticon, not only as an educational, but also as an evangelizing force. For hearty, enthusiastic congregational singing it stands forth pre-eminent. We have sung from eight to ten popular hymns from the screen on a Sunday evening, interspersed with prayer and testimony, and have thus seen souls won to Christ without the aid of any sermon. We have in a simple way taught the Life of Christ to crowded audiences through eye and ear. We have made John Bunyan's immortal allegory known to thousands who had heard of it only in a general way. The stereopticon services were the cause of several copies being purchased, and "Pilgrim's Progress" was made real. We have shown Luther's life, and glorious John Wesley's career, with the aid of sixty choice views. The stories of Esther, Ruth, David, Elijah, etc., are made realistic with the mighty help of the lantern. We don't worship the instrument: it is but a thing of brass and glass and magic if you will. But it speaks. He that hath eyes to see let him hear in that way what the stereopticon says."—The Open Church.

All settled pastors in the United States can secure complete outfits from Messrs. Riley Brothers, 16 Beekman Street, New York, or their agents, on instalment plan, and hire slides of every description.

Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder

Gives the most perfect satisfaction. It has a world-wide reputation. Recommended by dentists.

Marriages.

In Belmont, 25th ult., in the Unitarian church, by Rev. Hilary Bygrave, Irving F. Symmes, of Winchester, and Annie F. Dean, of Belmont.

Deaths.

At Charlestown, N. H., 23d ult., Lucia Denny, widow of Joshua Clapp, aged 87 years and 4 months.

Born in Leicester, Mass., Mrs. Clapp's married life was spent in Boston. Mr. and Mrs. Clapp were earnest and devoted Unitarians and members of Federal Street Church in the pastorates of Dr. Channing and Dr. Gannett, both of whom were welcome visitors in their summer home at Leicester. Eminently fitted as was Mrs. Clapp to adorn prosperous years, the strength and beauty of her character were revealed in the period of adversity. Her children recall with loving gratitude the sacrifices she made that their education should be secured. Mrs. Clapp's last years were spent in Charlestown, which had become endeared to her by family associations. The church at this place felt the invigorating influence of her warm love and deep interest. With natural strength scarcely abated she was to the last a source of comfort and efficient helpfulness.

T. D. H.

At Claremont, N. H., 20th ult., suddenly, Susie H. Twitchell, daughter of Dr. George B. Twitchell, of Keene, N. H.

The death of this precious young woman in the flower of her beautiful life is one of the mysterious dispensations which call for all the faith and courage possible to human hearts, and arouses the deepest sympathy for those bereft by such a loss.

If one believed, as is sometimes said, that it is always the best who die young, no one would have looked for length of days for this dear child; for a more angelic spirit has seldom walked among us in human form. We call such a death untimely; but what shall be said when, after twenty-seven years of earthly life, one leaves it "unspotted from the world," having already achieved a noble womanhood, made up of love, reverence, courage, fidelity, discretion, and of generous service to the world in the high calling of a teacher?

Truly, she was worthy of the name she bore; and, like others of her kindred, she has so revealed the beauty of worship in her own sweet and strong personality that the living truths she taught will be long remembered, not only in the community where her lovely childhood was passed, but by her fellow-workers, her devoted pupils, and her many loving friends everywhere. What greater achievement is possible to the longest life?

At Narragansett Pier, R. I., 9th ult., Mrs. Ellen Frances Woodhull.

From the years of her infancy she was a resident of the capital; and during all her life a member of the best society there. It seems hard to realize that one who possessed so many charms and graces of person and character, who retained to the last fresh and unfading the beauty that distinguished her youth,—"age could not wither her,"—and whose culture, ready wit, and unfailing resources made her one of the most charming members of the society in which she moved, has gone from us forever.

She was remarkable for her placidity, her evenness of temper, her sweetness of disposition, her calm, strong, good sense and unerring judgment. Her wit was keen and brilliant; she was remarkably agreeable in conversation, and that of no common order; she disliked and always avoided gossip, and was never heard by her most intimate friends to say a harsh word of any one.

She was the widow of Captain Maxwell Woodhull of the United States Navy, whose tragic death cut short what promised to be a glorious career in the War of the Rebellion; and she was the daughter of Mr. Moses Poor, a highly respected citizen of Washington, who died many years ago. She was the last of her immediate family.

Gen. Maxwell Woodhull, Miss Nellie Woodhull, and Mr. Charles H. Woodhull, her children, survive her. And they, with many nephews and nieces who loved her most dearly, and admired her many virtues and graces, are left to mourn her sad death.

Religious Notices.

North Middlesex Conference

Of Unitarian and Other Liberal Christian Churches, LITTLETON, MASS., Wednesday, October 9, 1895.

Order of Proceedings.

FORENOON.

9.45 A. M. Devotional Meeting. Leader, Rev. WILLIAM BROWN, of Tyngsboro. 10.30 A. M. Business Meeting. Reports, Appointment of Committees, etc. 11.00 A. M. Address. "How far can we adopt Mrs. Humphry Ward's Suggestions to Unitarians?" Rev. THOMAS VAN NISS of Boston. 11.45 A. M. Address. "Organization," GEORGE W. STONE, Treasurer of the American Unitarian Association. 12.15 P. M. Dinner.

AFTERNOON.

1.45 P. M. Business, Roll Call, Reports, etc. 2.00 P. M. "Our Young Unitarians," short papers by young people. 2.30 P. M. Address. "The Social Obligation of the Christian Church," Rev. JOHN C. MITCHELL of Wilton, N. H. 3.00 P. M. Five-minute Addresses. Open to the Conference. 4.30 P. M. Adjournment.

The Littleton Society will furnish transportation from the Fitchburg Railroad depot. Friends wishing transportation from Boston & Maine station at North Littleton will please notify Rev. I. F. PORTER, pastor of Littleton Society.

Unitarian Sunday-School Society.

ANNUAL MEETING

—AT—

Providence, R. I., Oct. 16 and 17, 1895.

ORDER OF EXERCISES.

Wednesday, October 16. In the Westminster Church, Mathewson Street (Rev. HERBERT H. MOTT, pastor).

7.45 P. M. Platform meeting, with three addresses:— Rev. W. HANSON PULSFORD, Waltham, Mass. Subject, "Sunday-School Instruction and the New Criticism." Rev. THOMAS VAN NISS, Second Church, Boston, Mass. Subject, "Organization in Sunday Schools." Rev. JOHN CUCKSON, Arlington Street Church, Boston, Mass. Subject, "The Relations of the Home to the Sunday School."

Thursday, October 17. In the First Congregational Church, Benefit and Benevolent Streets (Rev. AUGUSTUS M. LORD, pastor).

FORENOON.

9.00-9.45 A. M. Devotional meeting, conducted by Rev. FRANCIS B. HORN BROOKE, Newton, Mass. 9.45-10.00 A. M. Opening of the Business Meeting of the Unitarian Sunday-School Society. 10.00-10.20 A. M. Reading of Directors' Annual Report. 10.20-11.00 A. M. Discussion of Directors' Report, Election of Officers, and miscellaneous business. 11.00-11.25 A. M. Address by Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, D. D., London, England. Subject, "The Minister and the Sunday School." 11.25-11.50 A. M. Address by Mrs. SETH C. BEACH, Bangor, Me. Subject, "Women and the Sunday School." 11.50-12.15 P. M. Address by Mr. CHARLES N. GOODRICH, Secretary of the Congregational Sunday-School Superintendents' Union of Boston and vicinity. Subject, "Main Lines of Work in Congregational Sunday Schools." 12.15-12.45 P. M. General Discussion and Remarks. Speeches limited to five minutes each. 12.45-2.00 P. M. Intermission and Collation.

AFTERNOON.

2.00-2.30 P. M. Opening of afternoon session, transaction of unfinished business, and other matters. 2.30-3.30 P. M. Three Twenty-minute Addresses:— 1. Rev. JAMES DE NORMANDIE, Roxbury, Mass. Subject, "Bible Teaching as Illustrated by the Book of Jonah." 2. Rev. S. H. ROBLIN, Pastor of Second Universalist Church, Boston, Mass. Subject, "The Place and Function of Sunday Schools in Church Life." 3. Rev. CHARLES F. DOLE, Jamaica Plain, Mass. Subject, "The Value of Catechisms in Modern Sunday-School Training." 3.30-4.00 P. M. General Discussion and Remarks. Speeches limited to five minutes each. 4.00 P. M. Adjournment.

Those in attendance at this Annual Meeting are entertained by the following five churches and their pastors: First Congregational Church, Rev. A. M. Lord, pastor. Westminster Congregational Society, Rev. Herbert H. Mott, pastor. Olney-Street Congregational Society, Rev. William F. Furman, pastor. Bell-Street Chapel, Rev. Anna Garlin Spencer, pastor. Fourth Unitarian Society, Rev. Napoleon S. Hoagland, pastor.

By request of our Providence friends the hospitality of the Parishes is offered for the night of Wednesday, October 16, to all individuals who may wish to attend the sessions of this occasion, as well as to life members, delegate members from contributing churches or schools, and to pastors of said churches and schools.

Those in attendance are requested to report, on arrival, at the Westminster Church, Mathewson Street.

Churches and Sunday Schools that have contributed to the funds of this Society during the past fiscal year are entitled to three delegate members, either from the Society or from the Sunday School. These delegates are members of the Society for one year from Oct. 1, 1895, with all the voting powers and usual privileges of such membership; and they will be furnished with cards, which must be filled out and returned on Thursday forenoon, October 17, as credentials. All persons in attendance, not delegates or life members, have full privileges in the exercises except the right of discussing business and of voting.

SPECIAL DIRECTIONS.

The special attention of those wishing to avail themselves of the Providence hospitality on Wednesday evening is called to the following directions:—

1. To send their names as soon as possible, and in no case later than Monday, October 14, addressed, Secretary of Unitarian Sunday-School Conference, Providence R. I.
2. To put the proper prefix of Mr., Mrs., or Miss to their names.

Information as to Trains and Fares.

The New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Company (Old Colony System) has placed round-trip tickets reduced rates, for sale at the following stations, good going October 15 to 18, and returning until October 17 inclusive:—

Boston.....	$1.35	Concord Junction....	$1.65
Canton Junction....	1.00	Fall River.....	.80
Worcester.....	1.35	Plymouth.....	1.50
Brockton.....	1.45	Middleboro.....	1.00
North Easton.....	1.10	Taunton.....	.92
Yarmouth.....	2.25	Cohasset.....	1.85
Fitchburg.....	2.30	Clinton.....	1.90
Framingham.....	1.25	New Bedford.....	1.30
Lowell.....	2.10	Newport.....	1.15

The winter schedule of trains does not go into effect until October 15. Delegates can consult official time tables for the desired information.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE

OF

Unitarian and Other Christian Churches

AT WASHINGTON, D. C.,

October 21, 22, 23, and 24.

Messrs. RAYMOND & WHITCOMB have arranged for the accommodation of delegates and others who may wish to attend the National Conference an Attractive Series of Excursions at Very Low Rates.

Parties will leave BOSTON Friday, October 18, and Monday, October 21, under special escort. A choice of routes by boat and rail.

Additional Excursions to

GETTYSBURG, OLD POINT COMFORT, Etc.

Send for special circular.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,

296 Washington Street, opposite School Street, Boston.

Unitarian Excursion

—TO—

WASHINGTON, D. C.

A party will leave Boston on Friday, October 18, returning Friday, October 25, using Hotel Vendome on Penn. Ave.

Drive of three hours through residential part of the city and to Arlington Heights. Trip to Mt. Vernon. Guide at service of the party at all times. J. HOWARD NASON, who accompanies this party, has been very successful in managing Washington Excursions, and is always at the service of the party. Price of tickets $30.00, including all expenses. For full information apply to

NASON & DURGIN, 228 Washington Street.

We refer by permission to Rev. GEORGE BATCHELOR, Chairman of the Council.

THE RALEIGH

Pennsylvania Avenue and Twelfth Street, N. W.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Only two blocks from hall in which Unitarian Conference meetings are held.

The only strictly first-class hotel conducted solely upon the European plan, with its entire construction absolutely fire-proof.

No pains nor expense have been spared to make the sanitary conditions of the hotel as satisfactory as modern ideas and first-class work could make them.

Every room is heated by steam and lighted by electricity. The service and cuisine of the hotel will be maintained in accordance with the best traditions of the culinary art.

Rates for rooms are graded according to size and location.

T. J. TALTY, Manager.

The Ebbitt House

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Special rate for those attending meeting of the National Conference, $2.50 and $3.00 each per day up. Parlors and alcove parlors at equally low rates. This house is only two blocks from Metzerott's Hall, where the Convention will be held.

H. C. BURCH, Manager.

Atlanta Exposition.

ATLANTA UNIVERSITY will entertain visitors. Lodging 50 and 75 cents. Meals 35 cents. Convenient to electric and steam cars to Exposition Grounds. Write for circular to President HORACE BUMSTEAD, Atlanta, Ga.

Rooms To Let.

Single or in suite, with bath. House occupied by owner. Apply at 36 RUTLAND SQUARE.

JAMES KAY APPLEBEE

is open to engagements for PREACHING or LECTURING. Address: ALLSTON, MASS.

For the Christian Register.
LIFE'S LAST SLEEP.

BY MARY HANDERSON ELLA.

Death comes so often in our latter years,
We grow familiar, and forget our fears;
So used to pain becomes the aching heart.
God's message falls upon the sufferer's ear,
And sad eyes brighten; while forebodings drear
In foretaste of great blessedness depart.
Ah! Marvellous the sweetness and the faith
Which give the dignity of life's last sleep!
The Comforter through mute lips softly saith,
"When peace like this is ours, how can you weep?
A little time of silence we must bear,—
A time for love to grow more sweet and dear,
And you will come with sympathy more near
The better knowledge I have gained to share."

The Pulpit.

LOVING GOD THROUGH HUMAN LOVE.

EXTRACTS FROM A SERMON BY REV. HEMAN P. DE FOREST, D.D., WOODWARD AVENUE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, DETROIT, MICH.

"Hereby we know that we love the children of God when we love God, and do his commandments. For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments; and his commandments are not grievous."—1 JOHN V. 2, 3.

The love of man is involved in the love of God. There is no real love of God that does not include the love of his children. As the same writer says elsewhere, "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

Love is a state of the human spirit, an atmosphere in which one abides. He who is in that atmosphere loves the human that appeals to him no less than the divine. Loving God is not merely a feeling toward him, a gushing-out of emotion: it is a practical exercise of his spirit. It is a real doing of his commandments, taking that in the sense, not barrenly, of keeping rules and edicts, but of obeying the inward impulses that come from the spirit of love and of God.

From several sources questions about loving God have come to me of late. "What is loving God? Is it anything more than loving men, and trying in his name to do them good?" "I do not think I love God, for I do not feel toward him as I do toward those I love best." "It is hard to think of God as the Great Energy that fills all things, and yet to love him as a Father." These are all expressions of sincere and earnest minds trying to get into the real atmosphere of the truth and to live the spiritual life. And, because I believe them to be typical feelings, common to many besides those who have spoken of them, I should like, if possible, to help clear up the difficulties indicated.

Let us recognize the fact that nothing but emptiness and disappointment can come from the effort to love an abstract conception. Love goes out only toward personality. And the personality must lie warm and living in our hearts, or it fails to quicken affection into life. Israel, for instance, was laboring for a thousand years to bring forth its idea of Godhead. In the old notion of Jahveh as God of Israel only, there was a sort of personal warmth akin to patriotism,—a common affection which went out in a crude way to their personal champion. When the prophets began to see in him much more than this,—the God of all the earth, "who formeth the mountains and createth the wind, and declareth to man his thought,"—while there was an immense gain in breadth and truth of conception, there was a loss of the nearness that begets personal attachment, until, a little later, God's relation to the whole nation gave place to the new idea of his direct relation to every man in all the affairs of his life. That gave birth to all that is best in the Psalms of Israel, with their outgoing of personal confidence and affection. Yet that did not last. Those heart-songs died away as the era of sacrifice and mystery came into greater predominance, hand in hand with the idea that God was an arbitrary dictator of commands and observances, and that his favor was secured only by the most correct and exact compliance with specific laws; and Judaism became barren of the spirit of love,—a mere tithing of mint, anise, and cumin. Then, after the coming of Jesus and the intense feeling that sprang up on his departure that he was God manifest in the flesh, there was a leap of thought and life which showed how the real heart of man hungered for something more close and personal than Judaic religion could ever give it. At once, with a suddenness that was startling, Jesus, the Christ, took the place of the Father he loved and spoke about so much; and to him went out all the affection and personal loyalty which it had been so hard to give to the more abstract Jehovah. So complete was this change, and so central to the apostolic age, that for eighteen hundred years the same phenomenon has been witnessed of placing Jesus in the central place, with God removed to a vague background, the being "whom no man hath seen or can see," dreaded, revered, and worshipped, but never standing in the intimate relation of close fatherhood in which he was the warmth and light of the life of Jesus himself. There was abundant reason for this. The human heart, seeking for a real religion, must have something concrete and close and warm: it cannot love an abstract idea. Jesus was seen as God reduced to the human compass, enshrined in a human and personal love. The whole responsive life of man went out to him. It was its heart-hunger for God finding in Jesus a visible and tangible personality, to which it could leap forth spontaneously. And so it came to pass that he did what he did not in the least aim to do, but rather the contrary: he did not bring the real Godhead of the universe nearer to the average mind, but took the place of it, letting it even sweep backward, farther out of sight, farther into the impenetrable mystery.

We are pillowed in our infancy on a bosom of affection. It is long before we know it; but, when we do awake, it is to our mothers that the earliest love goes forth. For a long time thereafter it is in the sphere of the home that our love is drawn out: fatherhood, motherhood, brotherhood, sisterhood,—these are our shrines. Whatever of the spirit of real love is born into us finds its object here. So it is only by these familiar names that even Jesus can picture to us the love that is to go forth to God. Fatherhood, brotherhood, are our only interpreting names, because these are what we first know. And, if we ever do love God, we come to it by rising from the home love, or some later and even stronger love that awakes in us, to the higher affection. This makes the common affections of life sacred and divine, in that without them there is no ground in us for the love to God.

Horace Bushnell, a modern apostle of the deep things of the spirit, opened a long-hid mystery when he said, "Loving God is but letting God love us." The letting is the important act here. Not that we can help his loving us, if we tried never so strenuously: it is his nature, and he is not to be turned from it, fortunately for us; but there is a difference in the love of a father for a prodigal son among the swine and for the same son saying, "Father, I have sinned,"—a difference, I mean, in the effect of it on the son. It could not reach him before. Now it can, and is happy in the fact; and he, being responsive, feels it working in him great surges of shame for the past and love for the love that never let him go.

All love has one source. Do our mothers love us? It is God in them that breaks out into love in its highest manifestations, with its divine unselfishness and its clinging power. Wherever love is, we get a glimpse of the divine and infinite. There is, doubtless, a mere animal instinct, such as the lioness feels toward her cubs, which simulates the higher thing which is real love. It is sometimes left to a human mother in good society to root out even that. But I am talking of love. Most of us have known it well. Whether it has come to us from mother or from friend; whether it is the love of family or the love of man and woman or the love of some great nature that has been down with us in the darkness where we walked, and has clung to us and would not let us go, and has lifted us almost by its own energy out of despair or sin or sorrow,—there has been in it the love of God. It is only as such love responds to the Spirit of God in it that it does and dares, and clings to us and will not let us go, though it cost struggle and patience and sacrifice and pain. Or the love that comes as sunlight into our lives, and is round us as an atmosphere in which we live, which makes all the ongoing of our days sweet and happy and full of light and hope,—this is of God. "Love is of God, and he that loveth is born of God and knoweth God."

And this love, as a channel of the love of God, is the power that most often lifts us up into the clearer realms where we are at one with the divine, and its love becomes real to our hungry hearts.

The love we have to God is realized in our love to men. It cannot abide alone. They who have thought to gain it by retirement and meditation have found it only a will-o'-the-wisp save as it has issued in the love that seeks men and tries to do them good. For the love of God is not a mere feeling, as I have said,—a gush of emotion in which the soul is rapt away to things ineffable. It is a spirit, an atmosphere, in which one lives; and "he who dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him." But to dwell in love, to be really baptized with its spirit, is to have that energy of it within us that seeks continually to find exercise for itself and actually to give itself to others.

Unfortunately, the service of God has too often been conceived of as the conferring of something on him, by ownership or sacrifice, by which it is thought he will be pleased. But what can we do for him by our offering of gifts for his use, or by the singing of his praises, save to give expression to what is in us, and thereby satisfy our own cravings? Have the strong words of the old prophets of Israel no meaning for us to-day?—

"Wherewith shall I come before Jehovah,
And bow myself before the high God?
Shall I come before him with burnt offerings,
With calves of a year old?
Will Jehovah be pleased with thousands of rams,
Or with ten thousands of rivers of oil?
Shall I give my first-born for my transgression,
The fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?
He hath showed thee, O man, what is good;
And what doth Jehovah require of thee
But to do justly, and love kindness,
And to walk humbly with thy God?"

Is he not as likely to say to us as to Israel at Bethel:—

"I hate, I despise your feasts,
And I will take no delight in your solemn assemblies.
Take away from me the noise of thy songs,
For I will not hear the melody of thy viols.
But let judgment run down as waters,
And righteousness as a mighty stream."

The real love for God will manifest itself in what we do for men. It will set itself to help on the kingdom of God on earth as the dearest end it can set before itself. When Jesus pictured the test of human lives, he told how the king would say to some: "You have been loving me: I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick and in prison, and ye ministered unto me." "When, Lord?" they say in astonishment. "When you did it to the least of these my brethren." The Samaritan did not worship in the Jerusalem temple: his own on Mount Gerizim had long been levelled to the ground. But, when he took care of the wounded man on the road to Jericho, he showed himself a lover of God beyond the priest and Levite of orthodox connections and habits, who passed by on the other side.

Men and women are warned not to love each other too dearly, lest God be jealous, not to love their children too much, lest he take them away. This is not religion. Real love does not exhaust itself by giving: it grows by giving. The more you love your child, if it be unselfish love, the more you will love God; for the loving of a little child brings you into that atmosphere and spirit of love where the heart is living and warm, and goes forth to God as naturally as the sunlight streams into the ether. You will need to be cautioned lest your love of human kind become selfish and exclusive, and is indulged as a mere luxury. That vitiates it. But the more you love your brother whom you have seen, unselfishly, the more you will love God and see him, too, with the spiritual vision.

To sum up, then, this relation of divine and human love: all love is of One, and the line cannot be drawn where the human stops and the divine begins. But we may feel sure of this,—that to see the love of God in all the love that comes to us, to recognize it in all the unselfishness we see, is the only way to know it truly, and the most direct road to the clearer sense of it as an indwelling life.

We cannot do our duty to any one without love. We cannot keep his commandments without doing our duty to men. But, when we learn to love and to obey the promptings of love in our human relations, we find that "his commandments are not grievous" any more. The spirit in us is in sympathy with the spirit in him, and we are the children of our Father which is in heaven.—Outlook.

A CATECHISM OF LIBERAL FAITH.*

BY REV. CHARLES F. DOLE.

VIII.

THE BIBLE AND HOLY BOOKS.

What is the best known book in the world?

Ans.—The Bible.

How is the Bible made up?

Ans.—It is made up of many different books, written at various times, mostly by Hebrews or Jews.

What material does the Bible contain?

Ans.—It may be thought of as the library of the Hebrew people, containing their history, their laws, their stories, their ancient customs, the lives of their great men, their poetry and hymns, the sermons of their teachers, their best thoughts, and their religion.

Why is the Bible important for us?

Ans.—Our religion and many of our institutions and ideas have their origin in the Bible.

Is the Bible equally important and interesting throughout?

Ans.—No, there are widely different levels of value in the Bible. Parts of it hardly interest us at all.

What is one reason for this difference of value?

Ans.—The early Hebrew people, like most other early nations, were barbarous; and their thoughts and their religion were therefore low and sometimes childish.

Whose work are the best parts of the Bible?

Ans.—The most precious parts of the

*Extracts from a book by Rev. Charles F. Dole, now in press, to be published by the Unitarian Sunday School Society.

You Need One.

64 Page Illustrated Catalogue of Library and Office Furniture mailed on receipt of two 2-cent stamps.

Every one who appreciates the value of connected thought in literary, philosophical, or argumentative work, will instantly recognize the worth of a revolving bookcase. It is because the needed reference book is at your elbow instead of being at the other side of the room that your thought is not interrupted; and the newly created, hot idea does not grow cold and die.

To a lawyer, a writer, or students, the revolving book cabinet is worth ten times its cost. Our stock contains 19 patterns.

It is not simply a question of intellectual convenience, however. Its enormous sales have been because of its ordinary, every-day bodily convenience. To have a hundred and fifty books so berthed that the hand can reach any one of them in an instant is no small advantage. It makes your volumes twice as valuable.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.,
48 CANAL STREET.

Bible are the work of certain poets, as in the Psalms; of a few great preachers or prophets; and especially of Jesus* and Paul in the New Testament.

What idea do many people hold of the way in which the Bible was written?

Ans.—Many say that the Bible is a "supernatural" book.

What do they mean by this?

Ans.—They think that the ideas in it, if not the very words, came in a special way from God, as in the case of no other book.

What insuperable difficulty is there in this view of the Bible?

Ans.—There are many ideas, specially in the earlier parts of the Bible, which are not worthy of God, but are plainly the rude thoughts of Hebrew men. Thus men used to think that God was pleased with the sacrifices of animals, that he was a "jealous God," and that he required the extermination of his enemies.

Are there important truths in the Bible which are not to be found elsewhere?

Ans.—No, the study of religion shows that its great ideas are all to be found in many sources besides the Bible.

Are there other holy or sacred books besides the Bible?

Ans.—The Hindus, the Persians, the Chinese, the Buddhists, and others have also their own sacred books.

What collection of wise and good books is sometimes added to our Bible?

Ans.—The books of the Apocrypha.

Is there any distinct line that separates the best books of the Apocrypha, as Ecclesiasticus, from such books as Daniel and the Song of Solomon in the Old Testament?

What makes a book "holy"?

Ans.—Great and helpful thoughts, such as ennoble men's lives, make a book holy.

What ancient books can you think of that belong to this list besides the Bible?

What books of our own time are really holy books?

What sacred history is there besides the Bible history?

Ans.—The history of the growth of our own national liberties, as in the Revolution and the Civil War, is doubtless sacred history.

What poetry is sacred besides the Psalms?

Ans.—Our own hymn-books, for instance, contain sacred poetry.

Does the fact that there are other holy books make the Bible less sacred or precious?

IX.

INSPIRATION.

Where have we agreed that all helpful and noble thoughts come from?

What word has sometimes been used to express the idea that God communicates truth to man?

Ans.—It has been said that truth comes by "inspiration."

What does inspiration really mean?

Ans.—Inspiration means the fact that the spirit, or mind, of man catches the thought of God. In other words, it is because man is akin to God that he can "think God's thoughts after him." If we call it inspiration by which Isaiah or Tennyson strikes off a beautiful verse, shall we also call it inspiration when Newton or Darwin or Edison catches the vision of a new idea?

Is it also inspiration when a new and good thought comes to any of us?

Is there any reason why we may not reverently say that God thus speaks to us?

What would an "inspired man" be?

Ans.—A person would be inspired who always thought true and good thoughts.

XI.

ABOUT JESUS.

Whom do we generally think of as the best man who ever lived?

What was characteristic of Jesus' life?

Ans.—He lived the life of a whole, or true man.

What other way is there to say the same thing?

Ans.—He lived like a child of God.

What does this mean?

Ans.—It means that Jesus showed the nature of God. A child of God lives to show his good-will, because God's life is Good-Will.

*While Jesus inspired the great teachings of the New Testament, he did not leave any writings behind him.

What made it easy for the early men to think of Jesus as the son of God?

Ans.—Men had already been used to thinking of their heroes as sons of God. When, therefore, Jesus, a new type of hero, appeared, and men recognized the beauty of his humanity, his devotion, and his disinterestedness, they said, "Here is the true son of God."

What rare and beautiful things did Jesus have a "genius" for?

Ans.—Jesus had a genius for righteousness and love and for religion.

How do we know this?

Ans.—We know that he was quite willing to die for righteousness, love, and religion.

What wonderful power did Jesus show?

Ans.—He showed the power of a good man over evil.

How did he show his power over evil?

Ans.—He faced toil, pain, and death, and changed the evil into good. Thus, after his cruel death, there was more love in the world than there had ever been before.

Can other men exercise this power over evil?

Ans.—Yes, every one who shows good-will in labor and pain, and bears trouble without murmuring, likewise changes evil to good.

What sort of conduct, or demeanor, always overcomes evil?

Ans.—The demeanor of a child of God, who faces the evil and is not afraid of being hurt.

What do many persons say further about Jesus?

Ans.—Many say that he was more than a true man, and even that he was God.

Can anything higher be said of Jesus than to say that he was a true man?

Did Jesus ever claim to be more than a true man?

Ans.—There is no evidence that he ever made such a claim.

Have other true men ever lived and died for the sake of righteousness, love, and religion?

Ans.—Yes, often. Give examples.

Could we love and admire Jesus so well if he had been other than a real man?

What facts bring us into close sympathy with the real Jesus?

Ans.—The facts that he had real temptations as we have; that he had hours of depression and discouragement, when he could not foresee the use of his life; that he suffered from misunderstanding and loneliness.

If he had been God,* as some say, could he ever have been discouraged?

If he had been "the only son of God" from heaven, would it have been any great thing to come into this world for a short life?

What did Jesus really give for the sake of his love?

Ans.—He gave all that he had.

What divine quality is in true love?

Ans.—The love which gives all without grudging is of the infinite nature.

In what sense may Jesus be called the "ideal" man?

Ans.—All men ought to be willing, like Jesus, to give all for the sake of righteousness and love. In other words, the life of good-will which Jesus lived is the largest possible human life.

Was Jesus' idea of life at all new at the time?

Ans.—It was new to most men.

If Jesus' idea of life is the true idea for all, why has it not been more familiar to men?

Ans.—We believe that it was a new or higher step of human growth, or development. Like all new things, it was not at first understood.

Is this consistent with our thought of a growing world?

Ans.—This is precisely what we should expect in a growing world. Thus it is a new stage in the growth of each child when

*The word "God" is here used in the largest sense, meaning the infinite life. It is only in this sense that we may object to calling Jesus God. (See Matt. xix. 17.) In the narrower sense, Jesus taught that all good men may be called sons of God; that is, of the divine nature. (Compare also John x. 34-38.)

he sees for himself what the whole, or "all-round life," is.

XII.

JESUS' TEACHINGS.

Did Jesus intend to establish a new religion?

Ans.—There is no evidence that this was his intention.

Did he teach new doctrines?

Ans.—No, he appealed to what was already in the thought of his people.

Where are his most characteristic teachings?

Ans.—They are mostly in "the Sermon on the Mount" and in a few of the parables in Luke.

How may his teachings be summed up?

Ans.—They are in the two great commandments of love to God and love to man.

Under what familiar name did Jesus think of God?

Ans.—He thought of God as the heavenly Father.

How did he think of men?

Ans.—He held that all men are our brethren.

Whom did he count the happiest people? See the Beatitudes.

Whom did he call the greatest man?

Ans.—He called him greatest who did most good, or served others best.

What did he think the most fatal error?

Ans.—He thought it the most fatal error to be selfish, or, as he expressed it, to "save" one's own life.

What did he think made life most real and abundant?

Ans.—He thought that life grows rich by giving and by loving.

What did Jesus think about property?

Ans.—He held that all things are ours in trust to do good with.

What was the religion of Jesus' people?

Ans.—The Hebrew religion.

What difficulty in the Hebrew religion prevented it from spreading among all men?

Ans.—The Hebrew religion required people to follow certain customs and observances; in other words, people had to become Jews in order to join it.

Did Jesus quite free himself from Hebrew customs and ideas?

Ans.—No: if so, he would not have been truly a man.

What curious ideas were common in Jesus' time?

Ans.—People commonly believed in the coming day of judgment, in a Hebrew Messiah or national Deliverer, and in evil spirits that possessed men.

Did Jesus teach that any of these things were necessary to religion? See the parable of the Good Samaritan; also Matt. xxv. 37-41.

How were Jesus' teachings suited to make a universal religion?

Ans.—The teachings on which Jesus laid stress are such as appeal to men's conscience and their sense of religion everywhere.

Have other great teachers of religion taught like Jesus?

Ans.—Yes, many of the noblest teachings of China, India, Persia, Greece, and Rome, are like Jesus' words. Thus the Chinese Confucius taught the Golden Rule.

What beautiful trait is to be found in Jesus' life and teachings?

Ans.—Jesus is remarkable for his hopefulness and enthusiasm.

How may we sum up his faith, or creed?

Ans.—He held that this is God's world; that is, a divine universe.

How may we sum up his teachings about conduct?

Ans.—He taught men to live as though this were God's world, or to live like children of God.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL MAGNETISM.

BY G. E. LITTLEFIELD.

I wish to urge the "better way" to induce young people to attend religious services, and especially the Sunday-school. The Sunday School Times advocates a "house-to-house visitation" by young people, who shall map out a town or city and organize themselves into such committees that not one man, woman, or child shall fail to receive an urgent invitation to attend church and Sunday-school. This is a good idea; and I believe that, if tried, it will bring great temporary, and perhaps some permanent, results.

Certainly, there are many families in every community which will quickly respond to such a manifestation of social sympathy and interest as this house-to-house visiting; for in every community there are many people who, for one reason or another, have become alienated from their neighbors, and who have a natural longing for recognition and status in the larger life around them. But the fact that they are alienated and have resorted to the by-ways of society betrays them at once as weak in character and affiliated with that army of the unattached called "tramps." They are the very ones whom the church and Sunday-school could help most, and mostly exist to help. And they are the ones who cost the church and Sunday-school more effort in proportion to results than any other class of people they try to reach. Their self-negligence and weakness of character make it very easy to lead them into spiritual pauperism. Almsgiving is now known to foster material pauperism, and the danger in going out into the by-ways with the invitation to attend church and Sunday-school is to nurture the enfeebling idea into their feeble minds that the sole end and aim of the church is to coddle this species of the unfortunate.

There are thousands of these spiritual paupers to-day who have become proud of their condition, feeling that the churches would lose their reason for being if it were not for them. They have acquired the habit of holding themselves for the highest bidder in sentimental church sympathy. And, having visited them, with your bid or invitation, they will play with your whole system of church tactics, coming to a few meetings, then lying back to extort more invitations; and, finally, they will march off with some equally foolish visitor of a rival church to renew their little game.

The Sunday-school should attract, not beg, for attendance. It should be a charmed place for bright, happy children, who seek it with eagerness, not a stall for the reluctant who must be wheedled and coaxed into it.

How can we make such an attractive place and how get the children attracted? Let me answer the last question first.

When Your CAKE Is All Dough

When your cake is heavy, soggy, indigestible, it's a pretty sure sign that you didn't shorten it with COTTOLENE. When this great shortening is rightly used, the result will surely satisfy the most fastidious. Always remember that the quality of COTTOLENE makes a little of it go a long way. It's willful waste to use more than two-thirds as much as you would of lard or butter. Always use COTTOLENE this way, and your cake and pastry will always be light, wholesome, delicious.

Genuine COTTOLENE is sold everywhere in tins, with trade-marks—"Cottolene" and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY, Chicago. 224 State St., Boston. Portland, Me.

There are just four ways to influence people, old and young,—compulsion, persuasion, education, and attraction. Most vigorous, and temporarily most effective, is the method of compulsion. The policeman forces his man to go where he wants him; and in the Concord Reformatory the prisoners all attend church because they are compelled to. But we know this method, which also has much to do with the good attendance at our public schools, will never do for our Sunday-schools. We question how much good the prisoners get from the service they are forced to attend; and we know that compulsory prayers at college were not as religious as voluntary devotion in colleges where this method has replaced the compulsory system. And we also know that the child hardly feels the law behind his school attendance because his parents look upon this attendance as a matter of course, and because he really likes to go to school. The power of the third method of influence is clearly seen here. Education in our country is such a matter of course for every child, and is such a necessity for human welfare, that now all parents are “educated” up to the point where they are not compelled, or even persuaded, to send their children to school. We have seen how the method of persuasion works, in our talk about house-to-house visiting. We saw that the result might have some temporary good, and even some permanent effects. Persuasion is certainly much preferable to compulsion, and, like the latter, is often the only means one can use for quick and preliminary results. I believe in the method of “education” for most lasting results. The man or woman, and even the child, who is trained to attend church and Sunday-school, and who realizes for himself or herself their goodness, will need no continual urging or forcing to do his or her duty. They may not love to go always. It may be that a conflict often comes between the duty of attending Sunday-school and the desire of play or pleasure. But the influence of long habit and education will win every time.

But I have already hinted that my ideal method is the method of attraction. If the child loves his duty, he will not hesitate to perform it. If he loves the Sunday-school, he will be in his place every Sunday. Instead of crying because he must go, he will feel the tears start if he cannot go. The Sunday-school should attract the children to its charming and elevating influences. And now I must answer the second question. How can we make such an attractive place?

I answer, broadly, By lifting the Sunday-school up from the commonplace. “And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me.” As true as this text has been of Jesus, so will it be true in regard to the Sunday-school. If we will lift the whole idea of our Sunday-school up, out of ignoble things, out of the humiliating begging for attendance, out of the compulsory attendance of many, out of the coaxing by petty trifles, trying to bribe interest and attendance, out of the slipshod teaching, out of the general disrespect into which parents and their children have come to regard it, and all together, all together,—mothers, fathers, teachers, and scholars,—resolve that it shall be an hour with Jesus and the children, in the presence of God; if we will lift it up to just as high and consecrated a service as we can make it, spiritual, soul touching soul, and withal human, every child feeling how God loves it, and how in love it should, nay, cannot help, but love God, and, moreover, every soul actively interested in every other, so that the little boy from the byway shall seek out the little boy from the highway, and the young lady from the hill shall confide in the sister from the low lands; if, with all this mingling of human and divine life, there be the seasons of delight in games and picnics, never forgetting through all that above all is the purpose of the Sunday-school,—soul development; if in such an environment, with such a purpose, each officer of the Sunday-school is “lifted up,”—never fear but that Sunday-school will be well attended, and gladly attended, by increasing hosts, who will graduate into the church with that enthusiasm and inspiration and consecration which will make the church also “draw all men unto it.” For such a church will be a medium of life, and humanity will always seek the Life more abundant. And in such a church the good people will meet all who come with cordial helpfulness, so helpful that even spiritual paupers will come to help, so cordial that through heart-love they shall find heart’s ease and happy heaven in Infinite Love.

Literature.

“THE LIFE AND TEACHINGS OF JESUS.”*

To say that Mr. Rogers’s book bearing the above title is in no strict sense a biography, and that it is only certain of the teachings of Jesus which are brought under consideration by him, is to offer no criticism upon the structure of the work, but only to call attention to the difficulty which an author often experiences in his search for a simple phrase which shall at the same time adequately and concisely represent the nature of his treatise. In its method the work before us bears some resemblance to Renan’s “Vie de Jésus” in that it makes a critical study of the gospel sources in preparation for the more constructive portion which is to follow. In the freedom with which these sources are handled there is also a suggestion of the bold procedure of the French critic; but beyond these superficial characteristics the reader finds little to suggest a comparison between the two works. In fact, one who speaks of M. Renan as “playing at religion” is not likely to follow very closely in his footsteps.

Mr. Rogers’s book is pretty evenly divided between his criticism of the Gospels and their sources and his treatment of the sayings of Jesus. In fact, so much of the latter part is critical in its character that the general impression left upon the reader as he closes the volume is of a sifting rather than of an upbuilding process. Yet the whole spirit and temper of the book is reverent, notwithstanding that the author shows little respect for traditional opinion concerning the Gospels, and handles them with a freedom which sometimes seems to threaten their serious impairment as sources of historical evidence.

The chapter on “The Synoptic Problem” is devoted to a somewhat elaborate presentation and illustration of the theory that there is a direct genetic connection between Matthew, Mark, and Luke. In considering the various forms which this theory has assumed, the author begins by altogether rejecting the notion that the Mark Gospel has been derived from either of the other two, separately or together, by a process of abbreviation, since, apart from the fact that it bears the stamp of originality, no reason can be conceived for the making of such a compend as this theory supposes. The contrary supposition that Mark is a combination of Matthew and Luke also has nothing in its favor. Matthew and Luke, again, it is maintained, are altogether independent of each other. When, however, we come to consider whether Matthew and Luke made use of Mark’s Gospel, there is affirmative evidence in abundance. If they had not before them the Gospel in its present form, they at least had access to a document very much like it. But Matthew and Luke must also have been acquainted with a source distinct from our Second Gospel, which source our author speaks of vaguely as “another document” containing many sayings of Jesus. In addition to this it is maintained that there is reason for supposing that Matthew, Mark, and Luke all made use of a common source, and that sometimes Matthew and Luke have preserved for us a primary reading from this source where Mark’s narrative appears rather to be secondary. This source was hardly the traditional logia of Matthew, the apostle, since it contained much historical matter along with the teachings of Jesus, which the logia, as described by Papias, apparently did not. Besides, our Matthew contains professedly historical matter, which from its incredibility cannot well be ascribed to an apostle.

The question of the authorship of the John Gospel is treated at considerably greater length than the Synoptic problem. The author makes known his conclusion almost at the outset “that the Fourth Gospel is in no sense the work of the apostle John.” It is his theory that the writer of the Gospel, instead of being an eye-witness, “is taking facts which he has found in the older Gospels, and is freely using these facts, and transforming them sometimes, so that they shall suit the purpose which he has in view.” A painstaking attempt is made to substantiate this position by careful analysis of a considerable number of important passages, and especially of the concluding portion of the book. Of the various theories concerning the source of the doctrine of the prologue, that one is accepted which ascribes it to Philo in substance, though not in exact form. The last chapter is held to have been written by the author of the rest of the book, and not by a different hand. This author “probably was a presbyter in one of the cities of Asia Minor; but, at any rate, he was a man who had reached a new conception of Christianity, a philosophy of religion, which, as Jesus stood at the centre of it, he wished to carry out in a representation of Jesus’ life; and, in accordance with a very common literary custom, he determined that it should be written in the person of one who actually had lived in Jesus’ time, and who should stand for the religious conception which he had to represent.” The characteristics of the Gospel are summed up in a single paragraph, of which the following is the essential part: “The history, the facts, are not facts at all, but only an outward dress, a picture of the ideas which the author wishes us to see beneath them. The author does not mean them to be accepted as facts, and the very boldness of his attempt shows his ingenuousness. . . . As history, it has no value; but, as the highest expression of religious philosophy which Christianity produced, it will always remain, as Luther called it, ‘the only tender, true, chief Gospel.’ ”

*THE LIFE AND TEACHINGS OF JESUS: A Critical Analysis of the Sources of the Gospels, together with a Study of the Sayings of Jesus. By Arthur Kenyon Rogers. New York and London: G. P. Putnam’s Sons.

In the chapter on “The Credibility of the Gospels” the question of miracle comes up for consideration, with the conclusion that miracles, while not impossible, are historically improbable. There is evidently a decided leaning on the part of the author toward the interpretation of miracle stories as pure myth rather than as legend having an historical foundation; and he follows the current of the time in thinking lightly of attempts to explain the New Testament marvels by hypotheses implying ignorance and mistake on the part of the evangelists or those from whom their material came. This is not the place to break a lance with the author upon this point; but we may note that the statement—“that for an extended healing ministry in Jesus’ life, for anything, in fact, more than an influence over demoniacs, the evidence is very slight indeed”—could only proceed from one who, having explained one class of cases in an historico-critical spirit, then indiscriminately applies to all the rest the presupposition of a mythical origin. As to general credibility, Matthew and Luke are placed far above Mark; and the defence of this position is drawn out with considerable fullness. The more constructive portion of the book, embraced in Part II., will give greater satisfaction to the general reader, who will probably have been somewhat bewildered, even if he has not entirely lost his way in the mazy foreground of critical discussion. In fact, the two parts might well have made two distinct books, so slight is the dependence of the latter upon the former. No doubt the order of the book is the order of the author’s workshop, but plain folk will care more for the completed product than for a presentation of the experience of the workman. The whole book is one of no small merit; but its critical portions appeal rather to those who, already having some familiarity with the subject, are more likely to read with discrimination than to those who for the first time are seeking to place themselves under the influence of the new light which is shining upon the gospel record. G. L. C.

LETTERS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE. Edited by Ernest Hartley Coleridge. In two volumes. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—These handsome volumes make a promise to the eye which is sadly broken to our hope. It must, however, be conceded that the editor makes no promise that his book does not perform. He tells us in advance that letter-writing was not Coleridge’s strong point. A poet of genius, a remarkable talker, a writer fertile in resource, however digressive in his method, when it came to writing letters, the futility which was of the essence of his character made itself manifest. The letters are almost devoid of style, and they are dreadfully diffuse. That they have “Bright gleams of everlastingness” is not to be denied, especially as there are liberal quotations from the author’s poems; and the quotations are the cream of milk that was the purest of the time. It is amusing to see how Southey carries himself as one conscious of his literary immortality; but, when a select edition of his poems was published the other day, the critics said, Cui bono? with spontaneous unanimity. Meantime, with much indifferent matter, there is in the poetical product of Coleridge a residuum that is adamantine to the wash of time. A large proportion of these letters has not been before published; but it is astonishing how little light they

LINCOLN'S

Hesitancy to Marry

BY JOHN GILMER SPEED

His strange sentimental perplexities—how he failed to know his own heart, or whom to marry. In the October issue of

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

10 Cents on all News-stands

The Curtis Publishing Company
Philadelphia

throw upon those points of Coleridge's career which the biographers heretofore have left most in doubt. These are his change from the Unitarianism of Priestley to a position which made him the corypheus of the Broad Church of England party in the period of its adolescence, the development and abridgment of his opium habit, and the grounds of his at first informal, but finally complete, separation from the wife with whom at first he seemed to be serenely happy. All these things are left much as they were before. The beginnings of his opium habit were probably antecedent to those he half remembered, half imagined. That during the last eighteen years of his life, under the Gillmans' hospitable roof, the habit was much abated, if not completely mastered, there can be no doubt. But for a native infirmity of will he would never have been overcome by it, but it made that infirmity much greater. Hence, and from the shame of it, the long dallying in Italy, and the backwardness in facing Mrs. Coleridge after his return; but there can be little doubt that there were other grounds of alienation. Such a wife is easily conceivable as would have lured him home and kept him there, and cured him of his fatal predilection. Many of the letters are taken up with misunderstandings between Coleridge and his friends,—Southey, Lamb, Wordsworth, Lloyd, Colter, and others. He emerges from these as little stained as any of those involved. Generally, some slanderer was at the bottom of the trouble, and suspicious silence carried on his work. As between Southey, with his well-bred dignities, and Coleridge, his great imagination, exacting conscience, loving heart, and feeble will, the choice inclines toward the latter, even if character only is considered. One has only to look at Southey's picture to see that he was bound to be correct, and at Coleridge's to see that his dice were loaded dangerously. The editor has done his work extremely well. His notes are often excellent; but the book should be read with Traill's or Hall Caine's or James Dykes Campbell's biography of Coleridge within easy reach: if all three of them, so much the better. The portraits in these volumes are deserving of the warmest praise.

THE EVOLUTION OF INDUSTRY. By Henry Dyer, D.E., M.A., D.Sc. New York and London: Macmillan & Co: $1.50. The book is a calm, broad, philosophic discussion of the elements which enter into industrial evolution. In his introductory chapter the author broadens the definition of "useful worker" to include all who render efficient social service, whether by pen or pick, whether by voice or hammer or chisel. If this definition were generally accepted, we may agree with him that it would help to reconcile the claims of labor and ability. The second chapter is devoted to conditions of development, and assumes that "in every organized society there can be no rights apart from duties." The conflicting questions of labor organization and social reformation are treated with an evident intention to be fair and judicial. The book is not pessimistic, nor does it make the mistake of believing that everything is just as it ought to be. The writer recognizes the improved condition of individual industry, but believes both from an economic and a moral point of view that the individual system of industry by itself is not sufficient to bring about a stable social structure. Wisely guided, trades-unions are recognized as powerful agencies for good. The writer favors an extension of State control, but only as it makes the work of the individual more efficient, and does not hinder his free development. The writer presents higher ideals of social and industrial organization than we have yet realized, and with a calmness and reasonableness which show that they are not wholly Utopian.

ENGLISH LANDS, LETTERS, AND KINGS. By Donald G. Mitchell. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.—This is the third volume in Mr. Mitchell's series, and takes up the time of Queen Anne and the Georges. It is a pleasant, informal account of the leading writers of the times, giving pen-pictures that will be less easily forgotten than the more serious chapters of a school-book on the history of English literature, and affording admirable supplementary reading for young people. The charm of style does not fail, and we should be doing the writer an injustice if we were to imply that the book is only for young people. While it claims to present neither new facts not adequate literary criticism, it has yet the valuable qualities of holding the reader's interest, even in reviewing lives that are comparatively familiar.

PONY TRACKS. Written and illustrated by Frederic Remington. New York: Harper & Brothers.—It is easy work to follow Mr. Remington's trail. It is so definitely marked that we can't lose it, and we do not wish to. We read as the author rode after Gen. Miles, at a full gallop. The whole volume is full of the life and spirit of the plains. We can smell the alkali dust, see the light of the camp fire among the trees, hear the crack of rifle, the splash of oars, the tread of horses, and the peculiar dialect of the ranchman. The book is made vivid and picturesque by the lifelike and dramatic illustration by Mr. Remington. It is an excellent transcript of life on the plains.

School Books.

Messrs. Leach, Shewell & Sanborn have issued a number of new school-books. Among them are: "The Essentials of Arithmetic, Book 2," by Gordon A. Southworth, superintendent of schools, Somerville, Mass.; "Laboratory Exercises in Chemistry," by Prof. Bartlett of Dartmouth College. The system of vertical penmanship has strong advocates as a new feature in modern school methods. The style of writing is certainly much less stilted than the old schoolmasters' hand, apart from the question of hygienic value. The course comprises eight books prepared by Anna E. Hill, supervisor of public schools, Springfield. The same firm also issue a "First Book in Greek," by Frank Pierrepont Graves, Ph.D., professor of classical philology in Tufts College, and Edward Southworth Hawes, Ph.D., head instructor in Greek in the academic department of the Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn. It is an attempt to make a systematic, brief, and thorough book, which shall be complete in itself, and not require the use of a grammar. It is well arranged according to natural and modern methods.

Miscellaneous.

Messrs. Macmillan & Co. republish Maria Edgeworth's "Ormond," illustrated by Carl Schloesser, with an introduction by Anne Thackeray Ritchie. The interest of the volume is much enhanced by knowing the circumstance under which it was written. "Ormond" was written under the great pressure of anxiety and sorrow of her father's last illness and death. The work received his revision, and parts of it were dictated by him. It was his interest and delight in the work which encouraged his daughter to go on.

Books Received.

TO PUBLISHERS.—All books sent to the CHRISTIAN REGISTER will be promptly acknowledged under the head of "Books Received," with statement of publisher's address and price, if known. But we can guarantee no other return, as the rapid multiplication of new works compels us to limit the number selected for critical notice and review.

- From Ginn & Co., Boston. Selected Essays from Saint-Beuve. With Introduction, Biography, and Notes by John R. Eflinger, Jr. Paper covers.
- From Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston. Last Poems of James Russell Lowell. Price $1.25. Christ's Idea of the Supernatural. By John H. Denison. Price $2.00. Fraill Children of the Air. Excursions into the World of Butterflies. By Samuel Hubbard Scudder. Price $1.50. Townsend Harris. First American Envoy in Japan. By William Elliot Griffis. Price $2.00. The Coming of Theodora. By Eliza Orne White. Price $1.25.
- From Lee & Shepard, Boston. The Laws of Social Evolution. By Rev. Franklin M. Sprague.
- From Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York. Master and Man A Story. By Lyof N. Tolstoi. Jack Alden. A Story of Adventures in the Virginia Campaigns '61-'65. By Warren Lee Gosse. Price $1.50.
- From the American Book Company, New York. Myths of Northern Lands. Narrated with Special Reference to Literature and Art. By H. A. Guerber. Price $1.50.
- From Harper & Brothers, New York. Snow shoes and Sledges. A Sequel to "The Fur-seal's Tooth." By Kirk Munroe.
- A Study of Death. By Henry Miles Alden.
- From Macmillan & Co., New York. A Set of Rogues. By Frank Barrett. Price $1.50.
- From G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. The Red Star. By L. McManus.
- At Tuxter's. By G. B. Burgin.
- From Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Unc' Edinburg. A Plantation Fecho. By Thomas Nelson Page. Illustrated by B. West Cline. Price $1.50.
- A Chosen Few Short Stories. By Frank R. Stockton. Price $1.25.
- A Little Book of Profitable Tales. By Eugene Field. Price $1.25.
- The Mogul Emperors of Hindustan. By Edward S. Holden, LL.D. Price $2.00.
- The Higher Criticism of the Pentateuch. By William Henry Green, D.D., LL.D. Price $1.50.
- From George William Rugby, Chicago. Why not? or Lawyer Truman's Story. By Dr. W. W. Totheroh.

Music Received.

- From Oliver Ditson Company, Boston. Patsy McKim McCann. Words and music by Chas. S. Hill.
- Golden Sunbeams. Schottische. By T. H. Rollinson.
- Merry Moments. Waltz. By Helen Frances Lowe.
- O Salutary Hostia. Music by Sir Jules Benedict.
- Seek ye the Lord. For Soprano and Alto. By A. W. Lansing.

Solved!—The Sunday Evening Problem.

A new plan has been introduced for the Sunday evening service, and it is successful. Wherever used, churches are crowded, the people delighted and instructed in Divine truth; spiritual results are secured and finances helped.

Write for pamphlet, "Solved; or, The Sunday Evening Problem." Read its hints, and the actual experience of pastors who have tried the new plan. It is mailed for the asking. Illustrated catalogue 20 cents.

RILEY BROTHERS,

Branches: 26 Beekman St., New York. BOSTON: 244 Washington St. CHICAGO: 196 La Salle St. KANSAS CITY (Mo.): 515 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS: 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA: 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO: 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND: 411 Couch St.

Standard Piano Methods

"Richardson's New Method."

The new edition. Revised, enlarged, and embodying the latest ideas in teaching, including Dr. William Mason's celebrated system of Touch and Technics. The recognized standard among music teachers. 500,000 of the old edition sold. American or foreign fingering. $3.00.

"New England Conservatory Method."

The official book of piano instruction in this famous school. American or foreign fingering. Three Parts, each $1.50; Complete, $3.00.

"Bellaks' Analytical Method."

Paper, 75 Cents; Boards, $1.00.

"Peters' Eclectic Piano Instructor."

Over 300,000 of this standard work sold. $3.00.

"Mason's Pianoforte Technics."

By Wm. Mason and W. S. B. Matthews. $2.50.

"Mason and Hoadley's System for Beginners."

American or foreign fingering. $3.00.

Any book sent postpaid on receipt of price.

Descriptive Circulars on application.

Oliver Ditson Company

453-463 Washington St., Boston

C. H. DITSON & CO., N.Y.

Ready October 10.

HYMNS

FOR

CHURCH AND HOME WITH TUNES.

The Hymns edited by Mrs. MARY W. TILESTON. The Tunes edited by Mr. ARTHUR FOOTE.

As stated in the preface, "In this collection endeavor has been made to provide an ample number of hymns of thankfulness, joy, and hope, and of active service," and, in the music, "to include, so far as possible, old tunes, whose associations or musical value warrant their retention; and, when a new or unfamiliar tune is given, a more familiar one of the same metre has, if practicable, been put on the opposite page. There will be found a number of English tunes, which, although new to most of our congregations, have been tested by years of use in other branches of the Christian Church."

The book is a square 8vo, of 512 pages, contains 801 hymns, and is handsomely and substantially bound in morocco.

Price, $1.50, with a discount of 20 per cent. to societies introducing the book and to clergymen, to whom a copy will be sent, postage paid, on receipt of $1.20.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

The Pilgrim Fathers in Art.

MESSRS. HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN AND COMPANY take pleasure in announcing a beautiful Holiday Edition of STANDISH OF STANDISH.

By JANE G. AUSTIN, author of "A Nameless Nobleman," "Betty Alden," etc. With twenty full-page illustrations by FRANK T. MERRILL. Carefully printed, attractively bound. 2 vols. 12mo, gilt top, $5 00.

Mrs. Austin's most popular novel of the Pilgrims of the Old Plymouth Colony has been illustrated with fine intelligence and exquisite skill by Mr. Merrill, and the two handsome volumes are every way beautiful and attractive.

THE CHRIST OF TO-DAY.

By GEORGE A. GORDON, D.D., minister of the Old South Church, Boston, and author of "The Witness to Immortality in Literature, Philosophy, and Life." Crown 8vo, $1.50.

A strong, thoughtful book, discussing the problems which confront the Christian thinker to-day, showing that Christ is the supreme instrument of the Spirit in the moral education of the race, and asserting the inseparableness of Christ and Christianity.

THE NIMBLE DOLLAR, WITH OTHER STORIES.

By CHARLES MINER THOMPSON. With a frontispiece illustration. 16mo, $1.00.

This is a group of capital stories, told with a great deal of vigor, and abounding in incidents that boys cannot resist.

THE TOWER, WITH LEGENDS AND LYRICS.

By EMMA HUNTINGTON NASON. 16mo, $1.25.

Some of these poems have gained favor as printed in the Atlantic Monthly and other periodicals. They are varied in subject and form, flowing, thoughtful, and musical.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston.

Webster's International Dictionary

Successor of the "Unabridged."

Specimen pages, etc., sent on application.

THE BEST FOR EVERYBODY BECAUSE

It is easy to find the word wanted.

Words are given their correct alphabetical places, each one beginning a paragraph. It is easy to ascertain the pronunciation.

The pronunciation is shown by the ordinary diacritically marked letters used in the schoolbooks.

It is easy to trace the growth of a word.

The etymologies are full, and the different meanings are given in the order of their development.

It is easy to learn what a word means.

The definitions are clear, explicit, and full, and each is contained in a separate paragraph.

G. & C. MERRIAM CO., Publishers, Springfield, Mass., U.S.A.

The House Beautiful.

By WILLIAM C. GANNETT,

Author of "A Year of Miracle," "Blessed be Drudgery," etc. Paper, ornamental, choice edition, price 15 cents. (In "Life-Studies" form, 6 cents; 10 copies for 30 cents.)

CONTENTS: The Building of the House; House-Furnishing; The Ideal of Beauty; Flower Furniture; Book Furniture; Our Guests; The "Dear Togetherness."

In the cheaper form the edition is neat and serviceable. The special edition, on rich, tinted paper, silk-stitched, with neat, illuminated cover, serves admirably as a dainty remembrance for a friend, and especially to "tuck in with wedding-gifts."

"In 'The House Beautiful,' Rev. Wm. C. Gannett describes, with a rare combination of good sense and poetic insight, the essentials of a beautiful home, giving to flowers, books, and guests, for instance, their due place in its furnishing, while love is the bond that binds all together in gracious influence."—Literary World.

"It is on the side of sincerity, quietness, and simplicity. Meets with our entire approval."—The Critic.

"Where all is so good perhaps there is no best, though to our mind the section on 'The dear Togetherness' is fullest of strength, sweetness, and light. Our readers can procure the little book for themselves; and, if they want to be strengthened and lifted up, they will do so."—The New Unity.

Sent postpaid on receipt of price by

JAMES H. WEST, Publisher, 174 High Street, - - - Boston.

Hymnal.

AMORE DEI.

This Hymnal is steadily making its way into use in a large number of churches, and in all cases gives satisfaction.

If considering a new book, send for sample copies, which will be sent subject to return, if not adopted.

PRICES:

Cloth, 90 cents; Leather, $1.35.

By the dozen, per copy,

Cloth, 75 cents; Leather, $1.10.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

The Essential Man.

A Monograph on Personal Immortality in the Light of Reason.

BY

George Croswell Cressey, Ph.D.

CONTENTS: Preface; I. The Conditions of the Problem; II. The Nature of Man; III. The Persistence of Mind or Soul; IV. The Nature of the Universe; V. Personal Belief; VI. Conditional Immortality; VII. Conclusion.

Price 75 Cents.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Scraps of Travel.

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE.

Under this title Mr. Savage's letters written to the Commonwealth during his last trip abroad have been printed. Although not regularly published, copies in pamphlet form, at 50 cents, may be obtained of

GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

The Home.

A SONG FOR EVERY DAY.

The weary world's a cheery place
For those with hearts to win it.
Thank God, there's not a human face
But has some laughter in it!
The soul that comes with honest mirth,
Though health and fortune vary,
Brings back the childhood of the earth,
And keeps it sound and merry.

The plodding world's an eager place
For those with wit to use it.
Where all are bidden to the race,
Let him who dares refuse it!
The simplest task the hand can try,
The dullest round of duty,
Knowledge can amply glorify,
And art can crown with beauty.

A busy, bonny, kindly place
Is this rough world of ours,
For those who love and work apace,
And fill their hands with flowers.
To kind and just and grateful hearts
The present grace is given
To find a heaven in themselves,
And find themselves in heaven!

—Dora Read Goodale, in the Congregationalist.

POLLY'S MINUTES.

Polly was sewing. At least, she had her thimble and scissors in her lap and a partly hemmed napkin in her hand. But the napkin was being whisked about on the rug for the amusement of Polly's kitten.

The tall clock in the corner ticked steadily, as it had been doing for nearly a hundred years. Polly looked up at its old brass face.

"How slow you are!" she sighed. "Mother said I must sew for an hour, and your hands have only gone half-way around since I began. Can't you tick any faster?" "Tick-tock! Tick-tock!" Really, it was a most aggravating old clock. Presently Polly began to yawn.

"I wish it didn't take sixty minutes to an hour," she thought. The clock ticking was making her sleepy.

"I wish—there weren't—any minutes." "You do, do you?" said a round-eyed, thin-legged Brownie, such as Polly had read about in Mr. Palmer Cox's stories.

"Did you ever see a minute?" asked the little man, before Polly had gotten over her surprise at seeing him.

"No," said Polly, "I never did."

"Come along with me, then." And he led the way toward the clock. Then Polly noticed that the door in the lower part of the clock was open. The Brownie stepped in between the weights and the pendulum, and Polly found that she had suddenly grown small enough to follow him. When they were inside, the bottom of the clock began to go down, carrying them with it as though they were in an elevator.

"Who are you?" Polly asked the Brownie, as they started.

"I am your Time-keeper," he answered. "I live in the clock with the Time-keepers for the rest of your family. I tell your servants what you want them to do."

"My servants!" cried Polly in astonishment; and then she held her breath, for they were going down very swiftly.

Presently they stopped before an opening in the wall of the passage through which they had come.

Through this opening they stepped into a lighted corridor, so long that Polly could not see the end of it. The roof, floor, and walls of the corridor were made of something which looked like yellow sand; and opening off both sides of it were smaller passage ways, from which came a clinking sound, like the ticking of many clocks.

The Brownie led Polly into one of these side corridors.

"Here is one of your servants," he said.

Then Polly saw another Brownie at work with a pickaxe clicked against the wall as regularly as the tall old clock had ticked.

"What is his name?" asked Polly.

"He is called One Hour," answered the Brownie; "and he is gathering minutes, which are of pure gold, and which belong to you. When he has gathered sixty of them, your next Hour will come to work in his place; and this one will take the minutes he has gathered for you, and do with them whatever I tell him to do. Some of them will be made into gold dollars, all stamped with your name. Didn't you know before that 'Time is money'? And, of course, being fairy money, it buys much more than common money does. Happiness and knowledge and goodness and greatness, all can be bought with well-spent time."

"But won't all my minutes be made into gold dollars?" asked Polly.

"Wait and see," said the Brownie.

Presently a bell sounded, like the striking of a clock. Immediately the Hour Brownie threw down his pickaxe, and another Brownie came rushing in to work in his place. But the first Hour put his sixty minutes into a basket, and looked at Polly's Time-keeper.

"Keep fifteen, and throw the rest away," said the Time-keeper; and the Hour ran away with the basket on his shoulder.

"Why did you tell him to throw away my minutes?" cried Polly.

"Because they belong with the wasted minutes," answered the Brownie. "Fifteen minutes of this hour you have used in sewing. Those minutes will be made into fairy dollars. The rest of the time you have spent playing with the kitten and sleeping, and those minutes you yourself have wasted."

"I have been asleep!" exclaimed Polly; and just then she woke up.

"Well," she thought, beginning to sew very hard on her napkin, "those minutes may be thrown away; but this next Hour will have to make every bit of gold into dollars."

And she has been careful about saving her minutes ever since.—The Child's Hour.

STORIES BY GRANDMA.

SOME TERRIBLE ADVENTURES WITH WOLVES.

"Grandma," said Ralph, "what do you suppose Uncle Henry said?"

"Well," answered grandma, "it wouldn't surprise me if he said it was a cold day, or"—

"No: I mean what do you suppose he told me,—what kind of a story?"

"Oh, dear! your Uncle Henry is such a hand to tell stories that I could hardly guess. About animals, I suppose, though; and nothing smaller than elephants, I'll warrant."

"No: wolves. They chased him once. Got away by climbing a tree, and pulling the tree up after him."

"Dear me! What an extraordinary occurrence!" exclaimed grandma.

"But do you believe it, grandma?" asked Ralph.

"Oh, no: certainly not. I never believe any of your Uncle Henry's animal stories."

"Well," said Ralph, slowly, "I've been a little afraid of some of them myself. He couldn't pull up a tree he was in, could he, grandma?"

"I don't believe he could, unless he pulled pretty hard. I remember my uncle Henry used to tell a wolf story when I was a little girl. He said that one day, when he lived in Vermont, two wolves came after him; and he ran as fast as he could. By and by he began to get tired. Just then he came to a big rock, half as big as a house, and leaped upon it. The wolves were close behind, and so furious that they were almost or quite blind. One rushed around the rock one way, and the other the other way. They met on the farther side; and each thought he had caught Uncle Henry, and they began to fight like cats and dogs. Pretty soon they stopped to rest, and saw their mistake; and Uncle Henry said he never saw two wolves look so disgusted."

"Do you believe that story?" asked Ralph.

"Well," answered grandma, "it does seem to have its hard points. I think he may have stretched it a little."

"Tell me a true wolf story, grandma," pleaded Ralph.

"I'm afraid I don't know any more wolf stories,—except the one about Little Red Riding-hood. Once on a time"—

"Oh, I've heard that, grandma. Tell me another about your Uncle Henry."

"Well, another time, when Uncle Henry was living in Vermont, a long time ago, two wolves came and sat down on his door-step. His house was a little log cabin with only one door. It was a very cold winter, with deep snow. So there wasn't much for wolves to eat. These two wolves were pretty hungry; and they thought that they would wait on the door-step till Uncle Henry came out, and just eat him for dinner, and perhaps stir around and get the stage-driver for supper, and depend on luck for breakfast the next morning.

"Uncle Henry happened to look out of the window, and saw the two wolves sitting on the door-step. So he just stayed in, and said nothing. He stayed in and kept on saying nothing for two whole days; and still those wolves sat there, and waited for dinner to serve itself. They were friendly for a long time, and sat facing each other, discussing the weather and other things, I suppose; but, after a while, when they began to get pretty hungry, they had a little tiff, and turned their backs on each other. Then Uncle Henry took a clothes-pin, reached through the crack under the door, and slipped it on their tails where they crossed, just as cool as if he had been pinning a wet stocking on a clothes-line. It held their tails together like a vise. 'Stop pinching my tail,' said one wolf. 'You'—"

"Now, grandma!" broke in Ralph, reprovingly.

"I'm telling this story just as Uncle Henry told it to me when I was a little girl. I don't suppose he meant that the wolf really said that out loud, but thought it, and looked it. 'Let go my tail,' said one wolf; and he scowled over his shoulder at the other. 'Quit pinching my tail,' said the other; and he looked over his shoulder and scowled. Then they sprang at each other, and began to fight as hard as they knew how. Uncle Henry said he never heard such a noise in his life. But, after a while, it became all still; and he went out. But he couldn't find anything except a little wolf fur floating about in the air, and the clothes-pin. So he concluded that they had either fought each other completely out of existence, or got tired out and gone off."—Harper's Round Table.

HOW SUSIE SOLVED THE PROBLEM.

"Yes, Susie is very good in algebra," said mother, a little proudly. She spoke to Grandma Little.

Susie was a neat, pretty girl of sixteen, who had worked very hard to improve her advantages at the village school that she might be of some help to her mother when she had completed her course, as she had done in June. It was now July. Her mother was a widow, who owned their little house and had a very small income besides. She had been compelled to be very economical since her husband died. She had the two children to care for and Susie to keep in school. She was far from strong, but could not afford help, though needing it so much.

Grandma Little was "grandma" by courtesy only. Susie had no living grandparents. This "grandma" was father's aunt, who was very well-to-do, and lived with her well-to-do son. She had always taken an interest in her nephew and his family, and often gave evidence of that interest in some kindly way.

Grandma looked over her spectacles at Susie.

"So she was good in algebra?" she said.

"Yes: good in all her studies," said mother, "and good in algebra especially."

"Did she receive a medal?" asked grandma.

"No, they gave no medals in the school, you know. But her teachers all said she deserved one."

"Well, I shall give her one," said grandmother, decidedly, nodding cheerfully as she spoke. Then she took a bright gold eagle from her purse. "Now, now, Susie, don't be so foolish," she said, as the girl began to protest. "If there's one occasion upon which grandma ought to be allowed to give a little present, it's now, to make the time memorable,—the time when you have become prepared to help your mother and to lead a useful life. Here's the medal, Susie; and here's a problem for you to solve. Let your mother know the answer within a week. How can you use this money to the best advantage by dividing it into two equal parts and procuring something you want very much? Now run along, dear," as Susie kissed her gratefully, "and think it over."

"What use is Susie to put herself to?" asked grandma, placidly. "Will she stay at home to help you, or will she go away to teach?"

"I need her help badly enough, it is true," said Susie's mother; "and I only wish I could afford to keep her at home. But we absolutely need the money she could earn by teaching to help us along until Bobbie here gets to be a man," patting the curly head of the boy who had crept up to her knee. "I wish Susie could find a place in our village school," she continued; "but they want experienced teachers there, so I suppose she will have to be away from home and earn a small salary for a time."

Then the subject was dropped, and shortly after grandma went away. Susie thought over her problem many times during the days that followed. One point was settled from the first. One five was to repay mother for the pretty graduating dress. Susie knew how much her mother had herself needed a new dress, and had taken the five dollars only under the stipulation that it was to be repaid the moment another such bill came into her hands by teaching.

But the other five! Drawing, music, more German lessons, a little trip, some new books,—which did she want the most? All seemed so entrancing. So she pondered for days. Now she had almost decided for music, now for drawing, now for the books. But, amid all her day-dreams, there would come uncomfortable thoughts of the needs about home; and somehow, predominant above all, there stood out to her fancy the form of little Robbie, her eight-year-old brother, in his tattered jacket that called so loudly for a new one in its stead. The more that thought occurred to her, the more it grew in favor, until it took possession of her mind to the exclusion of all other cherished plans. One day, before the close of the week, she rushed into the room where her mother sat, gave her a hug, and put her precious medal into her hands, saying, "Half is for the dress, of course; and the other half for little Robbie's jacket." Then she hurried off. Just five minutes later Grandma Little called.

Grandma's very first question, before she could lay aside her bonnet, was how Susie had solved her problem. When she had learned, she despatched Robbie to find his sister.

"You have found a splendid solution, my dear," she said laughingly, when the young girl had come. "You have a fine head for mathematics. And now let me tell you that I've been solving another problem for you. The first thing my daughter-in-law said to me when I went home a week ago was that she wished she could find a nice, sweet young girl to teach her two little boys. You see the boys are almost too bright and learn rapidly; and they're no very strong, so the doctor thinks they ought not to be confined in school. Harriet says she wants somebody to come for just three days a week; and she'd like some one to help her daughter Alice, too, in her algebra. You see, Alice is a sweet girl, but doesn't take very well to solving problems as yet. I told my daughter-in-law I believed I knew just the person for her. Do take it, dear. You can ride there on the cars in fifteen minutes each day, you'll get a good salary, be with nice people, and you can keep the place for years. Then you can be at home with your mother half the week besides, and help her ever so much. What do you think of my solution of the problem, my child?"

Try the Sunlight way of washing clothes, without rubbing, boiling, without injuring the finest fabric.

Try Sunlight Soap

Don't let another wash day go by without using it. You'll find it will do what no other soap can do, and it will please you in every way.

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson and Harrison Sts., New York.

"I think you have a splendid head for mathematics, grandma," said Susie, as she and her mother together laughed and almost cried for joy.—Mary R. Diefendorf, in New York Observer.

FRENCH.

French would have made only a good-sized armful when he first came to the Washington "Zoo"; but no one would ever think of taking him up in his arms now. More than two years ago he first saw the light in a circus tent, but, being too weak to travel, was given to some ladies in a small Virginia town, who gladly took him, petted him, and carefully brought him up. So healthy a youngster he soon became that before many months he was transferred to the "Zoo," in the fear that, with growing strength, there would develop a temper which would have to be guarded against.

But the savage temper has never made its appearance. A pet with his keepers, he responds to their advances with rough and ready affection that one might expect from a Newfoundland dog rather than from this handsome young lion. With this warm liking for his keepers, and with a large, clean, roomy home, he seldom seems unhappy; and only on hot, sultry days will he go at times to the heavily barred window, and look off over the fields to the distant woods or down the hill to the flowing Rock Creek. Then, perhaps, a dismal roar will sound through the building, startling the other inmates out of their noonday slumbers. But these fits do not last long, for he has never known what real freedom is. At night he frequently joins, with his deep, gruff voice, in the concert that all the animals start up as soon as it is really dark. His roar is so heavy that the very windows rattle; and timid persons, travelling in the darkness, look fearfully about them, and hasten their steps until well out of sound.

French is still too young to be anything more than a puppy in his actions. He might even be called kittenish, were it not for the exceeding clumsiness of some of his motions, so different from the stealthy movements of the tigers and leopards in neighboring cages. When he gets up in the morning, he begins to stretch himself; and, like an elastic band, there seems to be no limit to the space he can cover. After a few minutes spent in exercising each leg in turn, then all of them together, he begins a rapid run round and round the cage, bounding up and down, sideways and backward, coming down with all four feet stiffly stretched out like a frisky calf. This violent exercise completed, French gives several yawns, opening his mouth wide enough for an ordinary man to put his head in, and disclosing strong, white teeth that do not look as if they would ever need the attention of a dentist. After this it is time for "nail-sharpening." So, going over to a small tree-trunk standing upright in one corner of the cage, he proceeds, in regular cat fashion, to perform this part of his toilet.

Every now and then he turns to watch the early visitors before his cage, his beautiful large eyes shining so softly that it seems as if any one might trust the creature. Breakfast time is approaching, however; and no one knows this better than French. He begins to rub against the bars, purring and arching his back whenever any of the keepers pass by. If unnoticed, he waits until one comes along close to the cage, then reaches out a long forepaw and gently taps him on the shoulder. The man turns, and, with a "Well, French, old fellow," reaches out his hand and quietly scratches the lion's head, the creature keeping as motionless as a statue. Once the hand is taken off, however, he becomes alive again, and romps about the cage, showing in every motion his delight at being recognized. This exercise ends with a vigorous chase after the tufted end of his tail, which he finally catches and pretends to bite.

After a meal and a nap, during which he lies stretched out motionless, as if dead, French is ready for play. So he begins to rub against the bars, in order to attract the attention of a keeper. One comes along, and, picking up an oblong piece of wood two inches thick and about eight inches long, throws it into the cage. The lion springs on this as if it were something alive, then gives it a push which sends it spinning across the cage, only to take another leap after it. But his favorite plaything is a big wooden ball, worn now and well gnawed. This he rolls for hours from one end of the cage to the other, sending it spinning with one paw, and catching it on the rebound with the other, making such a racket that nervous persons soon beat a retreat.

In time even this plaything loses its charm; and, letting it roll off into a corner, French lies down for another nap. This time he lies flat on his back, with all four feet sticking up in the air,—a favorite position, but a very funny one to the beholder.—Ernest L. Thurston, in the Congregationalist.

ODD FRIENDS.

Last summer, while in the country, I witnessed a very curious comradeship. It was at a farm-house. The hens had all been carried to another farm, leaving at home a solitary rooster, who had refused to be caught with the rest.

There was a large white cat about the premises; and soon the rooster began to follow her around, talking to her in his rooster fashion.

At first the cat seemed to dislike so much attention, and would hide away, sometimes for hours; but, whenever she reappeared, the rooster would run toward her with great delight, assuming the air of protector and provider. He would look up articles of food, and call her to partake, evidently expecting her to respond.

After a while the two became inseparable during the day; and, even when night came, the rooster would linger around as long as possible before going to roost. Frequently the cat followed him to the shed, and looked up at him on his perch, while he talked to her as if urging her to come up, too.

On this point, however, habit proved stronger than affection; and she slowly wended her way back to the house. But, when morning came, they were always found together again.

The rooster would stand quite still, and allow the cat to rub against him; and she seemed to take care not to rub the feathers the wrong way. It was extremely amusing to watch them, day by day, growing more and more attached to each other. They sat side by side, wandered about together; and, whenever one was called, the other followed closely behind.

When food was given the cat, the two often ate from the same dish. The rooster seemed to take great delight in this proceeding, keeping up a constant chatter, as if encouraging the cat to eat all she could.

Their friendship continued uninterrupted through the entire summer, with none of those misunderstandings and coldnesses which often occur among a higher order of beings. But, when fall came, and the hens were brought back, the rooster left his summer companion, seemingly without regret.—Selected.

GREAT MEN'S OATS.

Among the stories told of great men and their cats, the one which the nurses of Cairo and Bagdad to-day tell to their children about Mohammed and his sleeve is the most beautiful and interesting. One day, as the prophet sat meditating, his cat Muezza came and lay down on the broad, extended sleeve of his garment. The prophet meditated long. The cat, purring and suggesting to her master dreams of Paradise, fell asleep.

The prophet now had to go to his duties. But he could not disturb Muezza's slumber! So he took a pair of scissors, cut the sleeve from his coat, and went his way without it.

When Chateaubriand, a famous French author, was a poor exile in London, his most cherished companions were two kittens, which he describes as "all white, like ermines, with black at the tips of their tails." These cats lost their lives in some way, and Chateaubriand's grief is pathetically recorded in his "Mémoires d'Outre-tombe." He was presented by Pope Leo XII. at Rome with a fine cat named Micezzo, which, however, has no such place in his memoirs as the two kittens of the London lodging-house.

Champfleury, another French writer, has recorded that, visiting Victor Hugo once, he found, in a room decorated with tapestries and Gothic furniture, a cat enthroned on a dais, and apparently receiving the homage of the company.

"That is the cat," said Victor Hugo, "the very fellow that caused Méry to say, as the creature rubbed its back against his legs, 'God made the cat in order to give to man the pleasurable sense of having caressed the tiger!'"—Youth's Companion.

WHERE THE DAY IS BORN.

The maritime powers of the world have agreed to make London the time centre, and the one hundred and eightieth degree of longitude from London (or Greenwich) as the point where the day changes. This meridian, therefore, leads the day. Its passage under the one hundred and eightieth, or midnight, celestial meridian, marks the beginning of a new day for the earth: here to-day becomes to-morrow.

It is here, then, that Sunday is born, just to the west of Honolulu. But bear in mind that the day travels westward. Therefore, this new-born day does not visit Honolulu until it has made the circuit of the globe. Honolulu and New Zealand are only about thirty degrees apart in longitude; but they are a whole day apart as regards any particular day, because the point at which the day changes lies between them. Sunday born on the one hundred and eightieth meridian is a long way off from Honolulu. It is morning there, too, but it is Saturday morning; while in New Zealand it is not yet day, but the Sunday dawn is breaking. It is clear, then, that, if it is Friday (near midnight) at Honolulu to the east of the line, and Sunday (near 1 A.M.) to the west of it, a ship which sails from Honolulu to New Zealand, or from east to west, must sail out of Friday into Sunday, and thereby skip the intervening Saturday, and gains a day; and, vice versa, a ship which sails from New Zealand, where Sunday has begun, to Honolulu, Friday has just ended and Saturday begun, or west to east, must lose a day.—Goldthwaite's Geographical Magazine.

SOME STRANGE VISITING-CARDS.

Calling in Corea must be a very difficult performance, if, as a London journal has recently stated, the ordinary visiting-cards there are a foot square. The same journal goes on to say that the savages of Dahomey announce their visits to each other by a wooden board or the branch of a tree artistically carved. This is sent on in advance; and the visitor, on taking leave, pockets his card, which probably serves him for many years. The natives of Sumatra also have a visiting-card, consisting of a piece of wood about a foot long and decorated with a bunch of straw and a knife.—Selected.

You don't have to use a grater or a rolling-pin to get the lumps out of Bradley's "Yorkshire" Salt

No hardness; no lime; no dirt. You wouldn't put up with poor sugar—why with poor salt? Let us send you a sample bag free to show you salt luxury. Send us your address.

We make all kinds and grades of salt. Whatever price you pay, see that you get Bradley's—it will be the best salt made for the money.

BRADLEY SALT CO.,

49 Jay St., New York. 4 Commercial St., Boston.

“THE POT CALLED THE KETTLE BLACK.”
BECAUSE THE HOUSEWIFE DIDN'T USE

SAPOLIO

Typhoid Fever.

* Rapid Convalescence

is experienced in this slow and dangerous disease, when the patient's strength is properly maintained until the crisis is passed. Don't force the stomach and other organs already weakened by sickness to wear themselves out in a vain attempt to obtain nourishment from improper foods. Feed the sufferer with milk and that great food product. It is absorbed immediately into the system with the least possible effort on the part of the various organs. Besides making new flesh and blood, it strengthens all of the vital centres, enabling them to expel existing poisons. It is a germicide, and antidotes the fever microbes. In addition, its beneficial effect on the ulcerated condition of the bowels, so common in this disorder, is marvellous.

Bovinine

A. P. BUSH, 149 Pearl St.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S
STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

NEWTON CENTRE, MASS.
SCHOOL FOR THE CORRECTION OF ALL
SPEECH DEFECTS. For circular address
E. J. E. THORPE, Principal.

MASSACHUSETTS, Springfield.
MR. and MRS. JOHN McDUFFIE'S School
Formerly Miss Howard's. All grades. Illustrated Catalogue.

PROCTOR ACADEMY, Andover, N.H.

Coeducational. Prepares for College and Scientific Schools. For information address
JAMES F. MORTON, A.M., Principal.

HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS

in the family of Rev. Eugene De Normandie, Danvers, Mass. Address
HENRY N. DE NORMANDIE.

Miss Gibbons' School for Girls.

Preparation for all colleges. 55 West 47th St., N.Y.
Mrs. SARAH H. EMERSON, Principal. October 2.
A few boarding pupils taken.

New York, N.Y., 11 West 86th St.
THE JACOTOT SCHOOL. (adj. Central Park). A Boarding & Day School for Girls. Mlle. Froment, Mrs. C. L. Morgan, Principals.
Fall term begins Oct. 1. Kindergarten begins Oct. 15.

PROSPECT HILL SCHOOL

FOR YOUNG LADIES, GREENFIELD, MASS.

Twenty-fifth Year. Reference, Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D.
REV. JAMES C. PARSONS, Principal.

PERSONAL CARE AND INSTRUCTION

for two or three children with the children of a private family near Boston. Modern methods; large house and grounds, highest references. Address M. R. W., Christian Register.

Situation Wanted

By a young man 18 years old (graduate of Bryant & Stratton's) in some business where faithfulness and application will count for future advancement. Address H. A. E., Office Christian Register.

MONEY WANTED.

I want to borrow money to increase my dairy business on paying lines and improve a good farm. I can give good, safe real estate security, and pay interest promptly. Property steadily rising in value. Address P. J. N., in care of GEO. H. ELLIS, 141 Franklin St., Boston, to whom I am at liberty to refer.

WANTED—A little boy or girl, delicate or otherwise, or an infant from birth, requiring a mother's care, to bring up in a Unitarian minister's family, the members of which are thoroughly domesticated and musical. House in full view of the Atlantic Ocean and beautiful scenery of the harbor, only four miles from Boston. Abundance of new milk and fresh laid eggs. References: Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D., and Rev. E. A. Horton, Boston. Address "X. Y. Z.," Christian Register Office, Boston.

SOLIDARITY.

Shepherd on Dakota's hills
When you drive your flock to shearing,
Sailor on the Carib sea
As your ship is southward steering,
Guess ye where the goal may be?
Fleece and freight shall come to me,
Spite of distance and of veering.

Hands shall pass, but none shall keep
Till into the hand intended
Drop the unknown brother's gift,
And the service-chain be ended.
Spin and weave, then, sow and reap,
Drive the furrow through the deep,
Work of one with all is blended.

Cease the feud of hand and brain.
Tell me which in worth exceeded,
Who first made the duty plain,
Or who best the duty heeded?
No true worker works in vain,
Each shall have his wage again:
All are noble, all are needed.

—William Roscoe Thayer.

REV. GEORGE W. BRIGGS, D.D.

One more of the long pastorates is ended. Only four names now remain on the Year Book of men ordained sixty years ago. By the death of Rev. George Ware Briggs, D.D., on September 10, the Unitarian Church has lost something more than one of its oldest ministers: it has lost one of its most loyal and loving adherents, one of its wisest and most faithful teachers.

With deep reverence for spiritual things, and childlike faith, Dr. Briggs had, also, to a marked degree, fearless independence of judgment. "Both conservative and radical," he jestingly called himself, and truthfully. And in this did he most honor his Church,—that he believed her borders wide enough to make room for the best in all creeds. But little need be said of his theological position. His success as a pastor lay in his personality. His cheery, winning way made his simple, every-day gospel of faith and love and duty an irresistible power, and bound his people to each other and to him by ties that even his death cannot loose. No pastor ever knew better how to speak comfort to the mourner. His keen appreciation of the good, his tender sympathy, and, above all, his intense personal faith in the future life, made his words by an open grave seem nothing short of inspiration. His prayers will be long remembered. So deeply did he realize the significance of the act, and so utterly did he surrender himself in loving, childlike faith, that he lifted his hearers for the moment to his own spiritual level, and taught them the meaning of communion between the human and the Divine.

Dr. Briggs was born in Little Compton, R.I., April, 1810. One of his earliest recollections, and one that made a deep impression upon his childish heart, was over-hearing his widowed mother praying for him. Whatever may have been the special petition of that devout Calvinistic woman, the spirit of her prayer was surely answered in the rare spiritual and moral nature that unfolded in the boy. In return for such farm services as a child could render, he received instruction in Latin and mathematics from Rev. Mace Shepard, the stern Calvinistic autocrat of the town, who, however bitterly hostile he might be to adults who differed from his religious views, had yet a kindly sympathy and a helping hand for boys with intellectual ambitions. At the age of eleven George Briggs entered Brown University, and graduated in the class of 1825. During and after his college course, though only a boy and not a stalwart one, he taught the village school in Little Compton; and it was a great source of amusement to him in after years to be greeted by men much his seniors as their old teacher. He returned to Providence to study medicine, and became acquainted with Frederick A. Farley, who took him to hear Dr. Channing. The result was that he abandoned medicine, and entered Harvard Divinity School.

He was ordained at Fall River in 1834. His second parish was the First Church of Plymouth,—a connection that never ended except in form. Plymouth claimed him from that day. To Plymouth he returned when his work was done, and in Plymouth he was laid to rest. He was settled over the First Church in Salem between 1850 and 1869, and from that time till his death over the Third Church in Cambridgeport. Though he took no active part in pastoral work for the last five years of his life, his parish would not consent to his request for dismissal. But, though he no longer went in and out among them, no pastor ever influenced his people more positively and directly than did Dr. Briggs even from his sick-chamber. And when, after eighteen months, he came back from the border-land between death and life to speak one more word to them, he found them nearer to him, if possible, for the very separation. Dr. Briggs preached only four or five times after the long illness, and left Cambridge finally a year and a half ago. At his daughter's beautiful home, by one of the Plymouth ponds, the last sickness came upon him. After the acute attack he rallied, to wait a little while upon the very threshold of the new life, and to reflect its beauty and peace. The many friends who were privileged to see him then have a picture that fitly crowns their memory of the saintly life.

Dr. Briggs was twice married, to Miss Lucretia Bartlett of Medford, during his Fall River settlement, and to Miss Lucia Russell near the close of his Plymouth pastorate. Four children survive him, two daughters of the first marriage, two sons of the second,—Miss Briggs, Mrs. George Barker, and Mr. George R. Briggs of Plymouth and Mr. LeBaron R. Briggs of Cambridge.

Spiritual Life.

The elements of happiness in this present life no man can command, but over the blessedness of his own spirit circumstances need have no control.—J. Thom.

Whoso neglects a thing that he suspects he ought to do because it seems to him too small a thing is deceiving himself: it is not too little, but too great for him.—E. B. Pusey.

God hides some ideal in every human soul. At some time in our life we feel a trembling, fearful longing to do some good thing. Life finds its noblest spring of excellence in this hidden impulse to do our best.—Robert Collyer.

Give free and bold play to those instincts of the heart which believe that the Creator must care for the creatures he has made, and that the only real, effective care for them must be that which takes each of them into his love, and, knowing it separately, surrounds it with his separate sympathy.—Phillips Brooks.

There is loss, irreparable loss, of manhood in every wrong act that we do, in every wrong thought we cherish, in every inward dishonesty and disloyalty. There is something that repentance cannot do. It cannot undo the past: it cannot blot out our record. If we face our bad acts and our bad deeds as permanent things, there will be a recoil in us from that past; and the recoil will be the power of the Eternal Spirit delivering us.—George A. Gordon.

Education.

It is said that the demand for women to teach the sciences is greater in proportion to the supply than in any other direction. It seems to be the one field of labor not overcrowded.

Prof. Crosby of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology has completed some very important tables for the determination of common minerals by a study chiefly of their physical properties. They are indispensable for private students and for schools where mineralogy is taught.

There is a college for housewives at Walthamstan, Eng., where young women may learn all the branches of domestic work, including cookery, needlework, laundry work, and household superintendence. The name of the college is, appropriately, "St. Martha's." Only ten pupils are received at a time, in order that each may serve her turn as housekeeper, chambermaid, laundress, etc. As the course of instruction includes every household function, from building fires and cleaning lamps to giving dinner parties, the graduate is equally fitted for a housemaid or a house mistress.

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

Two large pies are made from each package of None-Such Mince Meat. For sale by all grocers. Be sure and get the None-Such.

MERRILL-SOULE CO.,
Syracuse, N.Y.

Where there's so much Smoke, there must be some fire. So likewise, when Pearline has had such wonderful success, from the very start, there must be good grounds for it. You won't have to be told what they are, if you're posted on washing compounds. Millions of women have used hundreds of millions of packages of Pearline, and this is why they want it: For making washing easy and at the same time keeping it absolutely safe, nothing has ever been found that can equal Pearline. Quality accounts for Pearline's success. And its success accounts for all its imitations. Only the best thing of its kind is ever imitated.

^ALWAYS refuse imitations.

371 JAMES PYLE, New York.

A College Town Pulpit.

MR. SUNDERLAND'S MONTHLY SERMONS.

50 Cents a Year. 5 Cents a Number. Reduced rates in quantities.

Series for 1894-95.

1. The Soul's Cry for God.
2. Jesus as Humanity's Ideal.
3. Sectarianism: Its Evils, Causes, and Cures.
4. The True Cross of Christ.
5. Was Jesus God? How he came to be worshipped.
6. Loyalty to Conviction.
7. Is Life a Blessing?
8. Robert Ingersoll's Treatment of the Bible.
9. A Religion for a Republic.
10. The Surest Way of Doing Good.

Order from Rev. J. T. SUNDERLAND, Ann Arbor, Mich.

“Unity Pulpit”

SEVENTEENTH SERIES—1895-96.

The publication of Mr. Savage's Sermons has been resumed, and will be continued in "Unity Pulpit" through the season. Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week following its delivery. Subscription price, $1.50 for the series; single sermons, 5 cents.

NOW READY:

1. Some Things which the Church can do for us, and Some Things which we can do for the Church.
2. God in the City.

Send for a specimen copy.

Subscriptions and orders for back numbers or current series should be sent to

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

OLD AND NEW UNITARIAN BELIEF.

BY JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Price, $1.50.

CONTENTS.—Historical Introduction, The Doctrine of Man, Concerning God, The Bible, Christianity, Concerning Jesus, The Future Life, The Great Salvation, Loss and Gain.

"A valuable as well as very readable treatise. . . . The best popular history of Unitarian doctrine that has come to our notice. . . . Mr. Chadwick has most interestingly set forth the rapid transformations of Unitarian belief."—The Nation.

"The best summary of Unitarian history and doctrinal development, and the most radical and optimistic outlook on the future which has yet been produced among us."—Pacific Unitarian.

"A weighty testimony to a notable religious movement from the religion of the letter to the religion of the spirit. . . . His attitude not always that of the contemplative philosopher. . . . his pulse throbs strongly, and quickens that of the reader. There are some passages that belong to the anthology of prophetic literature."—CHAS. G. AMES, in the New World.

"We can here trace the growth of the New Unitarian gospel, see something of the great moulding influences that have shaped and changed it, note the dangers it has encountered, thrill with the warm light of its newly discovered hope, feel ourselves taken into comradeship with its noble army of workers and saints. . . . Decidedly marking a clearer point of vision in the development of Unitarian thought."—The Unitarian.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price, by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

THE UNITARIAN

The "Unitarian" unites

many opinions, many suggestions, many individual methods in one spirit, the spirit of Jesus, love to God and love to man.

CONTENTS FOR OCTOBER.

The Glory of the Present Hour. Rev. Frank L. Phalen.
Perhaps To-day. Rachel B. MacMullin.
Salvation: What it is and is not. H. W. Crosskey, LL.D., F.G.S.
Hidden Treasures. Maud L. Cotton.
Savonarola: A Sketch. I. S. Fletcher Williams.
Somewhere. Philip Falconar Deane.
The Vision of Rabbi Zeb. E. L. R.
Praying to Christ. Martha Perry Lowe.
Toleration in Religion. Edwin Burt Beckwith.
Passing Joy. Elizabeth Hill.
The Growth of Religion.
A Vacation Glimpse of England. J. T. Sunderland.
An Epitaph. C. Leech.
Divinity in Humanity. W. H. Fish, Sr.
The Shrewd Layman.
Types of the Spirit. William M. Bicknell.
The Mist. Hattie Tyng Griswold.
The National Conference.
One Upward Look Each Day.

DEPARTMENTS:

American Unitarian Association, George Batchelor; Sunday-schools, Edward A. Horton; National Alliance of Unitarian Women; Guilds, George W. Cooke; Temperance Work, Christopher R. Eliot; Literary Notes.

Children's Corner.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

. Terms, $1.00 a year. Sample copies free. Will be sent three months on trial for 10 cents.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher, 141 Franklin St., Boston.

Topics of To-day.

Essays and Lectures on Important Themes.

1. HERBERT SPENCER: His life and personal characteristics; his views on education; his religious opinions. By DANIEL GREENLEAF THOMPSON.
2. CHARLES ROBERT DARWIN: His ancestry, life, and personal characteristics. By REV. JOHN W. CHADWICK.
3. SOLAR AND PLANETARY EVOLUTION: How suns and worlds come into being. By GABRIEL P. SERVISS.
4. EVOLUTION OF THE EARTH: The story of geology; how the world grew. By DR. LEWIS G. JANES.
5. EVOLUTION OF VEGETAL LIFE: How does life begin? By WILLIAM POTTS.
6. EVOLUTION OF ANIMAL LIFE: The evidences from geology, geographical distribution, and comparative zoölogy. By ROBERT W. RAYMOND, Ph.D.
7. THE DESCENT OF MAN: Man and the brute creation; his ancestral line; duration of human life on the planet. By E. D. COPE, Ph.D.
8. EVOLUTION OF MIND: The mind and the nervous system; the nature of mind. By ROBERT G. ECOLES, M.D.
9. EVOLUTION OF SOCIETY: Primitive man; growth of the family, city, and State; development of the domestic relations; is society an organism? By JAMES A. SKILTON, Esq.
10. EVOLUTION OF THEOLOGY: Origin of religious beliefs; ancestor-worship; nature-worship; the Absolute. By Z. SIDNEY SAMPSON.
11. EVOLUTION OF MORALS: How altruism grows out of egoism; the proper balance. By DR. LEWIS G. JANES.

Pamphlets, 34 numbers, 16 to 32 pages each, some of them illustrated.

Ten Cents Each.

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,
141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

MRS. LUOY P. THAXTER.

At the memorial service held in Boston, September 25, Mr. William Lloyd Garrison gave the following address:—

The memorial custom of friends gathering together when a loved one has passed from sight has its sanction in that sweet human sympathy and fellowship which a common loss inspires. Although as frequent and familiar as the rise of sun and stars, death rarely comes without surprise or shock. The mystery which every human soul struggles in vain to penetrate again presents itself, and we who wait a little longer for the inevitable summons ponder afresh the problem over the body of the dear friend from whom the spiritual essence that we knew has departed.

It avails little at such times as this to deal in prophecy or dogma regarding the light seemingly quenched. More profitable and uplifting is it to dwell upon the comforting reflections which in bereavement come to sustain and soothe. In the present instance no room is left for regret or sorrow. This is rather an hour for congratulation. Our note should be a psalm of triumph over a long life nobly lived. Death has come simply as an angel of mercy, and opened the door which was the single escape from the pain which medicine could not allay. Blessed is the benevolence and kindness of what the world too long has called the "king of terrors!"

This is a rounded life that we contemplate. Prolonged far beyond the psalmist's allowance, it was rich in deeds and love and association. It had its sorrows and disappointments, as what life has not? and, although grievous to bear at the moment, these trials left traces on the character and spirit of exceeding beauty and value. The mental feebleness of age and loss of faculties were spared our friend. Until at last the burden of the body became unbearable, she kept her youthful nature and her exceptional charm.

It is a pleasure to tender the loving tribute which Mrs. Thaxter deserves from four generations of a family whose tender regard I can but feebly voice. Nearer than kith and kin are friendships founded in unselfish ideas. No bonds are closer than those of the reformer. By birth and circumstances she was an abolitionist, born into the heat and tumult of the great struggle of the age. She was nurtured amid scenes which are now a part of history. Not far away from her home occurred the persecution of Prudence Crandall, in which race prejudice and hatred had a national illustration. In Brooklyn, Conn., Mrs. Thaxter's native place, lived in her girlhood that saint among men, Samuel J. May, the friend and minister of her family. There also came the leader of the anti-slavery movement to woo and marry his gentle wife among that group of earnest coadjutors whose faithfulness never relaxed.

Our friend became a reformer from conviction not less than from inheritance, and in her maturing days performed the service which freedom demanded in the fast-pressing crises, when the land was saved not alone by public workers, but also by that army of unrecorded men and women who in their sphere and place proved "worthy of the great adversity."

Into what noble and continuing companionship this led we know. Of Parker and Garrison, of Phillips and the Mays, of James Freeman Clarke and John A. Andrew and their lofty kind, she was esteemed and beloved. And if, across the invisible line, the spirits of the just made perfect exist, what welcome must be hers!

I hardly know how to touch the tender relation of marriage which, after years of teaching that must have been an inspiration to her pupils, brought to Lucy Scarborough a husband mated to her needs in principle and affection. It was the rarest union. Theodore Parker was the chosen minister to declare the bond. To my younger ears, when people spoke of "Daniel and Lucy," it seemed like an allusion to a single nature, so closely were they identified in aim and love and service. How cheery and comforting their presence was in sorrow! They ever kept the bright side of life in prominence, generating an atmosphere of hope and courage.

Children were not to be their portion; but parental instinct and benevolent impulse prompted them to adopt her niece for a daughter, whose devotion was the blessing of their declining years. The death of Mr. Thaxter tested the faith and philosophy of his inseparable wife; and, if, for a time, the clouds obscured her life, and happiness without him seemed impossible, the long struggle at length brought victory, and again she took up bravely the daily tasks and duties. "The flesh will quiver when the pincers tear."

One could take this noble woman's life as a theme whereon to weave the story of the century, the thrilling part of which was covered by her years. The overthrow of slavery, the emancipation of woman, the theological revolution, the Transcendental epoch, the nation's literary development, all left their impress on her thought character. Her death closes an era unparalleled in interest. She had the felicity of living near to the heart of humanity, and felt

"The solemn pulses sending blood Through all the wide-spread veins of endless good."

"All I have seen," said Emerson, "teaches me to trust the Creator for all I have not seen. Whatever it be which the great Providence prepares for us, it must be something large and generous, and in the great style of his works." More than this it is not necessary to say. Grateful for a life so useful and fragrant, let us carry away the impress of its loving faithfulness and strength.

THE SUFFRAGE "REFERENDUM."

The Massachusetts Association opposed to the Extension of the Suffrage to Women to the People of Massachusetts:—

The Wellman bill, enacted by the last legislature, gives the opportunity to all men and all women qualified to vote for members of school committees to express in November their opinion on the question, "Is it expedient that municipal suffrage be granted to women?"

This bill is not rightly called a "Referendum"; for it proposes no change in our laws, but provides merely for an expression of opinion by vote. Its practical result will be its influence on future legislatures.

We urge the duty upon all women to interest themselves in this question, and to aid the formation of a right public opinion thereupon; and we call upon all men voters to justify the present suffrage status by an overwhelming "No" at the polls in November.

We do not urge women opposed to the further extension of the suffrage to vote. We affirm that the burden of proof rests with the Suffragists. We declare that the silence of our sex at the polls will not mean consent, but opposition or indifference.

We find tangible proof that the women of this State do not desire the ballot in their general indifference to school suffrage, which has failed to rouse their zeal and interest during the many years of its existence; while some time before such suffrage was established the valuable services of women on the school boards had been secured by the votes of men.

We believe that the extension to women of municipal suffrage would be a danger to the State for which no compensating advantages are shown.

We believe the present division of labor and responsibility between the sexes to be founded on reason and on the laws of nature; and, while freely admitting that a higher standard of patriotic and civic duty is needed by both men and women, we affirm our belief that it must be brought about by an advance in civilization and in education, and that this advance would be impeded rather than helped by the complications resulting from municipal suffrage for women.

Mrs. James M. Codman, Miss Sarah H. Crocker, Mrs. James C. Fisk, Mrs. Charles E. Guild, Miss E. H. Houghton, Mrs. Francis C. Lowell, Mrs. Oliver W. Peabody, Mrs. Philip H. Sears, Mrs. William T. Sedgwick, Mrs. G. H. Shaw, Miss E. P. Sohler, Mrs. Henry M. Whitney, Executive Committee.

Here and There.

The longest Egyptian railroad now extends to Girgeh, 326 miles from Cairo. It is soon to be extended to the first cataract, 710 miles from the coast. This means, of course, an ultimate railroad connection with the British possessions in South Africa.

Mr. Dymoke Tyrwhitt, the last hereditary champion of England, died recently. It was his office at a coronation to ride equipped in full armor into Westminster Hall, and challenge any one who refused to take oath to the sovereign. His every-day business was more prosaic: he was assistant manager of a railroad.

Don't Scrub

your silverware, it's hard work, useless work, and besides, injures your ware. The easy way of cleaning it is by using

SILVER
ELECTRO-SILICON
POLISH

that does it quickly and without scratching or wearing it.

Isn't the easy way worth trying?

Enough for trial for the asking or box post-paid, 15 cts. in stamps. It's sold everywhere.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh
ANCHOR, Cincinnati.
ATLANTIC, New York.
BEYMER-BAUMAN,
Pittsburgh.
BRADLEY,
New York.
BROOKLYN,
New York.
COLLIER,
St. Louis.
CORNELL,
Buffalo.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS,
Pittsburgh.
ECKSTEIN,
Cincinnati.
FAHNESTOCK,
Pittsburgh.
JEWETT,
New York.
KENTUCKY,
Louisville.
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS. CO.
Philadelphia.
MORLEY,
Cleveland.
MISSOURI,
St. Louis.
RED SEAL,
St. Louis.
SALEM,
Salem, Mass.
SHIPMAN,
Chicago.
SOUTHERN,
St. Louis and Chicago.
ULSTER,
New York.
UNION,

The Reason

why some dealers try to sell, and some painters use, other than genuine brands (see list) of White Lead is that their first cost is less. Quality should be the first consideration, and is the true economy.

For colors, the National Lead Co.'s tinting colors are especially prepared for tinting Pure White Lead to any shade required.

For pamphlet and color-card—sent free—address

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,

1 Broadway, New York.

SUPERIOR TO ALL OTHERS.

ONE OF MANY REASONS WHY.

If it had no other original designs than the simple, practical one of re-wicking here illustrated, the

Miller Lamp

Might reasonably claim superiority. But there are several others you can learn about by sending for our ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE, free to all addressing

EDWARD MILLER & CO.,

Mill and Factories, Meriden, Conn.

63 Pearl Street, Boston.

Literary Lectures

—FOR—

UNITY CLUBS, WOMEN'S ALLIANCES, Etc.

By Rev. GEO. H. YOUNG

—ON—

Louisa Alcott. Charlotte Bronte.
George Eliot. Jane Welsh Carlyle.
Dorothea Dix. Margaret Fuller.
E. B. Browning. Jane Austen.
Alice and Phoebe Cary.

For circulars and terms address

LAWRENCE, MASS.

Series of attractive lectures.—Lawrence American.
Delightful lectures.—Lawrence Eagle.

Large and select audience gathered to enjoy the literary treat offered. Mr. Young is a very interesting speaker, and held the attention of his audience closely. All who listened to this lecture will be anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity offered for the remainder of the course.—Portsmouth Times.

Mozoomdar's BOOKS.

The Spirit of God. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. 323 pages. Cloth, $1.50.

An idea of the work may be gained from the titles of the chapters: The Spirit, The Hindu Doctrine of the Spirit, Doctrine of the Spirit in Christianity, Sense of the Unseen, The Spirit in Nature, The Kinship in Nature, The Spiritual Power of the Senses, The Spirit in Life, The Spirit in the Spirit, The Spirit in Immortal Life, The Spirit in Reason, The Spirit in Love, The Spirit in Conscience, The Spirit in Christ, The Spirit in History, The Spirit in all Religions, Live in the Spirit.

Heart-Beats. A Book of Meditations.

By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. With Portrait and Biographical Sketch of the Author. Cloth, red edges, $1.50; white, full gilt, $2.00.

Its poetic title is suggestive of its contents. It is a collection of brief paragraphs, which are not so much the scintillations of the intellect as poems of the imagination and pulsations of the heart. It is an illustration of the lofty heights to which devotional sentiment may rise, free from all tinge of superstition.—Christian Register.

The Oriental Christ. By PROTAP CHUNDER MOZOOMDAR. New Edition. 193 pages. Cloth, $1.25.

The existence of this book is a phenomenon;—more than a curiosity; and rich as a new, fresh, and very suggestive study of the character and person of Christ.—Christian Union.

For sale by booksellers, or sent, postpaid, on receipt of price by

GEO. H. ELLIS, Publisher,

141 Franklin Street, - - - Boston.

Register Tract Series.

- No. 1. MY NEW NEIGHBOR. By Rev. W. H. Lyod. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 2. THE CONGREGATIONAL METHOD: How it is worked and how it ought to be worked. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 3. BEHOLD THE MAN. By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 4. PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY. By Rev. Charles A. Allen. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 5. AMERICAN UNITARIANISM: Its History and Development. By Rev. Edward Everett Hale. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 6. CHURCH ORGANIZATION. By Rev. William I. Lawrence. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 7. OF MAKING ONE'S SELF BEAUTIFUL. By Rev. William C. Gannett. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 8. THE JUDGMENT: The True Doctrine of the Judgment Individual and Universal. By Rev. William R. Alger. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 9. THE BREATH OF LIFE. By Rev. H. M. Simmons. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 10. WHAT DOES THE UNITARIANISM OF TO-DAY STAND FOR? By Rev. W. P. Tilden. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 11. LIBERAL CHRISTIANITY AS MOTIVE-POWER. By Rev. E. A. Horton. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 12. MORALITY IN THE SCHOOLS. By William T. Harris, LL.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 13. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY: The Old Unitarianism and the New. By Rev. O. C. Everett, D.D. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 14. WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT IN RELIGION? By Rev. M. J. Savage. $2.00 per hundred.
- No. 15. A SOUL WITH FOUR WINDOWS OPEN. By Rev. James Leonard Corning. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 16. SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY THE GROUND OF ALL RELIGION. By Francis E. Abbot, Ph.D. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 17. REMEDIES ABOUT WHICH GOOD MEN MIGHT GRIEVE. By William M. Salter. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 18. HOW WE HELPED OUR MINISTER TO WRITE GOOD SERMONS. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 19. FOUR SERMONS ON REVIVALS. By Rev. S. M. Crothers. $3.00 per hundred. Single copies, 6 cents.
- No. 20. THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER TO A YOUNG MAN. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 21. THE THEOLOGY OF THE FUTURE. By Rev. James Freeman Clarke, D.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 22. THE RESTRICTION OF VIVISECTION. By Albert Leffingwell, M.D. 50 cents per hundred.
- No. 23. A WORKING THEORY IN ETHICS. By Rev. J. H. Crooker. $1.50 per hundred.
- No. 24. THE CHRISTIAN UNITARIAN POSITION, DOCTRINAL. By John Hamilton Thayer. 60 cents per hundred.
- No. 25. THE NEW BIRTH AND THE NEW TYPE OF MAN. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 26. THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. By Rev. W. H. Furness. $1.00 per hundred.
- No. 27. SHORT AND LONG VIEWS. By Rev. Charles F. Dole. $1.00 per hundred.

Sent post paid on receipt of price by

CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION.

141 Franklin Street, Boston.

Theodore Parker to a Young Man.

This letter from Theodore Parker, to a young man just starting out in life, was first printed in the Christian Register in 1885, and afterwards in leaflet form. It has been some time out of print, and yet, from its straightforward, manly tone in relation to life, duty, wealth, study, religion, is still called for as a very available tract to be handed to boys and youth. It is now entered permanently in the Register Tract Series, and may be had at any time.

Single copy, 2 cts.; per hundred, 50 cts.

Address Christian Register Association,
141 Franklin Street, Boston.

CHURCH CARPETS

AT MANUFACTURERS' PRICES. 658 WASHINGTON ST. OPP. BOYLSTON ST. BOSTON.

Pleasantries.

"What's that terrible cry I hear?" "Oh, that's our college yell!" "It must be a college of dentistry."—Puck.

From a child's composition: "The climate of Palestine is very hot and mountainous, especially where the country is flat."

Conductor: "Settle now, or get off." Dignified Citizen: "What do you take me for?" Conductor: "Fi' cents, same as anybody else."—The Presbyterian.

Bavis: "Magnificent library you have!" Davis: "Yes. When I think of the pile of money I've sunk in those books, it makes me feel quite intellectual."—The American.

Tommy: "When I'm a man, I'm going to be a soldier." Mother: "What! and be killed by the enemy?" Tommy: "Oh, well, then I guess I'll be the enemy!"—Yale Record.

"Ma," said a discouraged urchin, "I ain't going to school any more." "Why, dear?" tenderly inquired his mother. "'Cause 'tain't any use. I can never learn to spell. The teacher keeps changing the words every day."—Pittsburg Bulletin.

A physician says, "Girls in feeble health should take a tramp through the woods or fields every day." But suppose a tramp should object to being taken through the woods and fields every day by girls in feeble health?—The Christian Work.

Editing under Difficulties. "Little Sister: "Most of the articles in your paper this month is awful poor." Little Brother (editor of amateur paper): "I know it, but the boys that wrote 'em sent stamps for their return; an' I needed the stamps."—Tit-Bits.

A certain little three-year-old likes very much to go to church, and especially enjoys the singing. One day the choir sang "Rock of Ages, cleft for me"; and after she got home the little one was heard singing, very seriously, "Rock the babies kept for me."—Evangelist.

William M. Evarts was going up once in the elevator at the State department which was loaded with applicants for ministerships and consulships. Turning to a friend, who accompanied him, Mr. Evarts said, "This is the largest collection for foreign missions that I have seen taken up for some time!"—The United Presbyterian.

The late Dr. Poor, Presbyterian missionary in Ceylon, was a man of a pleasant humor. During one of the periodical epidemics of cholera which swept Ceylon Dr. Poor was violently attacked. A messenger was at once despatched for Samuel P. Green, M.D., a medical missionary residing about five miles away. When Dr. Green came into the room, Dr. Poor exclaimed, "Well, this is a bad prospect: here is a Poor patient and a Green doctor." This was his last witticism.—N.Y. Observer.

State Abbreviations.—The most egotistical of the United States, "Me."; most religious, "Mass."; most Asiatic, "Ind."; father of States, "Pa."; most maidenly, "Miss."; best in time of flood, "Ark."; most useful in haying time, "Mo."; decimal State, "Tenn."; State of exclamation, "La."; most astonishing State, "O."; most unhealthy State, "Ill."; State to cure the sick, "Md."; State for students, "Conn."; State where there is no such word as fail, "Kan."; not a State for the untidy, "Wash."—Youth's Companion.

A DESIRED DEGREE.

A young minister settled over a small country parish was instructed by his parishioners to procure a piano for their use. He did so, telling the dealer to charge the bill for rental to the secretary of the parish. When the bill amounted to $25, the society being unable to pay it, as well as the salary of the pastor, the music-dealer dunned the minister for the money, telling him that he assumed the responsibility. The latter replied that he never assumed the responsibility of another, having all he could do to pay his own bills, whereupon the dealer threatened to sue him.

A short time after our friend received a letter from a New York collection agency, to which, as well as several following, he paid no attention, until the following short but definite letter came:—

"Rev. ———:—

"Dear Sir,—Unless you remit at once, we shall publish you all over the country as a Delinquent Debtor.

"Yours, etc.,

"———,"

To which he replied:—

"Gentlemen,—Ever since I entered the ministry I have been struggling for the title of D.D. Go ahead.

"Respectfully,

"———,"

—The Budget.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB'S TOURS.

ALL TRAVELLING EXPENSES INCLUDED.

ATLANTA EXPOSITION

Parties will leave BOSTON for ATLANTA October 2, 8, 14, 16, 22, 28, and 30; November 5, 11, 13, 19, 25, and 27; and December 3, 9, 11, and 17.

Visits to Chattanooga, Lookout Mountain, Washington, etc. An entire week in Atlanta, with headquarters at the Kimball House, Warren Leland, Jr., manager. A Choice of Routes.

Autumn Tour to Southern California Oct. 22. Other Tours to California Nov. 19, Dec. 10, Jan. 7, Jan. 23, Feb. 11, and Feb. 13.

Tours to Mexico in January and February.

Tours to Europe in January, February, March, etc.

Independent Railroad Tickets via the Boston & Albany and Other Principal Lines; also Steamship Tickets to all points.

Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular trip desired. (Special circular for Atlanta tours.)

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB,
296 Washington Street (opposite School St.), Boston.

Dark places show where there is extra thickness of silver.

'1847 Rogers Bros. XII'
Silver Plate that Wears.

Especially suitable for gifts, as the quality is so well known. "1847" is the guarantee of original Rogers goods. "XII" means—three times the usual thickness of silver where most needed. Be sure of the right trade-mark.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO., Meriden, Conn.
203 Fifth Ave., New York.

Silk Thread Holders.

INVALUABLE TO USERS OF FINE & FLOSS SILKS

FOR ART NEEDLE WORKERS.

This holder protects the skein from becoming snarled or soiled until the last thread is used. Ask your dealer for our wash silks in these new patent holders.

One Sample Skein Only, sent postpaid to any address on receipt of five cents in Stamps. Once used, you will always buy your silk in this holder.

Balnerd & Armstrong Silk Co.,
2 Union St., New London, Conn.

Foundry established in 1790 by PAUL REVERE.

BELLS and CHIMES

of Copper and Tin.

BLAKE BELL CO.,
Boston, Mass.

The MAGEE Boston Heater

FOR WARM AIR ONLY, and the MAGEE COMBINATION HEATER here shown (for warm air and Hot Water), each received THE HIGHEST AWARD at the World's Fair, Chicago.

They are honestly, carefully and intelligently made for USE, not merely to sell.

No one can afford to keep house without a Magee Range and Furnace, because the saving in fuel and food will pay many times their cost above any others on the market.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.

The name Magee carries our Guarantee of PERFECT SATISFACTION with proper use.

DESCRIPTIVE CIRCULARS FREE.

For Sale by Leading Dealers Everywhere.

MAGEE FURNACE COMPANY, 32, 34, 36 & 38 Union St., Boston.
242 Water Street, New York.
86 Lake Street, Chicago.

Hot Water Combination.

DURKEE'S SPICES

THE WELL KNOWN "GAUNTLET BRAND"

EXCEL IN PURITY, STRENGTH & FLAVOR.

GEO. H. ELLIS,

Printer,

141 FRANKLIN ST.

BOSTON.

CHANNING BUILDING.

WITH extensive, light, and commodious rooms, large and fast Presses, embracing all the latest improvements, Type-setting Machines, new and modern material throughout, the Establishment ranks with the best in the City for the execution of Letterpress or Plate Printing.

BOOKS

PAMPHLETS

NEWSPAPERS

MAGAZINES

SERMONS

CATALOGUES

REPORTS

LAW WORK

AND EVERY VARIETY OF

Mercantile and Job Printing.

Excellence in Workmanship.

Promptness in Delivery.

The Pamphlet Bindery, included in the office, is furnished with every facility for rapid and good work.

The Christian Register

Liberty, Holiness, Love.

VOLUME LXXIV.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1895.

NUMBER 41.

The Christian Register.

TERMS: $3.00 per year. Single copies, 6 cents.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY THE
CHRISTIAN REGISTER ASSOCIATION,
141 Franklin Street, Boston, Mass.

Entered as second-class mail matter.

Contents.

EDITORIAL.	PAGE
Notes; The Pathway for the Negro,	641
Overwork; True Patriotism,	642
MUSINGS,	642
BREVITIES,	642
PRO AND CON.
The Approaching National Conference; Missionaries in Japan,	643
ORIGINAL AND SELECTED.
Among the Unitarians of Hungary, I., by Rev.
William H. Lyon,	643
The Future of the Negro, by Booker T. Washington; The Southern Press,	644
Conference Notes,	645
National Conference Delegates,	646
Contributions to Unitarian Sunday-School
Society,	647
The Need of Missionary Work, by Rev. J. M.
Scott,	649
Robert Beverly Hale,	654
Woman Suffrage; Woman Suffrage Literature, .	655
RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE,	645
THE PULPIT.
Justice and Charity, by Rev. W. F. Slocum, . .	648
THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL,	649
LITERATURE.
Harper's "Book of Facts"; "Hymns for Church and Home"; Other Book Notices,	650
Magazines; Literary Notes; Books Received, .	651
THE HOME.
A Castaway, by Robert Palfrey Utter; The
Little House in the Woods,	652
A Troublesome Plant; Some Novel Races, . .	653
POETRY.
At Dawn of Day, by Isabel Francis Bellows, .	643
Sonnet,	648
The Old Folks of the Town, by Edward N.
Stone,	652
To Sleep, by Thomas I. Hogan,	654
SPIRITUAL LIFE,	654
EDUCATION,	654
HERE AND THERE,	654
TEMPERANCE,	655
PERSONALS,	655
PLEASANTRIES,	656

Editorial.

THE Armenian situation seems to grow steadily worse. Within the last week Constantinople has been the scene of bloody riots. A detachment of Armenians who were going to present a petition to the minister of justice were fired upon and killed. The Armenians were attacked in their own quarters by the populace, and the number killed is said to have reached a hundred and fifty. That many of the Armenians were armed does not render the slaughter any less reprehensible. It is not to be supposed for a moment that the Armenians, who were peaceably carrying a petition to the government, carried arms for any other reason but self-defence against the uncontrolled Turkish hordes in Constantinople, which broke loose upon them, supported by the Turkish soldiers. Meanwhile the condition of the fugitives from Sassoun is one of abject destitution. From a communication just received from the Duke of Westminster, forwarded through Mr. Edward Aitkin, the secretary and treasurer of the Armenian Relief Committee, it is stated that Mr. Hallward, the English vice-consul at Van, testifies to an enormous amount of destitution, which will certainly increase before next winter. This applies also to the province of Bitlis and a large extent of Erzeroum, where there are survivors of the Sassoun massacre. "A year ago these people were comparatively prosperous and comfortable, but are now barefooted and in rags, begging their daily bread from those who are not much better off than themselves." We repeat the appeal for aid which has already been made, and remind our readers that any amounts, large or small, may be sent to Lee & Higginson, State Street, Boston, and, in New York, to Mr. Spencer Trask, 27 Pine Street.

THE Texas legislature has decided that it will not have prize-fights in that State, and the vote is so decisive that there cannot be any doubt as to what the legislature means. In the Senate the vote was twenty-six to one, in the House, one hundred and seven to five on the bill prohibiting prize-fighting. Hearings were given to the opponents of the bill, some of whom argued that such a law would be detrimental to the business interest of Dallas, where the fight was to be held. But the legislature does not seem to have been much swayed by these considerations. The bill makes prize-fighting a felony, and imposes a punishment upon the principals for every infraction of the law by imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not less than two and not more than five years. Prize-fighters have found it hard to find a place in the United States where they could conduct a fight under the protection of the law. Texas is a big State; but it proves to be a little too big for such purposes. It is but a little while ago that it was considered a land of rangers and cow-boys, where prize-fights and duels might flourish like cacti; but this action of the Texas legislature will create a different impression, and the prize-fighters will probably have to go over the borders into Mexico.

THE discussion on woman suffrage assumes a new phase of interest in Massachusetts this fall from the fact that the people will have an opportunity of expressing their opinion about it at the polls, women as well as men being entitled to vote "Yes" or "No" on the question. There will be less interest in the vote, however, than if it really settled the question in this State. But, as a matter of fact, the result one way or the other does not confer or withhold the right of suffrage. The real responsibility rests with the legislature, and it is there that suffragists must direct their energies. In the interest of free discussion we have printed appeals and protests for and against the movement. There are influential and weighty names on both sides; and in this direction the names are so well balanced that they may be said to practically neutralize each other, so far as character, respectability, and prominence are concerned. But this fact tells far more for woman suffrage than it tells against it. Twenty-five years ago the showing would have been quite different. Then the suffragists stood in a small minority. Slowly but steadily their cause has grown in influence, until they can point to a splendid roll of names the country over. A movement thus honorably supported can no longer be considered as erratic or dangerous. It is not at all likely that Massachusetts is as yet prepared to cast its vote affirmatively on this question. But the preliminary discussion which has already begun will be more important in the way of educating the people than the vote itself. It is on this education that the suffragists must rely. For many years, covering the administration of four successive editors, the Christian Register has stood for woman suffrage; and in that time the cause has slowly gained notable victories. There seems to be no reason now for changing its course, and but little need of reaffirming its position.

BISHOP HUNTINGTON of New York, in an article in the Churchman of September 21, says, "A few years ago it struck the churchman as humorously grotesque that a Congregational conference appointed a committee of supposed experts to write a 'Confession of Faith' for a denomination which had been in existence a couple of hundred years." It may be owing to a deficiency of the sense of humor that we are not able to perceive the "humorously grotesque" element in the fact that a religious body finds it desirable to give some new expression to its faith. It strikes us as much more humorously or melancholy grotesque that a religious denomination, whether Congregational, Episcopalian, or Presbyterian, should continue to publish and advertise statements of religious faith which one-half or two-thirds of its members have outgrown, which they could not possibly accept in the sense in which they were originally written. Thus the Presbyterian Church is carrying about the cumbersome burden of the Westminster Confession. The doctrines of the damnation of infants and the damnation of the majority of the race taught or implied in that confession, however sweet they may have been to the men who framed them, have become offensive enough to the greater majority of those who are enrolled in the Church which professes them. The incongruity, be it sad or humorous, does not seem to be in the earnest desire of progressive Presbyterians to get rid by revision or burial of these distortions of Christianity, but in the strange tenacity of those who wish to preserve them and preach them to-day. It is grotesque enough that a gospel of despair should be called a gospel at all.

LIKEWISE the Episcopal Church reveals similar incongruities. It has been overweighted with the Athanasian Creed. Its Thirty-nine Articles do not present the belief of the majority of its communicants. They teach the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, and pronounce a curse upon those that presume to say "that every man shall be saved by the law or sect which he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that law and the light of nature." There are many good Churchmen who would like to get rid of all these anomalous excrescences on their own confession of faith. There are some, like Canon Page Roberts of London, who refuse to read the Athanasian Creed in their pulpits, and who put the stamp of their individual reprobation upon creeds and confessions which are but the cinders of old theological discussion, and cannot be made to burn upon the altars of religion to-day. However grotesque it may seem to the bishops who wrote the Pastoral Letter that Canon Page Roberts should remain in the Church, and undertake to revise its creeds and confessions on his own account, or that Rev. Mr. Oxford of London should prepare a hymn-book and a service-book for the use of his people, it seems far more grotesque to continue to teach under conciliar authority doctrines which are a parody on the teachings of Jesus and the faith once delivered to the saints.

WE can heartily go with Bishop Huntington, however, in his "Plea for Simplicity." Our Puritan fathers, in their reaction from tawdry ceremonial and meretricious display, went too far, as did the Quakers, in excluding the element of the beautiful in worship. And it has taken Congregationalism some time to recover from this formless rigidity. But a marked tendency in the Episcopal Church to-day is toward a complex and pompous ritualism. It is in danger of running into the externalism which has been one of the besetting sins of the Catholic Church. Against this tendency Bishop Huntington protests in the elegant diction which flows so easily from his pen: "We go often to history for precedent: why not heed it for warning? Argument is scarcely needed to prove that the kind of ecclesiastical character of which Constantine was a type and the style of piety of which Southern Europe has displayed sickening illustrations are a persistent peril in a material civilization such as the next half-century in the United States is almost certain to witness. That civilization is dogged in its merry march by three cruel seducers,—luxury, frivolity, and vanity. They will thrust their tawdry pomp into the advance, led by the bride of Christ, if they can. She may well look anxiously and pathetically on her children, who are not of this world, needing for herself no meretricious attractions upon her chaste beauty to win them, no tiara on her forehead to impress them with her royalty, no array of mortal distinctions to make her majesty more august. They who imagine that the Lord's sacraments are honored or venerable in proportion to the barbaric parade of the function forget the principles of art hardly less than of the religion of the Son of God, and are almost as untaught by the culture of Athens as by the simplicity of Nazareth. A State can have the virtue of order without political finesse or diplomatic fuss, and the Church can have the grace of sacraments in its fulness without being spectacular or effervescent or mimetic."

THE PATHWAY FOR THE NEGRO.

The address of Booker T. Washington at the Atlanta Exposition marks an epoch in the history of the Negro in this country. But a few years ago the colored orator, if he had been ready to say what he did, could not have found a platform or an audience among the white people of the South; and, if the platform had been ready, it is doubtful if the orator could have grasped the situation then as he has done to-day. As the associated press reports of Mr. Washington's address did not contain the full text, we have taken pains to procure it, and print it entire this week, together with the volley of comments from the Southern press, which echoed it from Washington to New Orleans. These comments show as nothing else could the deep and wide-spread impression which the address produced.

Mr. Washington has succeeded because he has approached the subject from the right end. It cannot be denied that, in their efforts to bring the Negro suddenly into the full light of civilization, a good many zealous people began at the wrong end. This was conspicuously so in the education of the Negro. The smoke of the war had hardly cleared away before one could have found in Washington a motley assembly of Negroes studying Latin, Greek, and Hebrew who had not mastered the rudiments of an English education. Beginning to build the chimney at the top was misdirected effort. With his keen, practical vision, Gen. Armstrong saw that it must begin at the bottom; and he laid the foundation broadly and wisely at Hampton. A graduate of that institution, Mr. Washington, with original and independent power and clearness of vision, has worked in the same line. The growth of the institution at Tuskegee has been remarkable; and its influence has been to develop the Negro along the lines of self-helpfulness, independence, and practical efficiency. The young men and women who have gone forth from it have been seed-sowers of morals, intelligence, and civilization all through the Black Belt. The Negro exhibit at the Atlanta Exposition shows what the Negro has done and may do. But for several years another exhibit has been going on at Tuskegee. One could see there not only the making of horseshoes, the building of houses, the tilling of a farm, but the making of manhood and womanhood, the building of character, the culture of the conscience and the intellect.

Circumstances of time and place gave to Mr. Washington's address at Atlanta a great significance, which has surprised the Southern press. But, if the Southern newspapers had had reporters at the Tuskegee Negro conferences for the last three or four years, they would have found that the spirit of his address at Atlanta is precisely what he has been giving to his own people at these annual conferences at Tuskegee; and they would find that his manly exhortations to industry, thrift, temperance, and self-helpfulness have met with the same warm response from the colored people as the Atlanta address met from the whites. It is reassuring to find that the most intelligent element in both races is in practical agreement as to the pathway which the Negro must follow to make the most of himself and his opportunity. Unfortunately, the Negro has been the victim of two misleading influences,—the influence of the politician, on the one side, and of the superstitious and ignorant Negro preacher, on the other. He has been led to believe that salvation might come through the ballot, or that he must wait till he gets to heaven before he can get what he ought to have now and here. But the ballot, counted in or counted out, has not brought him prosperity and independence; and the harangues of the Negro preacher have not paid his mortgages. Gen. Armstrong and Mr. Washington have pointed out a more excellent way. The Atlanta address is philosophical, the more so that it is practical.

It would be unjust to the Southern people to say that they have just discovered the value of Mr. Washington's work. His Atlanta address has waked up some sleepy editors, and they have broken out into involuntary applause. But for several years the more intelligent and influential white people in the vicinity of Tuskegee have seen what was going on, and have given cordial support and encouragement to the Normal and Industrial Institute. So, while it is true that Mr. Washington is dead in earnest in his conception of what the Negro needs, many Southern men are just as earnest in recognizing the truthfulness of his position.

And now the question which comes to us will come to many of our readers. It is why a man whose inspiration, counsel, guidance, and practical sagacity are so eminently needed by his own people, and have been so abundantly illustrated in the development of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, should be obliged to travel from place to place in the North for some months every year to secure money to keep his institution going. It may be asked, Why do not some of our millionaires who are so abundantly endowing educational institutions in the North give a million dollars for the endowment of Tuskegee? The principle on which that institution is conducted, of appealing to the student, and practically compelling him to do all that he can do to secure his education, would prevent an endowment from becoming a harm; but it might become a vast source of good in enabling Mr. Washington to devote all his time to the colored people of the South instead of annually educating the white people of the North.

OVERWORK.

It is not work that kills: it is worry. It is not work that breaks down the health: it is overwork. And probably more women yield to this form of prostration than men. They have not been long enough harnessed to the world's chariot wheels to have learned to shirk. They work while strength holds out; and, if they hold a responsible position, they are apt to feel that they are indispensable there, and so cling to it alone instead of asking others to share it with them, or training younger persons to be ready to step into their places when the time comes for rest. One of the best lessons, healthwise, for capable men and women to learn is that there are "just as good fish in the sea as ever were caught." It may sound like an inappreciative sentiment; but it is magnifying the human race at large, though it may seem to belittle the individual. No man or woman is indispensable. The world is not made on that plan. Therefore, the busiest person may pause to breathe, and so be able to live the longer and work the harder. For, though a wise Providence supplies the needs of humanity as they occur, yet the process of adjustment of new men to new places is not easy; and those who are doing important work should so order their lives that changes shall not come oftener than necessary.

But how often people forget this, and, burdening themselves with work enough for several shoulders, sink at last under the heavy load! It is but a little space of time since a noble woman gave away her life in this fashion,—a sacrifice to overwork.

To-day, too late, three or four people are carrying the heavy load she tried to carry alone. A broken down book-keeper in a large city, who well earned a salary of several thousands, sees to-day her place filled by three men, whose combined efforts only make good her place.

As we look over the country and study various institutions, we wonder what will happen when the overworked and overworn heads fall, as they must sooner or later. People are raised up to succeed them; but what a pity to lose precious lives and experience, simply because the labor was not divided sooner!

One sees the same thing in homes. The patient mother is cook, nurse, maid-of-all-work, till she drops in her place. Then a housekeeper, a maid, and a nursery governess are found necessary to make good the absence of the busy hands; but no hired service can fill the void in the home and the hearts.

It is economy to spend money in home, office, institution, if it will lessen the strain of head and heart, divide the labor, and lessen the care. The early part of the business year is a good time to apply this rule, and it may apply in parishes as well as anywhere else.

TRUE PATRIOTISM.

The men and women who were young at the time of the Civil War learned one meaning of patriotism in a way that no books can teach. Children who saw their parents send away cherished stores of blankets and household supplies, and who helped to economize in the ordinary household comforts, that hard-earned money might thus be sent to the soldiers in the field, to say nothing of the more costly sacrifices of the times, did not need to hear much talk about the duty of quick response to the call of one's country. That was the time of action. This is the time of reasoning and of thoughtful consideration as to what the individual really owes to the State; and the systematic teaching, which is already becoming rather general in our schools, is more than ever necessary. In the future this teaching must inevitably be widened to include much more than has yet been attempted. The problem is something more than how to teach the little Scandinavians, Italians, Poles, and all the others to stand up for their new country and to hurrah for its flag. Not at first, but sooner or later, we must teach them the principles upon which the government is founded, show them that the call for thoughtful devotion is not relaxed in times of peace, and let them understand something of the principles that govern the relations of this country to all the other countries of the globe. In this our native-born young Americans need instruction quite as much, perhaps, as the little strangers now entering our schools in these autumn days.

Genuine patriotism is not exhausted in the enthusiasm that is awakened in times of desperate need, nor even in the steady purpose that seeks always to uphold the rights of a single State, a single section, a single country. There is every reason that patriotism should see with clear eyes, even when it thus discovers faults in its own country and excellence in other lands. For instance, the real patriot desires no monopoly of freedom for himself; but, taught by his own feelings, his heart beats with indignant sympathy every time he hears of oppression anywhere, whether its victims are white men or black, whether in America or in Armenia. He has no sentiment for his own country that would lead him to commit an injustice in order to advance its interests. He believes, indeed, that its interests are based on something deeper than mere extension of territory or assertion of authority, and that individual privilege is always to be considered in relation to the wider interests of humanity on grounds of expediency as well as of ethics.

Patriotism of this sort means, also, education and enlightenment. It leaves no room for such petty self-assertion as was exemplified recently by the French officers who were being entertained in England. Their hosts tried to give them pleasure by arranging a water excursion for them, and inadvertently a steamer was selected which bore the name "Prince Bismarck." One and all refused to go on a boat that seemed to honor the former enemy of their country, though an impartial observer might suppose they would rather enjoy the suggestion of directing the ways of the great statesman, and reducing him to serve their pleasure. Harmony was restored by the substitution of "The Duke of Cambridge," and one kind of "patriotism" was satisfied for the time being.

In America, of all countries, true patriotism ought to be developed, because this is pre-eminently the home of man, and may claim to speak for the human race. Every corner of the civilized globe has its own characteristic virtues. Every race of man has a peculiar excellence or capability. By our very composition we ought to be fitted to comprehend this, and not only to extend quick recognition to real patriotism and just deserts in other lands, but to appreciate the value of differing modes of thought here at home. It is natural, perhaps, that every despotism should be hostile to independent thought and action, and show distrust of religious dissent; but for us who, as Americans, believe in freedom of thought, both in matters of State and of religion, as the primary condition of full-grown manhood, narrowness in this regard seems well-nigh unendurable. It is only to be met and cured by the same old methods upon which we have been depending ever since the mighty experiment of upbuilding this republic was first begun. It seems slow work sometimes; but we must keep at it, and educate, educate, educate. No one who studies the growth of liberty, both religious and civil, can really despair, however impatient he may become at times with crude intolerance or national selfishness. Even the boy at school no longer studies history as a mere record of facts and dates. He is taught to discover the causes of development here and the reasons for retarded growth there. He learns how the interests of Puritan New England and Catholic Maryland, of Dutch New York and French Louisiana, could not long be divided. He sees for himself how all the nations of the earth are bound together by mutual interests, each serving needs of the other, and how jealousy and distrust must finally give way to the conviction that in the gain or loss of a single nation to which justice is denied all the others share.

Musings.

I SEE by the papers that Mrs. Laura Ormiston Chant has arrived at Boston by the "Cephalonia." I thought some of sitting down and writing her a note, welcoming her to this country; but a constitutional idleness in the use of the pen has restrained me, and I have concluded that it would be a great deal easier, certainly much more legible, and perhaps just as polite, to commit my welcome to a type-writer and a type-setting machine. There may be people who will be shocked by the unconventional publicity of such a letter; but they may justify my course when I say that I can save a two-cent postage-stamp by this device. Besides, Mrs. Chant is already so well sun-burned by the glare of publicity that this open letter will cause nothing but her ears to burn.

My dear Mrs. Chant,—I am delighted to welcome you once more to our shores, and to tell you that the America's cup is still here. What a disappointment it would have been to you, as a loyal Englishwoman, to find, on reaching here, that the cup had gone across the water! But you still would have found, and I hope always will find, that there is here a larger cup of American hospitality, brimming with welcome, from which you may drink.

I recall with vivid pleasure the evening when I last saw you at your own home in London. I had often heard you on the platform and seen you in the homes of other people; but I wanted to see you in your own home. I enjoyed myself so much that I hope I shall have that pleasure again. You can imagine the rare curiosity with which a conservative like myself entered your home. I had heard it stated so often that woman suffrage means the abolition of the home that I wanted to see what sort of a ruin you were living in. It has seemed to some that, with all your numerous public engagements, you might be a good deal of a stranger to your own family, that you might have merely a bowing acquaintance with your husband, and possibly have some difficulty in recalling the names of your children. It had even been intimated, I think, that you did not live with your husband at all. If you noticed a little confusion and embarrassment on my part that evening, you may explain it by the fact of my surprise at the undisguised admiration and affection which your husband, Dr. Chant, seemed to have for his wife, and the love which fairly bubbled over from your children. It naturally took me a little time to recover from this staggering blow to my prepossessions, and to adjust my eyes to the brilliant glow of love-light diffused through your home. I do not like overmuch the modern style of journalism, in which a reporter enters one's home and turns it open unto the inspection of all the world. But, if I were going to do that sort of thing, I should like to have the job of writing up that home on Gower Street. As this letter is not intended for publication, and I can trust you not to make any such use of it, let me say that I was strongly interested in that assertion of maternal feeling which led you to spend that afternoon in making doll babies for some charitable purpose. That a woman suffrage advocate should know how to use the needle seemed to me singularly grotesque. But the dolls were, however, anything but grotesque; and I should like to have about a bale of them for Christmas presents for my young friends. In this humble work of stitching you are not without eminent companionship. For many years after she was married and had entered into public life Mrs. Livermore cut her husband's clothes; and I will warrant you that they were cut to fit.

But that a woman suffrage seamstress should be able to sit down to the piano, and play and sing words and music of her own composition, was another extremely interesting item in the pleasures of the evening; and I cannot forget the fun which the young folk had in acting out some of these songs. It seemed to me then that it was a part of your mission in life, with voice, pen, and personal influence, to move the world to action to some new rhythm, set to a new melody, and with finer harmonies of life and spirit. Perhaps your work as a seamstress, too, better fits you to sew up broken hearts, as your training as a nurse helps you to heal physical and mental wounds.

If I were writing for the press, I should not dare to mention, lest it might detract from the dignity of your eminence or from the eminence of your dignity, that we all went out into the yard with the young folk, and tried skipping the rope. Such youthfulness is not easily pardoned by those who have become prematurely old and who have ossified into rigid decorum.

Heretofore I had known you simply as Mrs. Chant; but now I shall never be able to think of you without thinking, too, of the bright boy, the merry girls, and the delightful man who, with yourself, illumine and sweeten the Gower Street home. It was worth going to London to make Dr. Chant's acquaintance. I have already catalogued him among the list of "good physicians"; and I am sure that the benediction of his face and charm of his presence must kindle health in the very bones of his patients.

I refrain from signing this letter simply because, if you do not know who wrote it, it will be of no use to tell you.

Brevities.

The ministers are back to their posts, and a whole volley of gospel musketry has begun to sound along the line.

These are the mellow, golden days of fall, when the glory of the Lord is seen in the burning bush, and the trees bring forth fruits after their kind.

Our Presbyterian brethren who read the extracts from Mr. Dole's new "Catechism of the Liberal Faith" which appeared in the Register of last week and the week before have noted some important variations from the Westminster Catechism. We suggest that they save further controversy in their own body by adopting this revised version.

There are those who may think that the criticism of a Japanese upon the missionaries in his country is too severe. But we publish it as an illustration of an attitude of mind which missionaries must meet. And there are European observers who, while doing justice to the devotion of the missionaries, feel that there is some ground for such criticism as this native writer makes.

Rev. E. E. Hale, D.D., and his family will have the sincere sympathy of his great circle of friends in the loss of his son, Robert Beverly Hale, who has succumbed to an attack of typhoid fever. Mr. Hale, inheriting his father's genius, had already begun to make a name for himself as a poet and story-writer, and was a young man of much promise. His death will come with a shock of great surprise to his college mates and comrades.

It is the custom at the Shaybacks' camp every summer to read two of W. C. Gannett's sermons for Sunday service, "Blessed be Drudgery" and "A Cup of Cold Water."

This last summer, while the latter sermon was being read, there was a little commotion outside the log-cabin door, sounds of feet and subdued voices. At the close it was explained. A fisherman, rowing past in the hot sun, and remembering the delightful spring in that neighborhood, had pulled his boat ashore, and come up to the cabin to beg for a cup of cold water.

Now that the Montana Industrial School has been turned over to the government, the contributions which have been made for Indian work may be given to work among the Negroes. Mr. Washington's address this week and the comments of the Southern press remind us that in no better way can Women's Alliances advance our missionary work than by making their annual contributions to the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial School, and by taking Negro scholarships equal in number to those of the Indian scholarships which have been transferred in Montana.

The Christian Mirror is a trifle superstitious. Before the yacht races took place it seriously asked, "Is there any relation between the Sunday record and the mishaps of the 'Defender'?" and added: "According to the daily papers, she has had eleven mishaps. Her time for launching was set for Sunday, but the effort was a failure. She started out for what may be called her trial trip on Sunday, and now the papers tell us the work of putting in her new mast was completed on Sunday." When it came, however, to her contest with the "Valkyrie," the "Defender" won by eight minutes. Are we to accept the Mirror's logic, and conclude that the Sunday work helped to secure the victory?

Mrs. Helen Campbell, in an article in the Standard, tells us something about the sermon factory of Rev. Charles G. Ames: "There is in Boston a certain minister, the successor of the well-beloved James Freeman Clarke, and himself no less loved and honored, who owns now, at nearly seventy years of age, a hundred and more notebooks, full of the gleanings of these years. These are not only stray passages from books he has read as he paused in long walks for breathing time or as he journeyed by one conveyance and another from point to point in his wide-reaching parish. To those he has added thoughts of his own, grave or gay, the strange and sad, the wise and the foolish sayings of the people whose words he has caught. There they are, long rows,—of later years all of one size, a record of life, as it has passed, and the only diary he has kept. Friends are allowed to turn them over, and know what treasure of mirth, of wisdom, of genuine poetry, the closely written pages hold. 'That's my sermon factory,' the master says, when reproached for locking it all away. 'I can't turn a page without finding something that means fresh light on living; and, when I can't think out what I want, I just turn the leaves, and take the thing that appeals at the moment. I am coming to think that, if we talked less and wrote down more, we should understand life better.'"

Pro and Con.

THE APPROACHING NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

It can be very reasonably hoped—or more reasonably wished, perhaps—that many men from our churches, in addition to the many devoted and faithful women, may be sent as delegates or go voluntarily to this approaching National Conference; for the men generally need the influences that will be dominant there more than the women do, most of whom keep in close touch with their churches. Men are generally too exclusively engrossed with secular affairs, and not inclined to give much attention to religion, especially to personal religion, unless occasionally attracted to it by some distinguished men or great occasion. The local churches do not frequently enjoy much of their presence or their generously supporting influence. Admirable would it be, then, if a large number of them could be attracted to the various National Conferences, where they can hear distinguished speakers and feel their quickening, inspiring influence.

The last National Conference at Saratoga was represented by all in attendance to be a really great occasion, and it awakened a general enthusiasm for "the religion of Jesus" that it was good to witness or to read about. Might not that be called a genuine "revival of religion,"—a revival on the part of some, and an original awakening on the part of others, not of sectarianism or any superstition, but of the true spirit as well as the faith of Jesus? None of the proverbial Unitarian coldness was manifest there; and, if any long frozen up music was taken there, it certainly got thawed out.

And so, again, without doubt, will it be the same at the Washington Conference. It will be another great occasion, with more representative men and women to speak with even more inspiring influence,—the Pentecostal promise again fulfilled, that the Spirit should be freely given to all, and "both sons and daughters prophesy." This seems to be the anticipation of the general secretary of the American Unitarian Association, "who is becoming a veteran in the service of the Conference," and tells us that "the coming Conference will be the largest and strongest ever held." This thought of many should be the hope and prayer of us all. The Conference should bring a genuine enthusiasm for God and humanity, and so in reality be a great religious awakening; and let us hope and pray that the Saratoga enthusiasm, reappearing at Washington, will not be spasmodic and local and evanescent, as is apt to be said of "revivals" generally, but that it will survive the great occasion, and diffuse itself through all our churches, making them churches of that Spirit that giveth life!

W. H. FISH, SR.

MISSIONARIES IN JAPAN.

To the Editor of the Christian Register :—

Since so much has been written about Japan that now everybody knows something about the habits of her people, is it not time for those good and zealous Christians who are supporting missionaries over here to look themselves over, and see whether they really are doing any good or not? The more we examine these "benighted heathen," and especially the more we compare them with Christians, the more we see that we are taking liberties with a people whose daily practices are far in advance of anything we know. The missionaries who are sent out here are generally well-meaning specimens of an uncultured class of society, who know nothing about the classics of China or Japan, who have read none of the books on Oriental religions. They do not attempt to familiarize themselves with Oriental customs, but with an overwhelming egotism set to work to demolish that which has been held noble and good for centuries. Their lack of culture makes an impassable gulf between them and the better classes in Japan; and their lack of morality (I use the word only in its highest sense) loses for them the confidence of the poor. In matters of filial conduct to the aged, of conscientious treatment of servants, of unpretentious and humble living, the missionary cannot represent to the Oriental mind a high standard of morality. The Japanese wonders why they ride in jinrikishas, and then forget to extend to the poor, perspiring human horse such consideration as he is wont to receive from his heathen patrons. He wonders why they dress so well and eat so much. He compares them with the officers of his own army, who in the late war persistently refused to eat better food than the rank and file ate. He wonders why we do not send them to Tammany Hall or the "Barbary Coast" of San Francisco. The family council, as provided by the civil code of Japan, deals with all questions of right conduct in family matters so successfully that at present no Western missionary can advance anything as a substitute. To be sure, that one old dogma about "coming to Jesus" is not in it; but the principles which Jesus taught are all there. There is missionary work to be done here, as there is all over this distracted earth; and, if our zealous friends in America are anxious to do so, let them send out some trained nurses, machinists, and young doctors to work among the poor, and the harvest will be great. For centuries Japan has advanced on psychic lines, to the exclusion of things material. If we could only trade some of our Yankee ingenuity for some of their morality, it would be good for both sides.

LU WHEAT.

Yokohama, Japan.

For the Christian Register.

AT DAWN OF DAY.

BY ISABEL FRANCIS BELLOWES.

At dawn of day, when the morn is breaking,
And thought and hope in the heart are waking
Ere light and life have their perfect way,—
That is the time when the soul doth pray,—
At dawn of day.

The small birds twitter their tender lay,
Their full soft throats with their carol shaking.
The air is full of the scent of hay
Ripe and sweet for the morrow's raking
At dawn of day.

Like the hope of the soul is that moment gray
Mid the shadows misty and dim and quaking.
A troublous place of the earth they're making,
And our eyes strain after the coming ray.
Ah! when shadowy death is our life o'ertaking,
May it not be like the great awaking
At dawn of day!

AMONG THE UNITARIANS OF HUNGARY.

BY REV. WILLIAM H. LYON.

I.

"Many thanks for the loaf of good brown bread," wrote the dying Theodore Parker to Charlotte Cushman in Italy. "It is like the Lord's song in a strange land." I remembered this as I sat in the dining-room of the handsome Hotel Hungaria in Budapest, staring helplessly at a bill of fare in a language utterly disconnected from any tongue that common travellers know, and hearing conversation on all sides that had absolutely no meaning to my ears. For, when I was realizing that I was indeed in a "strange land," a waiter passed me with a plate of smoking green corn. He might call it what he would,—kukurecz, török buza (Turkish corn): it was green corn, and the smoke thereof was as the incense from my native altars. As the train sped along the great Hungarian plain, which had tempted so many inroads of barbarians in centuries gone,—a plain absolutely level from horizon to horizon, like an ocean,—on both sides stretched away great fields of the same grain. Here and there the blue succory smiled with its familiar face, the wild aster looked up with its timid greeting, and great yellow and black sunflowers nodded like old friends. White farm-houses, with tall trees bending over them, seemed to have followed from New England. The haystacks had changed from the slender piles around sharpened poles, which we had seen in the Tyrol, into substantial cones; and windmills, that might have rolled like bicycles from Rhode Island, waved their great arms across the fields to the homesick American.

In short, there is something in Hungary besides the common love of liberty which makes the American feel at home there; and, when I was met at the station in Kolozsvár by Prof. John Kovács, I forgot entirely, in the warmth of his welcome, that I was in so foreign a land. Prof. Kovács, who is so well remembered by American Unitarians as the eloquent and charming Transylvanian who came to the Saratoga Conference of 1882, and made us all love the Hungarian Unitarians through him, remembers that visit himself as one of the most happy experiences of his life, and is never tired of repaying to the Americans who visit his native land the hospitality which he then received. All through my visit he was my guide, interpreter, and herald. I soon found that the warmth of his welcome was the forerunner of the kindness of the entire Unitarian body, not, of course, to me personally; but to me as the representative of the American and English Unitarians. My visit had been suddenly planned; and there was time only to secure letters of introduction from Mr. Bowie, the secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who asked me to carry the greeting of the English Unitarians, and from Dr. Herford, while the authority of the directors of the American Unitarian Association to be one of their representatives to the anniversary meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association served as a letter of introduction from the other side of the ocean. The bearer of these documents received at once the accumulated cordiality which the Unitarians of Hungary hold to the credit of their brethren in other lands,—a cordiality so warm and so strongly and constantly expressed that I cannot go on with the story of it without warning the reader that the individual man disappears and the delegate (so considered) takes his place, though it may often be necessary for him to speak in the first person.

I found that my hasty visit had happened at a most fortunate time. Not only was the quadrennial Synod to be held; but it was to be held in a Szekler village, where the life of the people could be seen unsophisticated and unlevelled by the common-places of a city. Besides this, a new and beautiful church was to be dedicated, and the Jubilæum of the loved bishop was to be celebrated.

First of all, however, the honors of Kolozsvár, the capital of Transylvanian Unitarianism, must be rendered to the delegate, who was entertained at dinner by the bishop, along with Profs. Kovács and Boros of the University, Rev. Messrs. Peterfi and Masea, pastors of the Unitarian church, and others. Mr. Peterfi, in an address of excellent English, bade the representative of their distant brethren welcome to the hospitality of the Unitarians of Hungary, and proposed a toast to their honor. The delegate answered as best he could, and so began a long series of public and private expressions of good will to the far-off fellow-believers.

Mr. Allen has so lately given a fresh and comprehensive account of the history of the Polish and Transylvanian Unitarianism in his "History of the Unitarians of America" that those who wish to know it in detail may be referred to that valuable book. But it will do no harm to recall here that the Unitarians of Transylvania or of Hungary, as they prefer to be called in the present enthusiastic national consciousness, numbering about one hundred and eight churches, with sixty-five thousand communicants, are the remains of a most remarkable and once promising Unitarian movement in the east of Europe in the later days of the Reformation. In Poland, then a proud and happy nation, the educated and the noble classes formed the main support of the three hundred Unitarian congregations; while in Transylvania, under the reign of John Sigismund, himself of the new faith, there were over four hundred churches. Francis David mounted a stone in the market-place of Kolozsvár, and so eloquently expounded the Unitarian faith that the entire city was converted,—a matter of great encouragement to our open-air preachers on Boston Common. But, when the Catholic reaction set in and the Jesuits began that insidious attack which proved so fatal to Protestantism in the south of Europe, the Lutherans so hated the Calvinists, and both so hated the Unitarians, that all three, fighting separately, were an easy prey to their united and fanatical enemy. In Poland not a church remains of the Unitarian name, and in Transylvania only one-fourth of the number that owned Francis David as bishop are left. This remnant has found its support, not among the nobles and the wealthy of the land, but mainly among the farmers of one province and of one race,—the Szeklers of Siebenbürgen, the most easterly part of the kingdom of Hungary.

